T THE FIRST CHURCH DID NOT HAVE.—If we make a list of the things which the first n Church, as it was on the day of Pentecost, have, we would be surprised and think it ot have been a church at all. It had no building, no pipe organ, no choir, no pew no subscription list, no treasurer, and no What would we think of our church if it ripped of all these things? Yet one thing ave that may be our greatest lack, the bap- the Holy Spirit. Kindled by fire from how it burned and flamed with zeal, how as its work, what multitudes were added to a powerful impulse it gave to the kingdom t on earth! A church's life, then, does not in the abundance of the things which it s. A costly building, an artistic choir, an preacher, and a fashionable congregation n themselves make a true church. We may a church that has all these things, and then some bare hall where a few Christians are ping, and we may feel that the plain hall a truer church, has in it more of the spirit t and the glory of God than the costly es- ment. External appliances of the church— erial shell—are good and even necessary in ace and are not to be depreciated. They a good deal of money and we must have But they are not the church, and they are not what the church is for. They are only means, and we are to use them only as means to spiritual life and fruit.—The Presbyterian Banner.

Correspondence.

An esteemed Friend writes: "I was sorry to see in one of the printed letters giving an account of the Doukhobors in THE FRIEND the mention of furnishing them with material to do fancy work—perhaps with a view that they might sell it and in that way be a help to them. Now we as a people have ever believed that our time was not given us to be used in making needless things to ornament the body and consequently could not encourage it in others, and I have been thinking if any amongst that people should feel convictions in their hearts for spending their time in that way and by giving heed to it should be led to give it up as a sacrifice called for by their Heavenly Father, it would reflect on our Society, to whom no doubt they look to as a pure people."

To show that the caution above expressed is not confined within what some might wish to regard as the narrow lines of our religious Society, the following is extracted from the letter of a highly intelligent woman of another religious denomination:

"The plan for fancy work, etc., may pay. I doubt it. Canada wants the heavier and plainer work done. We have nothing but the home here. For myself that is all I want. Yet I sympathize with all who having been fed upon all that literary and artistic food that large towns give, have to come to the drudgery and monotony of prairie life, having scarce time to look upon the beauty at their doors, of sky and flowers. . . In winter we must look upon the brightness and cheery cleanliness of the house."

In order, however, to clear our representation from the Meeting for Sufferings to the Doukhobors from any complicity in encouraging the kind of work which our correspondent laments, we are enabled to quote the following from the written advices of J. S. Elkinton in this respect:

"I have found, as a member of the committee for the relief and assistance of the Doukhobortsi, the appropriating of such a proportion of our funds as could be agreed upon as justifiable in furnishing wool for the women to work into garments for themselves and families. I see no objection if that gets done, and they can work up a surplus of useful and necessary things, such as gloves, knit jackets, underclothes for market. But I have no heart in encouraging the production of ornamental work. I very much doubt in the long run its being profitable. I do not feel the Divine blessing would be in it. I want them to stick stiffly and stubbornly to useful and necessary things, and let those things which neither help nor are supposed to hinder, alone.

"The development of the taste for embroidery is of the same root as music and imagery in the line of painting and fine arts in general, coming rather under the head of the lust of the eye and pride of life which is inimical to Christianity. And religion in all ages has led its followers into simplicity.

"I think [helpers and instructors] would be better engaged visiting the sick, comforting the sorrowful, endeavoring to bind up the broken-hearted, than in taking up with the fine arts. And I hope and pray that there may be found some honest men that may have it for a principle in business that no bargain is a good one unless both parties are helped."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The negotiations opened by Secretary Hay with the great Powers of Europe and with Japan towards securing a common understanding for a continued open door policy throughout China have met with most gratifying results. The State Department is unwilling at present to make public the nature of the replies received, as this information will be embodied in a special message to Congress. But in other quarters, thoroughly reliable and in a position to have trustworthy and accurate information, it is learned that favorable responses have been made by Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, (the Russian communication coming as late as Twelfth Month 30th), and Japan. There is no doubt, it is thought, that Italy, the remaining country unaddressed, will make favorable answer, if, indeed, it has not already done so. The position of Italy is felt to be assured by the favorable course adopted by the other four great Powers of Europe.

The Colorado Springs Gazette gives the production of gold from Cripple Creek district for the past year at 422,805 tons of ore, with a bullion value of $19,743,100. The output for the Twelfth Month surpassed all previous records, and added $2,610,218 in gold to the world's wealth.

Director of the Mint Roberts was asked as to whether the present money stringency in his opinion signified an actual scarcity of money to meet the present requirements of trade. He said: "Undoubtedly the war in the Transvaal has had influence upon our money market. Anything that disturbs normal conditions, which turns the currents of business out of the course they have been expected to follow, will affect business. With trade balances as they are, our bankers early in the season had reason to expect gold imports this fall, and probably directed their business accordingly. The war not only cut off a remittance of about $2,000,000 per week to London from South Africa, but compelled heavy shipments the other way. Such a reversal of the regular and anticipated order makes money tight in all centres until affairs are readjusted to the new condition.

"The world does not depend upon the Transvaal for its stock of gold. Colorado will produce more gold in 1900 than all North America yielded ten years ago, and this continent will yield more next year than the whole world did ten years ago. Cripple Creek is up to the record of the Transvaal five years ago, and Cripple Creek, with Alaska and the Klondike, will next year exceed the Transvaal production of 1897. The golden tide, though checked for the moment, is not going to subside."

The textile mill construction for 1899 will reach a total of 299 mills, as against 262 for last year. The South leads, with North Carolina showing more new work than any other State in the Union.

A bushel of wheat, or an equivalent amount of flour, can be shipped from Minneapolis to almost any point in Western Europe for about 20 cents.

FOREIGN.—The British public revenue for the nine months ending Twelfth Month reached £82,777,044 as against £78,340,468 for the corresponding period of last year.

Last week's sorties, skirmishes, reconnoisances and bombardments at various points where the British and the Boers confront each other, so far as can be judged, have had no effect upon the general situation at the seat of war, which is practically unchanged. A special despatch received in London on the 1st inst., says that General French completely defeated the Boers in Cape Colony and has occupied Colesberg. Reckoned together, the regulars of the British Government sent to South Africa, the naval brigade and the colonial levies number 106,270 men. This is the largest muster of white troops ever gathered under the British flag, yet, large as it is, it does not suffice for the task of subduing the two Dutch republics, and the British Government is engaged in breathless preparations to despatch reinforcements numbering, by present estimates, at least 60,000 men, drawn mainly, of course, from Great Britain, but to an appreciable extent from Canada, Australia and British India. The cost of the war has also grown apace. At first it was thought that $50,000,000 might suffice, but now it is thought that the expenditure will foot up at least $250,000,000. Truly it is a growing war.

The following despatch, dated Victoria, B. C., Twelfth Month, 26th, has been received:—The telegraph operator at Glacier, in the Rocky Mountains, reports that an immense avalanche has swept down the mountain near there, covering 850 feet of track and taking down a number of telegraph poles, so that the wires are interrupted. Trees twelve inches thick were observed in the slide, and it is not yet known what else may be covered by the snow or what is the condition of the track. The slide covers the track to a depth of from five to twenty feet.

The steamer Tees brought news of a big snowslide on the White Pass and Yukon Road, which has stopped all traffic. A train carrying passengers from Bennett followed a rotary snow-plow and was pushed by two engines. When the plow was a mile south of the switchback it cut out the lower part of the accumulated snow on the mountain-side. This loosened the mass above, and it came down with a rush, burying the plow and the locomotives out of sight. The passenger train in the rear was not touched by the slide. There were fifteen feet of snow in the cut.

WM. EVANS, Treasurer, 252 S. Front St. Phila.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Spring River, Kansas, on the twenty-second of Ninth Month, 1899, CHESTER MOTT, of Viola, Iowa, and JOANNA BOWLES, of the former place.

DIED, on the twenty-second of Twelfth Month, 1899, SARAH MASON, aged nearly eighty-four years, widow of William Mason, of Norwich, Ontario, Canada, she being a member of that meeting.

——, on the 16th of Eleventh Month, 1899, at the residence of her son, Almon Stanley, MARTHA STANLEY, in the eighty-fifth year of her age, a beloved member and elder of Coal Creek Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends, Iowa. She and her beloved husband, Jeremiah Stanley, removed from Ohio, and settled in the fall of 1856, on the place where she ended her days, when this part of the country was little less than a vast prairie; in the settling and improvement of which they took an active and interesting part, as many of the early settlers would necessarily need a place for shelter while they could take time to accommodate themselves with homes. Their kindness and liberality to supply such with temporary homes soon became apparent. Coal Creek Meeting also took rise in a part of their house. Soon after this, Jeremiah Stanley, after a few week's illness, departed this life at his home, near the forty-ninth year of his age, making, as was believed, a peaceful close. Thus, our dear Friend was left with the care and concern of a family; a lively interest for the everlasting welfare of these, her children, continued with her until the last. This aged Friend had a number of times been heard to state that she had accommodated over thirty families with homes in her house. This was mostly in the first twenty years of the settlement of this neighborhood. She was a firm believer in the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, as set forth and maintained by consistent Fr[iends] from its rise. She became an invalid for a numb[er of] years previous to her death, and for the last three [years] confined almost entirely to her bed, yet a murmur o[r un]thankful expression was not heard. Her confidence, [faith] and hope, were placed in her Redeemer as long a[s con]sciousness lasted, which was until near the close. [She] was frequently heard to say: "I want to be relea[sed, I] see nothing in my way."

——, on the twenty-first day of Tenth Month, JEMIMA R. BOONE, aged fifty-three years, seven month[s and] fourteen days, a member of Pickering Monthly Me[eting,] Ontario.

——, on the third of Tenth Month, 1899, ARTHUR [...]LET, aged eighty-four years, eleven months and [...] days. This Friend was an elder in Huntingdon Me[eting,] Ontario, Canada (now laid down). He was of a g[entle] peaceable spirit, much beloved by those who knew [him.] He loved the Truth for the Truth's sake, and faith[ful to] the end he gently fell asleep in Jesus, leaning on hi[s om]nipotent Arm.

——, on the second of Ninth Month, 1899, at [...]bray, Ontario, Canada, ELIZABETH HAIGHT, at the a[ge of] eighty-five years. She was the daughter of Samue[l and] Mary Hudson, from Lincolnshire, England, with [whom] she came to Canada, where she afterwards married [...]land Haight, surviving him. Being convinced and converted to God by the power of the Truth as [borne] testimony to by Friends, and believing their doctri[nes to] be identical with those held by the church in the da[ys of] the apostles, she with her parents became establish[ed in] the truth, continuing faithful therein to the end. Th[ough] not an acknowledged minister among Friends, at [times] she exercised her gift to the comfort and edificati[on of] others, which, with a circumspect life according th[ereto,] proved a deepening work of grace. Her path, t[like] the just, was an ever brightening one as she drew [near] the celestial city, whose light and glory the Lord i[s, and] her last days were crowned with that joy and peace [which] the Lord gives to those who choose Him as their a[biding] place.

——, on the thirteenth day of Ninth Month, SARAH V. WRIGHT, an elder in Pickering Monthly Me[eting,] Ontario, aged eighty-one years. She was the wid[ow of] John Wright, who once resided in Richmond, Ind., [after]wards in the city of New York. Her two older s[...] still survive her. She will long be held in lovin[g re]membrance by a large circle of Friends, whom it wa[s her] delight to entertain at her hospitable home. And th[ough] at the last death came suddenly it was not unexpe[cted] to her, nor was, we believe, due preparation for th[is sol]emn change neglected on her part, but like as a [wise] virgin with her lamp brightly burning, we humbly [trust] she entered with her Lord into the marriage supp[er of] the Lamb.

——, at Norwich, Ontario, Canada, on the tw[enty-]fourth of Seventh Mo., 1899, SARAH JANE HAIGHT, [aged] eighty-two years, wife of Harvey H. Haight, a mi[nister] of the gospel. She bore a long and painful sickn[ess with] Christian patience and acquiescence to the Divine [will.] Her ripening years bore evidence of a drawing nea[rer in] spirit to her Lord and to Friends, and these have th[e con]soling hope that He who graciously supported her th[rough] all her sufferings, has permitted her through me[rcy to] join the multitude of the redeemed "who have w[ashed] their robes and made them white in the blood [of the] Lamb."

——, on the thirteenth day of Sixth Month, 18[99, at] Norwich, Ontario, Canada, JESSE STOVER. His re[mains] were interred on the fifteenth day of the same mo[nth,] what had he lived to see it would have been the [anni]versary of his ninety-fourth birthday. This dear [Friend] was an elder in Norwich Meeting for many year[s, and] enjoyed the use of all his faculties, together with [a clear] discernment in spiritual things, until about two [weeks] before his decease, when, feeling better than us[ual, he] drove to meeting, where he had a stroke of pa[ralysis.] Recovering from this, he still rapidly declined, b[ut con]tinued sensible to the end. It had been his deligh[t when] a young man to assist ministering Friends in their [...] and one of these from England, in his early pionee[r days,] returning in his company from a family visit whilst [pass]ing a field covered with stumps, the minister s[topped] short, and addressing Jesse, said: "Thou shalt be [blessed] in basket and in store," which was verified in his [after] life. But all he had was held in subserviency to h[is duty] to God and to man. Sound in faith and doctrine, [watch]ing over the flock in love, gentle and seasonable i[n coun]sel, and weighty in spirit, also upright and truthfu[l in] walk and conversation, of a cheerful disposition, [and] dignified bearing, his light shone brightly, bringin[g honor] to the name of Him whom he rejoiced to know [as his] Redeemer, into whose garner we humbly trust [he is] gathered as a shock of corn fully ripe.

The Recognition of Gifts.

ently in a large meeting the apparent ty of gifts in the ministry as coming for- n younger members was adverted to, and ductions of worldliness and lack of whole- d dedication to the Divine will came into s a part of the cause. After meeting a ned Friend privately asked: "Don't thou it very discouraging to younger persons eel evidences of a call to a little service, they see those who are exercised in pub- erings, year after year, remaining un- ized by their Monthly Meeting?" The of this query was acknowledged, as well danger of decline in any who looked to acknowledgments for their encouragenas, indeed, been noteworthy in many that gifts for a season rising, have, the meeting had too long declined offici- accept them, seemed to wane; so that urch itself has been a robber of churches oring an offered gift. The timid lisper e Divine name or message, whose soul that within are fightings and without ars, seeing what seems like a doubtful nce of beginners, and of continuers as egs to be excused. And so we know not any gifts and callings get inwardly stifled nheard of, or how many ministers are in comparison with the few chosen. blame rests with their own lack of faith," e. But where is our faith when we let ght time go by, to "give a cup of cold in the name of a disciple?"

a subsequent meeting when the state of ociety was under consideration, a lack in cognition of gifts was pointed out and a proportionate indifference accounted A speaker thereupon showed the idleness of covering our individual shortcomings behind the unappreciativeness of a meeting, before being clear that we recognized our own gifts. There is where recognition of gifts must begin, and obedience keep pace. And no church largely peopled with members quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord to recognize and heed their own gifts and callings from Him, could long remain unappreciative of the witness of his Spirit in each other. So the answer came home,—that the meeting is composed of individuals, and their own obedient recognition of their own gifts makes up the meeting's capacity to acknowledge gifts. Our duty comes not from others' recognition. "What is that to thee? Follow thou me,"—is a rule which, if more generally followed, would bring about the best solution of the question of recognition.

But it should be borne in mind that right recognition of "that which serveth God" in the church must at the same time be a power to recognize "that which serveth Him not." A church has not come to its true discretion unless it can discern between its right hand and its left. An indiscriminate endorsement of every activity as so much life, quickly confuses and destroys the gift of recognition. Mere criticism of any movement and mere push of any movement are equally blind. But he that singly follows Christ shall not walk in darkness, as to his own or others' gifts.

It is a serious thing to retreat from "the gifts and calling of God," which, when once vouchsafed, "are without repentance" on his part: since that which He will not repent of giving He will sustain us through the performing, if we will trust Him. His word shall not return unto Him void, though a hearing son or daughter may turn back from being his instrument, and so from being blessed. It is eminently safe to acknowledge one's own gifts and calling by fulfilling them. Unfaithfulness will not quicken the brethren's recognition. But if they officially advise the member that he has mistaken his gift, his submission to gospel order clears him of a burden which they have taken instead.

Various gospel gifts are named in the Scriptures, and especially by the apostle in the 12th chapter of Romans and of 1st Corinthians. More is said about faithfulness in them than about the Church's formal acknowledgment. Such gifts seem expected to bear their own evidence. But that church is the most open to blessing that is most open to spiritual evidence. No invariable mode of acknowledgment seems imperative. But the ministry of the word before public assemblies seems to require some more public testimony of approval than the other less public gifts. A simple record of the fact that the gift has in the meeting's judgment been conferred, is enough in our religious society. This adds nothing to the minister, except a more representative position, or, at least, a testimony that he does not misrepresent the truth as held by the Society. Confidence that a minister will not, in matters of judgment, be a misrepresentative, is sometimes lacking; where, if the only question were on the existence of a gift, an official acknowledgment could come much earlier.

Seeing that the gifts and calling of God are not regretted by Him, may each one see that he comes behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of the quickening Spirit, "who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye may be blameless in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Right Religious Teaching in Friends' Schools.

An editorial in The (London) Friend contains pertinent remarks on the value of Boarding School life and training. The following extracts are made, as being applicable to conditions existing on this side of the Atlantic, viz:

"It is not easy to over estimate the importance to the Society of Friends of its boarding schools. Our trained teachers are exercising an influence over our membership that makes them considerably responsible for the future of our denominational life. . . . What is then the secret in the Society of Friends of the controlled life? Does it not lie in the very ideal of our existence as a religious community? Our economy is based on the proposition that each individual life is to be under the government and control of the Spirit of God. We shun in our religious life that which is parasitical and dependent on man. We endeavor to be led and moved by the Spirit of Christ. One of the ultimate results of such an attitude is strong personal conviction. If a man yields his whole being to the moulding of the Unseen Hand, the fashion of his character will develop into a quiet power that prevails. The ideal is high. Everyone of us would shrink from any assumption that it is attained. Yet the presence among us of the ideal is a governing factor in our individual and our collective life. Hence arises the question—when and where is this subjection to a controlling Divine power to commence?

"The first answer is, at the cradle, in the early home life. Many rise up and testify that it was as little children that they first became conscious of the presence and teaching of the Holy Spirit. There is something intensely winsome and instructive in watching the action of the gentle Spirit of the living God on child life. Excee lingly beautiful is the early revelation to the young soul of the love of the Heavenly Father.

"Every true teacher reverently watches for the tokens among his scholars of that revelation. . . . If the soul is over-much chilled it begets an unhealthy and sensitive reserve; if the voice for God and for Good is fostered, a bouyant hope of the happy possibilities of life prevails. The School life is a larger life, it is the arena of a wider vision than the child has hitherto known.

"He is placed there not only for fellowship with comrades, but for the ministry of teaching from those more mature who have accepted the high office of the teacher as their life-work. The teacher is day by day, here a little and there a little, 'building for eternity,' but he is also very definitely building for a career on earth.

"In connection with that future career of usefulness for the scholar there at once arises in all our Friends' boarding schools an important element that differentiates our schools from those of other religious denominations.

"In other denominations there is more or less pronounced distinction between clergy and laity and this class distinction to a greater or less extent governs the character of the educational teaching as it advances to higher grades. But Friends have no clergy or laity. We are a brotherhood of believers, all one in Christ.

"We do not admit the distinction of one man called 'Reverend,' we recognize the reverence due to every soul of man, and desire above all to reverence the direct ministration of the Holy Spirit of God. . . . Everyone of these boys and girls in our boarding schools is eligible for the high office of the Gospel ministry in the infinite varieties and modes of its manifestation as service for God among our fellowmen.

"Not one of these scholars is to live unto himself, all are called to the service of God in that of their brother-man. Lessons are not to be divided into religious and profane. Every deed of life and every lesson of life is to be religious, in the presence and to the honor of God. The hilarity of boyhood, the love of play, the high spirits, the elastic step, skill in the gymnasium or on the cricket field, have their part in the formation of character just as certainly as mathematics or natural philosophy.

"It is, in fact, the elasticity and buoyancy of a happy and well regulated life that do much to carry a man over the backwater of the ebb-tides.

"The very exuberance of juvenile activity, while allowed healthy expression, learns in a well ordered boarding school subjection to government, and this in itself induces habits of self-control. . . . "History and especially Church history, the capacity clearly to express condensed thought by the logical sequence of ideas and the diligent reading of inspired Scripture are all very helpful" to the development of that character which can best fulfill our highest calling and ideals of service.

"Many can gratefully acknowledge the debt they owe to Friends' boarding schools, not so much it may be, in the storing up of any very large amount of knowledge, as for seeds of thought that germinated in after life. and for the inspiration of higher purpose, and the trend of thought Godward, which is of more value than a whole burnt-offering of intellectual acquisition."

We truly appreciate the discouragements besetting the effort to instil spiritual truths at an age when the eternal instincts may seem to be mostly in abeyance, but such feelings and difficulties often arise from a lack of contact and freedom of intercourse rather than the absence of interest either on the part of pupil or teacher.

The High Function of Family Life.

As to the influence of the family upon individual welfare, and upon the future of the young beings who are now within its fold, it cannot be overestimated. The happy and well-ordered home, where love reigns and mutual good will binds each to each, where parents appreciate and fulfill their responsibilities, and yet preserve their youth in the atmosphere of their children, where children give their parents a glad obedience, confidence and gratitude, where brothers and sisters combine in mutual helpfulness and affection, is a fountain not only of present happiness, but of future welfare for every one of its fortunate members. From such homes spring our valued and cherished citizens, who, while actively pursuing life's many undertakings, look back with unspeakable gratitude to the fireside where their powers were fostered and their characters were established. . . . . The late Professor Peabody, of Harvard University, writing of the natural religion of the State says :

"The malign action of whatever impairs the sacredness of home may be seen in the history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire. In the best days of the republic, the standard of domestic virtue was singularly pure and high for a heathen nation, and the State drew health, vigor and culminating power from frugal and well-ordered homes. In the time of the earlier Emperors, the home-life of Rome, in its profligacy, distances description, and but for accumulated evidence would transcend belief. All manly attributes died out of the heart of the nation, which had as little capacity of being fitly governed as its worst tyrants had of discreet and virtuous rule. The bonds of society became like those of the family, a rope of sand. . . . . To an incalculable degree, the home instinct supplies the place of law, supersedes the harsher ministries of government, prevents crime, anticipates want, divides and lightens burdens, which else no public organization could bear. The gravitation toward home is, in every nation, a stronger force than its police or armies are or can be, and accomplishes many purposes of prime importance which they could in no way fulfill."

If this be so, it must be an encouragement to those who form and maintain a family remember how high an office they are fillin and how wide an influence they are exertin Instead of being limited to the few perso who compose the family group, they are hel ing to build a nation, and whether it shall permanently established, upon solid found tions, or crumble to the ground, a victim its own weakness and instability, largely d pends upon the character of the home whi they are now fashioning.—Public Ledger.

CONSCIENCE

"Good-by," I said to my conscience—
Good-by for aye and aye."
And I put her hands off harshly,
And turned my face away;
And conscience, smitten sorely,
Returned not from that day.

But a time came when my spirit
Grew weary of its pace;
And I cried: "Come back, my conscience,
And I long to see thy face."
But conscience cried: "I cannot,
Remorse sits in my place."

MENTAL MOODS AND BODILY HEALTH.—was a favorite saying of Bancroft, the histori who was a vigorous old man at ninety, that t secret of long life is in never losing one's te per. The remark was simply a concrete way expressing the hygienic value of amiability principle which, until lately, has scarcely b considered in the training of children. Hithe we have regarded fretfulness, melancholy, bad temper as the natural concomitants of ness. But modern science shows that th mental moods have actual power to produce ease. No doubt in most cases imperfect bo conditions are the cause of irritable and depre ed feelings, yet sometimes the reverse is t and a better knowledge of physiological l would show them to be effect rather than ca The fact that discontented and gloomy people never in good health is an argument in favo the theory that continual indulgence in unha thoughts acts as a poison and creates some f of disease. Moreover, such people radiate an wholesome influence, which, like the atmosph of a malarial region, one cannot help inhali They also lack hope and energy, and are more likely to succumb to prevailing epidem than those of a cheerful temperament. A riety of motives, therefore—our personal w being, regard for the dear ones of our ho holds, and loyalty to the divine Master, who bids our taking anxious thought—should ins us to cultivate a sunny disposition.—N. Christian Advocate.

"BE YE ANGRY AND SIN NOT."—There difference between being angry and lo one's temper. He who loses his temp angry, but he who is angry has not necessa lost his temper; that is, one may be righteo angry, deliberately and voluntarily angry, gry in the sense that his soul revolts f evil, and he feels that he is discharging a d in expressing himself in condemnatory te In other words, conviction and purpose dominate and guide anger, and to right ends. But the loss of self-control which usu although not always, is accompanied by an e lition of temper is literally a loss. The r of control for a time are dropped, and on at the mercy of his mood.—Congregationa

For "THE FRIEND."

is Haverford Meeting, mentioned in the unt, is one of the oldest meeting-houses merica, and when it was first started nds went from Philadelphia every third -day to it, most of them walking the e distance of about ten miles. It must been rather a cold place when they ıed there in winter, for the only means of ng it, was by rolling a burning log up to on plate in the wall. This plate trans- ed a certain amount of heat, but when the ıds became too cold, they would step out- and take some active exercise. But in ı weather the whole aspect of the scene ged. Quarterly Meetings were days long ed forward to, by the children at least. part of the day which seems to have made greatest impression, at least the part we about most frequently, is the time be- ı the meetings, when all the people ate lunches together under the trees in the ing-house yard, and the boys played hide- eek about the sheds. An even greater was Yearly Meeting, when the country e visited their city relatives. In speak- f the hospitality of Friends, at such times, nglish Friend says :

'his being the evening preceding the hly Meeting, upwards of twenty people d at (W. E.'s) house, and, as far as I judge, were both liberally and comfort- entertained. I was told by a neighbor it was not very uncommon for as many as r strangers to dismount at the door of Friend's house, and for themselves and s to be well accommodated. W. E. has ily of eight or ten children."

e of the most striking changes which come over the home-life of the people n the last hundred years, is seen in the on the children occupy in the family. e minutes of the Yearly Meeting we find: t is also a very evil thing, and hateful to and all solemn people for children to er their parents again forwardly or crossly. ugh they think they are out of the way, ought to answer soberly and modestly, or t all ; for parents ought to be obeyed to God."

is possibly does not sound very different what we should say now. But there was ided difference in practice. The parents looked up to by the children as supreme; word was law. The children were told in things were right for them to believe, hat when they became older they would rstand more about them. In the mean- however, they believed implicitly what were told. They were carefully instructed e doctrines of Friends, and never doubted ın instant that anything else could be . When they went to meeting there was in the sermons they could not under- , but they knew the key-note of Quaker- and when that was struck they recognized The possibility of going to another place orship never occurred to them. They ably would often have preferred to go here, but this would have been unheard of. yone went to meeting from force of habit, r no other reason, and the children followed their parents. There was comparatively little literature to be had then—few books and fewer newspapers and periodicals—and Friends were especially careful of what their children read. There were, however, plenty of Friends' journals, and these had to be read whether they were welcome or not. The poor child might become very tired and sleepy, or he might be pining to get back to play, but he must stay by, even if he did not listen. If he went to sleep he was promptly awakened, and the reading was continued. But sometimes something caught his attention, and he listened. If it were a thrilling adventure, he recognized the bravery of the Friend who was probably standing up for what he thought was right. From that time that Friend became a hero, and the principles for which he stood were identified with him. So the "loyalty of tradition" soon became the "loyalty of intelligent faith." But there came a time, after this, when their loyalty was not a "loyalty of intelligent faith." The children were told it was right for them to do certain things "because Friends did them."

The distinctive message of Quakerism to the world was the doctrine of the Inward Light. The early Friends held that true religion led to plainness and simplicity in dress and speech. As time progressed, matters of speech and dress were, perhaps, as strictly dealt with as drunkenness and gambling. It is said that during this time one-third of the members who married were disowned for marrying out of meeting. Now the world is learning, if not the form, yet the spirit of the doctrine which the early Friends knew. And we Friends must keep up to this principle of growth if we expect to be a living power in the world. We began ahead, and we certainly must not fall behind.

Friends have always been looked up to as a very charitable people. Not that they gave such large amounts, for they were not a rich people, but what they did give came from all, and was individually distributed. Of course the main bulk of the work fell on the meeting, and in those times the minutes of the meetings go further into details than they do now. Consequently we find such entries as, "To poor palsy man, 10*s.*; to poor old Elizabeth, 2*s.* 6*d.*; to ancient Esther, 2*s.* 6*d.*" Also, "Information being given this meeting that W—— P—— is very poor and in necessity, this meeting orders Jos. Kirkbride, Samuel Dark and Peter Worral, to get a good pair of leather briches, and a good warm coat and waistcoat, one pair of shoes and stockings, for the said W—— P——, and make a report of the charge to the next meeting." As the boundaries of the meetings were ill defined, there is often considerable trouble deciding to which meeting certain cases belong. But it was not this organized giving that gave Friends their reputation for charity. It was the interest and judgment that went with the giving. The people went themselves to see those they helped, and so were able to give to better advantage. Then there were many little thoughtful, helpful things that could be done. Perhaps some one was sick near by. It might be some one not known to the Friend's family, it might not be a member of the society, but the next time as the family was going to meeting, they would stop with a glass of jelly or some other trifle. Or some family might be in need where a little help would be of great use. This spirit of charity was especially munificent to Friends engaged in the ministry. Often such Friends were frequently from home, and it was especially difficult for them to provide for their families. If they were too much ground down by such cares their message would be hindered.

Lack of means never stood in the way of any religious concern that might be felt. There was always some one to step out, both with means for the Friend and for a companion. Money was felt to be just as truly a gift as the gift of the ministry, and should be used as much for other people. If it could help some of the higher gifts it was merely fulfilling its purpose.

There was a very strong sentiment in the Society against the accumulating of large fortunes. In the minutes of the Yearly Meeting we find the following :

"And we earnestly caution and advise against the inordinate pursuit of worldly riches, which being sought within due bounds, for the comfortable subsistence of ourselves and families, and the charitable relief of others in necessity, is not only lawful but commendable ; but when the mind is carried away with the love of these things, they then become (even though men do not transgress the bounds of justice) a clog and hinderance on the duties of religion, and is an excess which ought to be guarded against."

Consequently we find numbers of Friends, at the time comparatively young, giving up their occupations, and trying to devote themselves in other ways to the Lord's work. A notable instance of this is John Woolman, who, when only twenty-three years of age, gave up an opportunity of making a good living and confined his attention to tailoring, because he thought his mind would be too much taken up if he engaged in any business which required a large share of thought and time. He says, "I saw that an humble man might live on a little, and that where the heart was set on greatness, success in business did not satisfy the craving, but that commonly, with the increase in wealth, the desire of wealth increased."

While we may not dwell so much on such matters as these, there are other subjects which we consider vitally important, but which in those days were looked upon as matters of utmost insignificance. The taking of intoxicating liquors was a universal custom. Even some of the most influential Friends were engaged in breweries. Long before the Revolution they had found, however, that it was best not to sell anything of the kind to the Indians. But they considered it no mistake to take it themselves. We find one Monthly Meeting "desires W—— B—— to supply what W—— P—— stands in need of, it being some molasses and some rum." Wine, or something of the kind was always on hand, and everyone drank freely. The majority were able to resist the temptation of drinking to excess, but frequently there was a weak one who yielded. Mention is made of recorded ministers whom the meeting thinks it necessary to prohibit "the privilege of sitting in our meetings of ministers and elders," because they had yielded too far to this temptation. But even while they grieve for the result, they do not altogether condemn the cause, for we find that Friends are advised "not to take their beer till after meeting, as they are often seen in a condition, when present, not to profit thereby."

The minutes of the meetings include many such items which we would leave out. Matters were brought before the meetings which are now left for committees to arrange. We can hardly imagine such an acknowledgment as the following being read in one of our Monthly Meetings:

"Friends—Whereas I contended with my neighbor, W—— S——, for what I apprehended to be my right, by endeavoring to turn a certain stream of water into its natural course, till it arose to a personal difference; in which dispute I gave way to a warmth of temper so far as to put my Friend W—— into the pond, for which action of mine, being contrary to the good order of Friends, I am sorry, and desire through Divine assistance to live in unity with him for the future.

"From your friend,

"J—— W——."

In looking into the changes which have come over the life of the members of our Society, I have tried to pay especial attention to those which might affect the attendance of our meetings.

The Greatness of Christianity.

The ideas of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ have not yet been realized in society. If the Church has not realized them, it is certain that the world has not. All truth has relation to the mind of the individual; according to the inherent greatness or littleness of the individual, so will be his apprehensions of truth. Nothing is more impressive than to witness a mental giant struggling to rise to the height of a great subject. Nothing is more pitiable than to see a man who is constitutionally very small, occupied in the mean effort to bring a great subject down to his own level. Canute, on the sea-shore, bidding back the proud waves, is respectable by the side of men who stand on the edge of Christianity and bid its waves cease to roll. Christianity is greater, morally, intellectually, and socially, than anything else in the world to-day. There is nothing before the mind of man so grand in its ideas. Time cannot measure them. They begin in eternity past; they stretch into eternity future. Whenever Christianity is rejected by the individual it is proof positive of the intellectual littleness or of the moral badness of the rejector. It is either too great or too good for his reception. Christianity is never rejected on any other ground than its superior greatness or its unappreciated goodness.

Having made this assertion, it is necessary to add that the ecclesiastical world does but faintly represent the greatness and goodness of Christianity. The churches, as organizations, are but feebly Christian. In most of our churches are found men and women whose excellence of disposition is far above the average religious professor. These, in the purity of their spirit, in the sweetness of their temper, in the devotion of their lives, are an approach to the true Christian conception. They are what the whole Church, when developed, will become. We often sigh, oh, if all were thus, how powerful would the Church be.—Selected.

GUARD THY THOUGHTS.

As our thoughts so are our actions,
As we travel o'er life's plain,
Evil thoughts cause evil doing,
And are followed e'er with pain:
But if thoughts are pure and noble,
Holy lives will then be led,
And the sunshine of love's kindness,
All around us, will be shed.

As the sowing, so the reaping,
In our lives, shall ever be,
If rewards of peace and pleasure,
For our souls, we wish to see,
Then let all our thoughts be noble,
Dwelling on the higher life,
So our souls will not be trammeled
By the bonds of mortal strife.

Record Department of Friends' Library.

The Record Department of Friends' Library was established in 1886, for the purpose of providing a safe place of deposit for the records of our Yearly Meeting and its subordinate branches, where these valuable books would be removed from the perils to which they are ordinarily subject. These perils are not only from fire, but from other and even more serious dangers incident to their being kept in private hands or Meeting-house safes, or even in ordinary banks or safe deposit companies.

The further design was to make such provisions as would afford the officers and committees of depositing Meetings, every facility possible for the examination of their records, and at the same time to protect them from the inspection of improper persons. The Record Department is under the care of the Library Committee of the Three Monthly Meetings of Friends, in Philadelphia.

The Record vault is a fire-proof room, with floor, ceiling and sides of stone, brick and iron, 37 feet long and 12 feet wide. It is furnished with iron and steel fire-proof stacks, in which the deposited records are arranged, each volume having its appropriate numb r. It is within the compass of Friends' Library Building, 142 N. Sixteenth Street, a structure itself fire-proof, and separated by wide spaces on all sides from any other buildings.

Under arrangements recently made, the Librarian has been appointed Deputy Custodian, and will afford authorized persons opportunity to examine records at any time that the Library is open, which is every week day from 11.30 A.M. to 2 P.M., and from 3 to 6 P.M., except in the Seventh and Eighth Months, when it is open two days in the week, only.

Of the eight Quarterly Meetings comprising Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, five have deposited their records in the record vault, viz: Caln, Western, Burlington, Haddonfield and Salem. In addition to these, the records of two other now non-existent Quarterly Meetings, Bucks and Shrewsbury and Rahway, have been deposited.

Forty-four Monthly Meetings, which includes some that have been laid down, and several within the limits of non-depositing Quarterly Meetings, have deposited their records with the Library Committee. A few charitable organizations connected with Friends, have also placed their records in the vault.

The total number of volumes which have been received up to the present time fr Quarterly Meetings is 42 and from Mont Meetings, 576; in all, 618. Records fr other sources, to the number of 58, have a been received.

It will be borne in mind that many reco were lost to the Society at the time of separation, in 1827. Access to some of th has been accorded, and they have been cop The aggregates given above embrace s copies.

The attention of Friends generally is invi to the facilities thus afforded for the safe c tody of records. Such may be sent to the brary, at any time that it is open, and rece will be issued for them. It is desirable, h ever, that the Custodian should be notified letter in advance when meetings design to s their records.

A Talk with a Sea Diver.

He was the strangest looking being with armor on, his copper helmet and breast-pl the long connecting pipe that supplied him w air, the rope about his waist with which he sig ed, when under water, to those above—one meaning this, and two pulls meaning that— foot-gear almost as strange as his head-g and the huge glass eyes, the windows thro which he looked. He was on diver going down to settle the position of big stone just sunk with him for the bridge midstream.

"What do I find down there?" he said reply to my question one evening, when work was over, as he sat at the water-sid every-day garments. "Not much here. some water things of value, chests of old and jewels. In Boston bay, when I went d to get a man-of-war's anchor, I found the tom just strewn with lost anchors. Fine for an old junk dealer that."

"Wedges of gold, great anchors, heap pearl," I thought, as I quoted the line in mind. "Are you never afraid?" I asked.

"Afraid of what?" he returned. "The nothing to be afraid of in these latitudes a you know your business."

"I meant of drowning," I said.

"How you going to drown? The boat's overhead with your lifelines: the fellows are all the time pumping you down fresh through the pipe. You can't drown while yo plenty of fresh air to breathe."

here is an unrest in sin. That is the testiy of human nature. We are so made that onesty cannot produce happiness any more n discords can produce music.
here is nothing in the universe so beautiful soul which is doing God's work in God's
. And there is nothing in the universe so less and miserable as a soul that by doubts vil deeds has cut the bond between itself God and is careering through space under guidance except that of passion or greed excitement, forever seeking the happiness ch forever eludes its grasp. An uneasy soul, conceive of a greater anomaly or look on a more pitiful spectacle? When a man thinks God is in the wrong and trusts his own folly instead he swims against a current too strong for him.

You cannot defy the universe with impunity.
There is the law, and along its lines lie pastures and orchards. Thrust the law aside and you wander in a wilderness.

The unhappiness in men's lives demonstrates the necessity of religion, not the religion of dogma, but the religion of childlike faith, the religion which the Christ taught and lived.

You can have a restful and peaceful life, but the secret of it can only be learned at the feet of the Master. There is a joy which a thousand worlds such as this cannot give and of which no trials or troubles can rob you. It is the rest of the heart, the peace of trust.
Give me my faith in God and you are welcome to all that remains. Take it away from me and I can find no substitute for it in any corner of the globe. Without it I am on the frozen mountain side in winter, with no home in sight, but with it I am sheltered from every storm and heaven is on the other side of my earthly life.

For "The Friend."

Extract of a letter to his daughter, Lavina Bedell, who was living in Dakota, under date of Second Month, 1871:

"Knowing of thy affliction and suffering, as we hear from time to time that thee gets no better, it has called forth all the sympathies and anxieties that could be wrought in an affectionate father. Yes, I have, according to my measure, deeply felt for thee; and have craved for thee, that thee might not become cast down in thy mind. I hope thee will be cheerful and hope for the best and try to be resigned, for 'He doeth all things well.'

"And, as I have very often thought of thee, and as it were entered into feeling with thee, some of the blessings and promises contained in the Sacred Volume have came so fresh to my mind . . . that I think to pen some of them. It seems to me I may say to thee, 'Arise, shine; for thy light is come and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee;' and 'Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' . . . 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' I have no doubt but thee has read these lines and been comforted by them. There are also a few other passages that I feel like quoting: 'Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me; in my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.'
And again, 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty,' . . . Precious promises! There are very many others which I might enumerate, and which are very encouraging in affliction, or to an exercised mind, and, I believe, as we ponder over these things with a single eye to the great Giver, that He will manifest himself to us, to our great comfort; and we can better bear up under trials and afflictions. Although pain and suffering are now thy portion, and may at times seem very discouraging, yet how many who have been reduced much lower have become well and hearty! The slender thread of all our lives is in the hands of our Merciful Creator, and for aught I know thee may yet enjoy many bright and happy days. And should it be thy portion to live and enjoy a good home and kind companion, the searching of heart in this affliction will be no hurt to thee, even through a long life to old age, for I believe the best people are the happiest. True religion does not keep us all the time with a long face and sober countenance, but innocent and cheerful—a cheerfulness that enjoys life—friends, and the many comforts and blessings bestowed by a great Benefactor on his creature man. I must quit lest thee say, 'Physician, heal thyself!' Well, I know I am a poor, weak creature; but being so does not hinder one from having affectionate feelings and . . a deep interest . . for the good of mankind, and, particularly, for one's dear children.

Diary, Fourth Month 17th, 1871.—"This afternoon our dearly beloved youngest daughter, who had returned from the West and been with us six weeks, very quietly and peacefully breathed her last. Although the trial is hard for human nature to bear, yet from the many weighty sayings expressive of her peace of mind and resignation to the Divine Will, we feel the assurance that her peace was made and that our loss is her everlasting gain, which is cause for joy in the midst of grief. And as I take a retrospective view of the many favors and blessings that have been dispensed to me all my life long even to the present day, my heart overflows with gratitude and praise to my Heavenly Father. Oh, what cause for joy and rejoicing when I look back to the peaceful close of my dear parents, who gave so much evidence that they were favored with the overflowing of the Father's love, as also that of my dear, departed brothers and sisters! And the language is again revived that was so much with me when I was a child; namely, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.'

In a letter to Mary Emmons, a Friend who was blind, occurs the following: Tenth Month, 1871.

"Dear Friend—Thy situation has taken a deep hold of me, and in feelings of solicitude for thee I write; although I feel that I am a poor, weak creature, and that it is a great thing to take my pen to address thee in this way. What passed through my mind the day
I left thy pleasant home has often revived; for, while the distance was each moment widening between us, thy situation was feelingly brought before me, and the language of the dear Redeemer presented itself in his answer to the question, 'Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?' The answer was, 'Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.'

Now I believe that He doeth all things right, and that He doth not willingly afflict the children of men, but 'Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth.' And though thy affliction is great,
. . . no doubt it is in the counsels of his wisdom for thy good, and not for thine only, but for mine, and, perhaps, many others. He who holdeth the thread of our lives, could as easily take away our hearing, and our feeling, as our sight; so that we have abundant cause to be thankful, and to praise and magnify his great name for his goodness and his mercy, in that thy affliction is no worse than it is; and I have craved for thee that thee might have patience and be resigned to his will. 'Let Patience have her perfect work.' Yea, and 'In patience possess ye your souls.' As this virtue is abode in, afflictions may be blessings in disguise; and the works of God may be made manifest in thee as in the one formerly, for our ways are not his ways or our thoughts his thoughts. 'He hath put down the mighty from their seats and exalted them of low degree.'

"But why should I write thus? Thee knows these things, and I believe thee knows where to look for comfort, and I have desired for thee and for myself, that we may more and more look unto Him from whom all consolation comes, that as this 'earthly tabernacle' faileth our 'spiritual strength may be renewed day by day.' For 'here we have no continuing city;' but happy will it be for us if these trials and afflictions are borne with patience and resignation, that they may work for us a 'far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.'"

Truly thy friend,

JOHN HAMPTON.

Diary, Tenth Month 18th, 1871: "To take the pen to add anything to my diary, without a right qualification, seems too much like trying to steady the Ark, unbidden. I have for some time endured poverty, leanness and distress, insomuch that at times I have almost despaired of ever beholding the King in his glory, or the arising of the light of his countenance upon me, in which time there has been great searching of heart to know why it is so, or why I am thus forsaken. But to-day, on reading the accounts of some of the Lord's valiants, I find it is no new thing for his chosen ones to be thus tried. Then why should I, a poor, weak, little one, complain? And the language revives in my heart, 'Goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life,' and also, 'I shall yet praise Him who is the health of my countenance and my God.'"

AN IDLE DAY.—"If I could only have one whole day to do nothing but play in, how happy I should be!" said Rosie to her mother at breakfast time.

"Try it," said her mother. "Play as much as you like. Try it to-day."

How the children going to school envied Rosie, as she swung on the gate and watched them passing by. No hard lessons for her. When they had gone she ran into the garden, picked some gooseberries for a pudding, and carried them into the kitchen.

"No, Rosie! That is work. Take them away."

Rosie looked serious. She got her doll and played with it, but soon tired; her shuttlecock, but did not care for it; her ball, it bounced into the kitchen window. Rosie peeped in after it. Mother was shelling peas.

"May I help you, Mother?"

"No, Rosie, this isn't play."

Rosie strolled away with slow, lagging footsteps to the garden again. She leaned against the fence and watched the chickens. Soon she heard her mother setting the table for dinner, and longed to help. After dinner Rosie took her little bag of patchwork and stole away to the barn with it, for she could stand idleness no longer.

"Mother," she said, as she gave her a good-night kiss, "I understand now what the teacher meant when she said, 'He has hard work who has nothing so do.'"—Exchange.

THE NEW YEAR.

I know not what the coming year
May bring to me of joy or pain;
I only know He will be near Whose loving maketh all things plain.

I know not what strange shade may fall
Upon my pathway; but I know
He yet will hear and heed my call
And lead me whither I should go.

It may be over mountains wild;
It may be through the valleys sweet;
But He will never leave his child
To wander with unguarded feet.

And still I know his sun will shine,
His rains will fall, his grasses grow,
His stars will shed their light benign,
His rivers to the ocean flow.

I know how fair the days will glide
When summer decks the smiling land,
Mountains in solemn peace abide,
And all the hills in halo stand

And while he heeds the rains and snows,
And sets the stars their watch to keep—
Cares for the humblest weed that grows,
And wakes it from its winter's sleep.

While every wind blows by his grace,
And rainbows span the steadfast blue,
Each flower unfailing finds its place,
And knows its time and season too,

I will not doubt his constant care,
Nor fear his promised love will cease,
Who, whether days be dark or fair,
Can keep my soul in perfect peace.

Your Mother.

I want to speak to you of your mother. It may be that you noticed a careworn look upon her face. Of course, it has not been brought there by any act of yours; still it is your duty to chase it away. I want you to get up to-morrow morning and get breakfast. When your mother comes and begins to express her surprise, go right up to her and kiss her. You can't imagine how it will brighten her dear face.

Besides, you owe her a kiss or two. Long ago, when you were a little girl, she kissed when no one else was tempted by your fever-tainted breath and swollen face. You were not as attractive then as you are now. Through years of childish sunshine and shadows she was always ready to cure, by the magic of a mother's kiss, the little, dirty, chubby hands whenever they were injured in those first skirmishes with the rough old world.

Her face has more wrinkles than yours; and yet, if you were sick, that face would appear far more beautiful than an angel's as it hovered over you, watching every opportunity to minister to your comfort.

She will leave you one of these days. These burdens, if not lifted from her shoulders, will break her down. These rough hard hands, which have done so many necessary things for you will be crossed upon her lifeless breast. Those neglected lips, which gave you your fir baby kiss, will be forever closed, and those sa tired eyes will have opened in eternity, a then you will appreciate your mother, but will be too late.—Eli Perkins.

To some of us, who are members of the S ciety of Friends, not only through inheritanc but also through conviction and a belief in t truth of its principles, the various points of i doctrines stand forth in that purity and sir plicity which has but one Author. And whi we can and should regard with charity tho of our fellow travellers who cling to form a ceremony, these points of our doctrines a sharpened and emphasized by comparison wi the methods and requirements of other forn of church government; and a feeling of than fulness is begotten in us, that we are privile ed to hold membership in such a highly favor organization as our Society is. May we diligently concerned to be as living membe in the Church!

The following extract from the Chicago I ter-Ocean, quoting the words of a promine writer, appeared in the columns of one of o leading daily papers one week ago, and is a s commentary on the qualifications of a minist demanded by many of the church-goers of t day; yet it is encouraging to realize that o views of the essential qualifications and rig exercise of true Gospel Ministry would not pe mit the existence of such a condition among us:—

Short of immorality and unbelief, one cannot i agine a greater hindrance to the energy of t Church than a large proportion of aged and infi ministers in active duty. For this will mean ob lete theology, the neglect of the young, isolat from the spirit of the day, and endless wrangli Nothing would more certainly re-enforce the ener of the Church than the compulsory retirement u satisfactory terms of every minister above the a of sixty.

We know that the Great Head of the Chur often sees fit to call into the service of t Gospel those who are young in years, and t history of our Society is rich in the examp of youthful, yet powerful ministers, some whom have sealed their testimonies with th lives. We rejoice in the faithfulness of th who in their youth are called by our Heave Father to testify for Him, but one of the mirable features of our Society is the reveren and esteem with which our members, older younger, regard those ambassadors of the Lo who have grown old in his service; those, w in the days of their first visitations, were in prime and vigor of their lives, but who r are wearing the silvered locks of old age. is true that with most of these the physi abilities are declining, but in place of them we not find a far deeper spiritual experienc As the vigor and impulsiveness of youth middle age give way to advancing years, do not see instead, a grace, a dignity, and a po that is only possessed by those who long h been watchful and willing ministers of his wo Is there not a sweetness and a fragrance in spirits of these, that only can be found in fruition of a life spent in His service, and do love to sit at their feet, and profit by their nsel and experience ?

elieving then, in the Divine qualification appointment of the ministry, we do not ry, because our ministers are passing the of sixty. Believing in the direct revelation ne Holy Spirit to our ministers, without re-to rank, talent, age, or learning, we do fear that the infirmity of age will be as a rance to the growth of the Church.
elieving in the free gift of the ministry, the exercise of it without money and with-price, we are not fearful that our ministers feel hampered in the declaration of the h, lest they should offend any, and thus nger their means of livelihood.
elieving, as Wm. Penn says, of the miniswho were raised in the beginning of our ety, that "They were changed men before went about to change others," and that e bent and stress of their ministry was ersion to God, regeneration and holiness ;
schemes of doctrines, and verbal creeds, new forms of worship," we do not fear our ministers will fall into "obsolete they" nor "isolation from the spirit of the
;" for the spirit of the day surely does not nonize with the Spirit of Truth.
h ! the beauty, the simplicity, the purity doctrine like ours ; does it not shine forth yet more brilliantly by the contrast just n, and should not we, of this day and gen-ion, see to it, that we keep our heritage in ts ancient purity, free from the little foxes, do and will spoil the tender vines if we rd not carefully against their entrance ?
ndividuals, who will certainly be held acntable for the care of these principles, led down to us with the cost of blood on n, let us "Stand fast in the liberty where-Christ hath set us free, and be not again ngled with the yoke of bondage."

ADDONFIELD, N. J.,
Twelfth Month 29th, 1899.

EFAMATION.— Dr. Waugh had a great dis-to every thing bordering on slander or de-ation, though he was well aware, also, that ity among Christians, according to cove-obligations, is the solemn duty of all.
he following is an illustration of his charr on this point :—

person had travelled all the way from rton to his father's house, to give him an vorable report concerning one of the mem-of their congregation. Some friends be-with him this person was requested to stay dine with them. After dinner he took oc-on in a jocular manner, to ask each person rn, how far he had ever known a man to el to tell an evil report of his neighbor, n some gave one reply and some another.
t last came to this individual, but without ing for his self-condemning reply, or unssarily exposing him, he stated that he had y met with a Christian professor appa-ly so zealous for the church as to walk teen miles with no other object than that naking known the failures of a brother
ber. He then in a warm and impressive ner enlarged on the praise of that charity h covers a multitude of sins, which "re-eth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the h."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Faithful Suffering of a Conscript Friend.

Since the death of my father, in looking over some of his papers, I found a short account of his treatment at the time he was drafted written to a friend. I have felt for some time like sending a portion of it to the columns of THE FRIEND, now while our country is involved in war, hoping it might strengthen the faith of some dear reader of THE FRIEND if ever called upon to uphold the testimony of Friends in regard to war, as he was.

He says : "When many of our friends were fearful of being drafted, this language presented itself as a stay to my mind, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee,' so that I had no will of my own, but felt resigned to the will of Him who doeth all things well.

"After having been notified by an officer that I was drafted, previous to the date I was to appear, I paid the Provost-Marshal a visit to inform him of my conscientious scruples against war. On my way the watchword was the same as was sounded in the ears of Thomas Shillitoe when he went before some of the great men of England ; 'Fear not with their fear, lest I confound thee before them.' When I received orders to appear in person, I replied by letter to the above officer :—'I have made up my mind to adhere to the higher law of Him who hath said, 'Thou shalt not kill,' and, therefore, would decline attending to thy orders.'

"After being taken by an officer to the county seat and put in soldiers' uniform (because I refused to dress myself) in an unguarded moment I was about to sign my name to what afterwards proved the muster roll, (for I had been wrongly informed what it was) when He, who had been following me with his everlasting love, sent my friend, who had gone to another part of town, back to prevent me. They tried to persuade by threats, etc., but I remained firm, while this language strengthened me, 'Let them do their worst,' the fear of man being taken away.

"That night while sleeping closely guarded, I was favored with a covering of Divine regard and having it brought to my remembrance as though spoken to me, 'Be of good cheer, Paul; thou hast testified of me at Jerusalem ; thou shalt bear witness of me also at Rome,' (Alliance and Columbus standing for 'Jerusalem' and 'Rome').

"After reaching the barracks at Columbus my friend and I did not feel free to form in line at the tap of the drum to march or drill. This misdemeanor was reported up to the Major-General. When brought before him we found a man tremulous with rage. After he had spent himself railing out against us, etc., he said, 'When you are commanded to drill, drill, or you will be forced to at the point of the bayonet !'

"That afternoon all were required to drill, but this we could not do, fearing to do despite to the Spirit of Grace made manifest in the heart. While alone I put up my cries to Israel's unslumbering Shepherd, craving that He who preserved Daniel in the lion's den would arise for our deliverance, for I felt as though I would rather lay down my life than dishonor his name. I then experienced a calm in the midst of seeming danger. That evening we were conducted to the guard house as a punishment.

"Though confined with the most wicked human beings, I trust I shall remember till my dying day the happy nights my friend and I passed there with nothing but our blankets to lie on. One night I seemed to see a helpless infant under the feet of the guards, while my heart seemed drawn out in sympathy lest it should be crushed. Just then some hand seemed to snatch it up. This assured me beyond doubt that I was under the care of Providence, therefore I need fear no evil. A few days previous to this we were taken out again by a few officers who were disposed to terrify us, to drill. I told them, 'If you force us along we will have to go, but as I do not expect to kill anyone, I do not wish to learn the trade.' Soon a demand came for more men in Shenandoah Valley, and I went up to see if I would be allowed to take an overcoat, when I learned my name was not taken. With what a thankful heart I returned to prison !

"Ere long an order came from the Secretary of War granting my release. Thus was I taken from the hands of unprincipled men and restored to the bosom of my family without injury. All praise to Him who enabled me to endure the cross, despising the shame, to his glory !"

WM. SHAW.

From a Correspondent.

We need not expect an awakening in religious life while people are ready to anticipate God's orders. The enemy is on the alert to press us into service—to retard the upbuilding of Christ's glorious kingdom here on earth, consequently the necessity of hearing the Word, "I Am, hath sent me unto you." This memorial should be the test of our call to gospel ministrations. I have never read of Satan having the prerogative to assert himself by the name of the Almighty, nor have I ever read of the Lord calling unholy or unsanctified persons to go and preach the pure gospel. Ministers should first cleanse themselves, as the True Light shines into the hidden recesses of their own hearts, until the carnal mind is brought into complete subjection to the power and Spirit of Christ. Preaching that the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, while we ourselves are not cleansed, is a retroversion of truth.

Although it is a fact that the more we become able to contemplate the perfection of Christ, the more we realize our own imperfections and the more we cry out, "When I awake in thy likeness then shall I be satisfied." We shall always find it necessary to watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation, that we bring not reproach upon the precious gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom be all power and glory, and dominion and might, now and forever, amen. J. JENNINGS, YARKER, Ontario.

A MAN in Portland, Maine, a few years since in time of poverty announced in the daily paper that he would give a bag of flour, a bushel of meal, and a sack of potatoes or something about equivalent to them—to any family who were poor, who did not use tobacco, drink whiskey, or keep a dog. He was willing to do this for a hundred families; but he did not have one single applicant for his bounty.

God has no human assistants in keeping the divine chronicle. He does not need the information or advice of a man's neighbor in recording his life. None of the judgments of the world influence Him. A man may go through life lauded and honored and envied, and yet be written a failure in God's book. The opinions of men do not affect God's opinion. He, alone, is the Author of the great book of records. —Forward.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES. The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at the close of business, Twelfth Month 30th, 1899, the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,134,300,007, a decrease for the month of $5,791,824.

The statistics for the year 1899, says the New York World, make a most imposing exhibit of the country's industrial growth. It is shown that the volume of trade, foreign and domestic, was the largest ever recorded. The exports for the twelve months amounted in value to $1,276,000,000, with imports slightly in excess of $8,000,000. The bank clearings, which afford one indication of the volume of domestic business, are given by Bradstreet's as $93,300,000,000. The figures show an increase over a year ago of 36 per cent., and of 74 per cent. over 1897. There is a gain of 51 per cent. over 1892, and, as compared with 1894, the clearings have practically doubled. The statistics available indicate the number of failures as the smallest for seventeen years. The railroad earnings are the largest for any year in the history of the country. There has also been a larger amount of railroad construction than for several years previous, most of it being extensions by existing companies. Wage advances have been general throughout the United States. One of the significant features, as developed in the annual resume, is that the greatest increased activity has been in manufacturing. The wheat production showed a falling off, and there was a large decrease in the yield of cotton. The corn crop was heavy. The falling off in the exportation of agricultural products was more than counterbalanced by the increased exportation of manufactured goods.

Captain Leary, Governor of Guam, has abolished the Spanish system of peonage, amounting to slavery, and has deported all the Spanish priests from the island.

The State Department has cabled to Ambassador Choate at London, directing him to inform the British Government that the United States does not admit the right of England to seize cargoes of American goods on the three merchant vessels which were recently overhauled by British war ships off the South African coast. This is the usual preliminary step looking to an investigation of the subject, which, it is believed, will be satisfactorily adjusted.

Lucien Marechal, chief engineer of the Paris, Lyons and Mediterranean Railroad of France, who is in this country on a tour of inspection, has placed an order with the Pressed Steel Car Company of Pittsburg, for 500 steel gondola cars. This order marks the introduction of American steel cars on the European Continent, and may be considered a new epoch of railroad equipment in the Old World.

The $33,000,000 canal at Chicago, at present used for sewage disposal, but ultimately to be a ship canal also, was opened on the 2nd inst., after seven years of hard work by the trustees of the Sanitary District, which is the name of a corporation including the larger part of the city of Chicago and many of its suburbs. It is a great triumph for scientific engineering, and will be a part of a ship canal from Chicago to the Gulf of Mexico.

A Leavenworth (Kan.) jointist has brought suit against an insurance company to recover on $200 worth of liquor destroyed by fire. The claim is contested by the company on the grounds that it does not have to pay loss of goods on which the laws of the state say it is unlawful to sell or to hold for sale.

A petrified forest in a sandstone formation has been discovered in Routt County, Cal.

Samuel Johnson, colored, who was serving a life sentence in the Eastern Penitentiary for the murder of our Friend John Sharpless, in 1885, was found dead in his cell in the Eastern Penitentiary on New Year's day.

Reports received at San Diego, Cal., from interior points show that the recent earthquake was the cause of a number of strange occurrences. The mud volcanoes on the desert near the Colorado River have become active after a long rest, and are now spouting mud again. The natural gas wells near Yuma are also in working order since the heavy quake. They have been lighted, and the glare at night can be seen for many miles. A correspondent from Moosa writes that a number of fissures were made in the ground at that place, twenty or more feet in length.

There were 513 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 53 more than the previous week and 200 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 276 were males and 239 females: 151 died of pneumonia; 58 of heart diseases; 52 of consumption; 24 of diphtheria; 18 of nephritis; 16 of old age; 16 of bronchitis; 14 of convulsions; 13 of uræmia; 12 of cancer; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 10 of peritonitis, 10 of marasmus, and 9 of apoplexy.

COTTON.—Demand from spinners was light, but the market was unchanged, on a basis of 7⅛c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.25 a $2.40; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.25 a $3.35; Western winter, straight, $3.35 a $3.50; spring, straight, $3.30 a $3.65; city mills, straight, $3.30 a $3.50. RYE FLOUR.—$3.15 a $3.35, per barrel as to quality. BUCKWHEAT FLOUR.—$2.35 a $2.50 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 70 a 71c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 37⅜ a 37⅝c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31⅛c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 6 a 6¼c.; good, 5¾ a 5⅞c.; medium, 5 a 5¼c.; common, 4¼ a 4⅜c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4⅞ a 5c.; good, 4¼ a 4¾c.; medium, 3⅞ a 4c.; common, 2 a 3¾c.; lambs, 5 a 6¾c.

HOGS.—Western, 6 a 6¼c.; others, 6¼, with outlook for further improvement.

FOREIGN—A great battle was fought at Ladysmith on the 6th inst., and raged for seventeen hours; 20,000 Boers were engaged, and their entrenchment was captured three times by General White, the Boers being finally repulsed. General White's position is thought to be very critical.

The Filipino stronghold, Commanche, on Mount Aragat, was captured on the 5th inst. by Captain Leonhauser.

Lieutenant Gillmore and nineteen other American prisoners, rescued from the rebels, arrived at Manila on the 6th inst. from Vigan. They were found on Twelfth Month 18th, near the head waters of the Abalet River, after they had been abandoned by the Filipinos.

Lieutenant Gillmore "thought the insurrection would last as long as there were any Tagalos left!"

Hard fighting occurred south of Manila, in Cavite Province, on the 6th and 7th insts. The insurgents lost heavily, and their General Risal was captured.

All the Powers concerned have now agreed to maintain the open-door policy in China. China, herself, can offer no objection, even if disposed to do so, and as each of the Powers is interested in preventing the others from closing any port, the policy may be considered as established. Hereafter trade with China, at least in the treaty ports, is free to the world.

The underground railway at Paris, which is nearing completion, will have a total length of nearly eight miles. It is expected that it will be open for traffic next Sixth Month.

In spite of the enormous territorial extent of the French colonial possessions, which comprise all varieties of climate, these vast domains are of little or no profit to French commerce.

Exports from Berlin to the United States during the last quarter of 1899 were $1,678,840, an increase over the corresponding quarter in 1898 of $493,254. For the calendar year Berlin's exports were $6,633,882, or an increase over 1898 of $1,306,703.

The Russian Government has ordered all the rivers of the empire surveyed, with a view to connecting all the important streams with canals.

An earthquake on New Year's Day destroyed ten villages in the Achalkalak district of the Government of Tiflis, in Russia. A despatch from Tiflis, dated First Month 4th, says: Altogether thirteen villages in the Achalkalak district of this Government have experienced earthquake shocks. Six of these places have been completely destroyed, and eight hundred bodies have already been recovered.

The gold find for 1899 in New South Wales was 509,418 ounces, an increase of 168,925 ounces over 1898.

It is believed in the city of Mexico, in scientific circles, that there will be a series of earthquakes in North America in the coming months. The seismic circle is said to be appearing.

A Rio de Janeiro despatch says that the bubonic plague has broken out in the city and neighborhood of Sao Paulo.

Photography of sounds has reached a point said to establish the fact that there is no such thing as absolute silence. The machine used is so sensitive that it records the lightest current of air passing through a room and distant noises the ear cannot detect.

Collier's Weekly states that the pigeon post established at Ladysmith and Durban for carrying war messages has been such a success that special appropriations for increasing the service will be recommended by the War Office. A good deal of this success of the pigeon service is due to the skill and energy of Colonel Hassard, of the Royal Engineers, who has spent years in pigeon culture for this sort of emergency, and he has demonstrated the fleetness of the birds for war purposes. Colonel Hassard, who was stationed at the Cape before hostilities broke out, systematically trained his pigeons for carrying messages across the rough, mountainous land, and his various pigeon posts were of the greatest value in keeping the home office apprised of the exact condition of the army.

Nearly every civilized government now has carrier-pigeons connected with both their war and navy departments. France has entered into pigeon culture more extensively than any other European power, and it is roughly estimated that there are two hundred and fifty thousand pigeons that country trained for war emergencies. The pigeon service has been established in France since 1870.

The German War Department owns about ten thousand pigeons, but they have a system of reserves which one can call into service in times of war. The owners of private lofts have to register their carrier-pigeons, and the War Department knows exactly how many of the birds can obtain at a moment's notice.

The Austrian Government also relies largely upon private owners' pigeons for service in times of war. Every bird in the country has to be registered, and not one can be sold or sent out of the country without permission.

Italy's pigeon post was established in 1872, and Spain and Portugal inaugurated similar systems a few years later.

There are one thousand homing pigeons on the books of the British navy, and several times this number on the books of the army. In the past ten years the United States Army and Navy departments have been interested in carrier-pigeons, and we have posts established in different points throughout the country. Their services have been useful chiefly in the navy, and experiments are being made constantly in communicating by this means between ship and ship, and ship and shore.

WM. EVANS, Treasurer, 252 S. Front St.

DIED, at the residence of her son-in-law, Albert Hall, Norwich, Ontario, Canada, on the twenty-seventh of Eleventh Month, 1899, ISABELLA HENDERSON, wife of Joseph Henderson, in the seventy-fifth year of her age, a valued member and minister of Norwich Monthly Meeting of Friends. Having been in poor health for some time she seemed gradually to fail until she was unable to leave her bed, when she, as well as others, considered it doubtful if she should recover; but she expressed herself as feeling nothing in the way, that she had a hope that was a place for her above, yet said she had not yet learned to trust in but the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. She heard to repeat with emphasis part of a favorite hymn learned when she was young—

"Oh! to grace how great a debtor,
Daily I'm constrained to be,
Let thy grace, Lord, like a fetter,
Bind my wandering soul to thee.'

Her family and friends have the comforting assurance that she is forever at rest.

t week at the close of a Friends' meeting, strangers were departing, when one of was heard to say, "If there's one thing han another that distinguishes the Friends other Christians, it is simplicity of man- and of worship. And I believe Christ have it so, in all worship everywhere."

a former occasion, in the evening, two men in that same house were sitting for rst time in a Friends' meeting. At length f them whispered to the other, "If this pure worship, then I don't know what ip is!"

nother evening meeting there, two bishops, ad come from the Southern States to at- convention in Philadelphia, found seats. sire was silently felt that the meeting be held in living silence, rather than words unauthorized. The meeting was a one. The bishops wanted to linger and bout its meaning. One of them said, "I been much impressed and refreshed in pportunity to worship in a repose of soul. telling my brother here that if some s of that silence which 'was in heaven alf an hour' could be introduced into of our noisy conventions, it would be better for us."

cause we have said that some parties, pro- ng for Peace, but not in the Spirit of t nor under our Society's name, have dis- ed the cause and much closed the public the voice of the Society of Friends, it is y unnecessary to infer from this that we urage brethren from doing what their find to do, in the right spirit. We have uty to do, as the way may open, though lainers who are off from the Christian ld have made the road harder for us. A t editorial pointing to that fact, was sim- n explanation of one way by which our s for peace are now seemingly seriously ed, but in no wise an intended intimation they should be suspended.

Wherever there is a right opening for a service in so righteous a cause, under a sense of right authority let us faithfully occupy it whether individually or as a body. But we repeat, that a spirit of denunciation will not help our cause, and that such as rely upon that method have helped to wound it. Our method must be found in the Prince of Peace himself, who said "To this end came I into the world that I should bear witness unto the Truth." Our confidence is in the witnessing for the Truth, more than against fellow-beings, as Christ's way of overcoming error. The burden of our concern is, to encourage the overcoming of evil with good, and to discourage attempts to overcome it with evil.

There is ample room for criticism of any policy that means war or conducts it. We have not been free from reflecting on the same, editorially; and personally the writer expects no war to have the endorsement of his vote. But where any peace-workers have seemed to make criticism their mainstay, (and such, so far as we know, were not of our religious Society), we deprecate the effect. It does not promote the cause of peace on earth and good will to men, but it sets it back in the house of its would-be friends.

City and State, in a recent issue, alludes to the stir caused by a late Fast-Day proclamation in which Governor Rollins, of New Hampshire, asserted a serious decline in religious interest in that State. When the proclamation was issued these assertions were warmly disputed, but the Governor has recently reaffirmed them, defending his position before the Congregational Ministers' Union, presenting the subject more pointedly than before. This asserted decline in religious interest is attributed by the Governor to several causes. "Many of the clergy," he says, "follow the religion of the newspapers, thereby becoming no longer spiritual guides of the people." The question of amusing the people, so as to attract them to "join the church," the Governor considers peculiarly damaging. There is too much attention to this, he believes, "too many candy-pulls, too little straight gospel, too many 'Endeavorers' and too little real endeavor among the young people." It would not be amiss were some among the professing Society of Friends seriously to consider the Governor's points. They are of vital interest to all professing Christians.

The Employment of Indians for "Wild West" Shows.

There was published, a few weeks ago, a statement that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, W. A. Jones, had issued an order prohibiting the taking of Indians from their reservations for "Wild West Show" and similar purposes. It was further stated, a few days later, that a prominent promoter of these shows was on his way to Washington to have, if possible, the alleged order rescinded. A Friend, who has been, for many years, concerned as to the demoralizing effects of the shows on the Indians, thus drawn into this life on the road and on exhibition, as well as their frequent pernicious educational effects on the youthful attenders, concluded a renewed remonstrance to the Commissioner, as follows:

"If there be any propriety and manner of use in showing the rougher, and, as we hope, the nearly vanished life of the frontier Indian, with its scalping raids, robbing the overland mail coach, and the like, there would be the same use in realistically perpetuating the traditions of the volunteer fire department of some of our cities, when the service became so greatly demoralized through bitter rivalries, often resulting in bloody encounters between the factions, that it needed to be superseded by the organized paid fire department, as we know it to-day, in which efficiency and humaneness in the service are the characteristics that count. 'Let the time past suffice,' is a good Scripture motto, I believe, in the matter of uncommendable Indian ways, as well as those of the whites, and it can hardly be profitable for the actors in the scenes, and the witnesses, to revert to them."

In his response (12 mo., 28th, 1899,) to the foregoing representation, the Commissioner says, that "while there has been no direct order issued by the Bureau, I have fully determined that no permit will be given by this office (permitting Indians to attend exhibitions similar to the Wild West Show and others) as long as I am connected with it, and I feel sure the Secretary will uphold me in the matter."

It is further gratifying to know that the Superintendent of Indian Schools, Estelle Reed, is in full accord with the above-indicated humane policy.

MOTHERS-IN-LAW.—I have often listened with pain to charges against fathers and mothers-in-law, and wished the accusers could put themselves in the place of the accused, believing that, could they feel the difficulty of the situation, they would be forced to excuse, where they were actually eager to condemn; and would acknowledge that they had often been led into unreasonable expectations, by the influence of painful competition, the result of which was, as usual, unjust and ungenerous detraction.—Amelia Opie.

Extract of a letter to his cousin, Elizabeth Wilson—no date— . . . . "I have many times thought about thee and wondered how thee feels, knowing that thee once had a good home of thy own, and could have the pleasure of entertaining thy friends, and, above all, a companion to share with thee in (may I not say) domestic felicity. I believe thee to be of a happy disposition, and that thee tries to make the best of everything, and I hope thee will get along well and enjoy life. But, as I said, I have often thought of thee and others that are left; and it seems to me you must spend many a lonesome hour, and feel many a time as though you hardly knew what to do; and, as these things have been brought before my mind, I write them not knowing but they may meet thee in a lonely state, and may remind thee that there is one who feels sympathy for thee, and would encourage thee to look on the bright side. Look within to that Monitor that can say to the troubled soul, 'Peace be still.' I don't write this way thinking that thee don't know where to look for help, or that thee is destitute of means, or a home, for I am aware that thee has all these and is bountifully provided for. I, too, have great cause to be thankful for the many favors bestowed upon me, a poor little one. I tell thee it feels very good to think that now, in the . . decline of life, I am favored with such good health, a comfortable home, a kind companion and plenty of the necessaries of life. And many a time I have to admire and rejoice at our present situation, though we have nothing whereof to boast."

Diary, Sixth Month 11th, 1872.—"Oh! thou great and eternal One, who inhabiteth eternity, who dwelleth in the high and holy place, be pleased to look down on me a poor, weak worm of the dust, and with thy loving kindness and tender mercy, help. Yea, grant that the touches of thy love may more and more warm and animate my heart, yea, fill me with thy love! Oh, be round about me, and guard me from the evils of this vain world! Grant that thy life-giving presence may more and more be my delight; for thou, oh Holy Father, art worthy to be praised, to be waited for, to be honored and adored, both now and forever, for thou art . . my comfort and my exceeding great reward."

Fifth Month 25th, 1873.—"Having passed through the winter and spring in much bodily pain and sufferings, and being often much retired, I have had large opportunity to look over my past life. My many omissions and commissions have been all apparently brought to view, and, to use my dear departed brother's expressions, 'Have been repented and re-repented of.' And I have to believe that He who first gave me to feel the sweet incomes of his love is still round about me; though He, at times, hides his face from me as it were, thereby letting me feel leanness and poverty, which are, no doubt, for my good, as they have taught me to feel my dependence and utter inability; and to realize that all our good must come from Him; that of ourselves we can do nothing; that it is only as He is pleased to manifest himself to us that our hearts can be warmed with the influence of his love, and that our peace may flow as a river. Oh, this river of the water of life that ran out on the right side! which at first was to the ankles, then to the knees, then to the loins, and then, as there was still a measuring kept up, it became a river to swim in. Oh, what instruction! So, oh Holy Father, guide me aright! Teach me to measure all my ways and guard all my thoughts, so that I may drink of, and swim in this river, and ever praise and magnify thy ever worthy name."

Second Month 1st, 1874, First-day.—"It has been on my mind for some days to add something to my diary, and the questions arose in my mind, 'What would I write for? Would I leave something on record that some coming after me would think I had been a religious person?' With these thoughts I have postponed writing; but this morning in a portion, I trust of true stillness, it arose in the clearness, 'What did many hundreds of worthies pen their feelings and experiences, for, but that, those coming after, might take courage; and that they might be a means of inducing others to follow them, as they followed Christ?'"

"And, knowing from my own experience, that the reading of the Lord's dealing with his dependent children, as they have left it on record, has many a time been the source of much comfort to me, and when I have been almost ready to despair, almost ready to conclude that I had never known any good, in reading some of the accounts of others I would find that I was not the only one that had been proved and tried; and then light would spring up and I could again take comfort and abound. And, although I believe that He, with whom we have to do, is able to carry on his own work, and dispenses his stripping or aboundings at his pleasure; yet He knows our frailty, and has in all ages used instrumental means, has raised up and qualified valiants for his cause, that have spoken great things for his ever excellent name.

"And may I not (a little one) throw in my mite, though I can in self abasedness say, What good have I ever done! I am an unprofitable servant, if a servant I may be called.'"

Seventh Month 29th, 1874.—"At meeting to-day a thought arose in my mind, 'How can we be edified or benefited by thus coming together in silence?' While musing on the subject I looked over the meeting, and, seeing several very drowsy, it very forcibly came to my mind that under the law the offering had to be prepared, and that without spot or blemish. And that if we would at all times through the week watch and pray and so prepare an offering, we might meet and offer acceptably; and might (spiritually) eat of his flesh and drink of his blood, and thus be edified and built up by coming together and sitting in silence. And oh, may I continue worthy of his regard, and may his everlasting arm of power keep, support and comfort me in my old age, that as the outward man faileth, 'the inward man may be renewed day by day!'"

Second Month 26th, 1875,—"This day I am sixty-nine years old. . . How many of the few that have come up to this age have lately been called from works to rewards! I oft think that my turn will most likely come soo and my daily concern is to live so that if t call should come suddenly, I may have nothi to do but to bear the pains and frailties of th earthly tabernacle; and to praise and magni his most worthy name who has been my st and staff from my childhood unto this da Therefore, 'Bless the Lord, oh, my soul, a all that is within me bless his holy name!

It seems that the ever-bu Adversary is permitted to follow with his vices and insinuations, trying to divert and tangle the mind even to old age. But I ha found, I trust by living experience, that the is power above his power that sometimes a mates, comforts and strengthens the droopi soul, giving a comfortable hope that I am cast off, but that He who was my morning lig is still round about and will be my 'eveni song.'"

Second Month 11th, 1877.—"Oh, thou et nal fountain of goodness, thou whom my so loveth, be pleased to be round about me now the evening of my days: thanksgiving a praise be given to thy ever-worthy and exc lent name! Oh, thou who hast watched o me all my life long, . . following me wi thy rod and thy staff! Oh, continue to foll me to the end of my days; for in thy life-givi presence there is peace! . . Therefore, thee, oh, Holy Father, do I look, and on th do I cast my all! Then, oh, then, comfort sustain me, uphold me by the right hand of power; and enable me more and more to pra and adore thee, under all thy chastenings, u all that is within me that is contrary to will be done away; and thou alone exalted, whom be praises forever and forever more, sa my soul."

yman Beecher was regarded as a great cher, but full of individualities and eccen- ties. His peculiar habits are seen in his hod of preparing sermons, as illustrated in ie Fields' "Life and Letters of Harriet cher Stowe" L. Beecher's daughter. She : "If he was to preach in the evening he to be seen all day talking with whoever ld talk, accessible to all, full of everybody's rs, business, and burdens, until an hour or before the time; when he would rush up his study—which he always preferred ld be the topmost room of the house—and, wing off his coat; after a swing or two with dumb-bells to settle the balance of his mus- , he would sit down and dash ahead, mak- quantities of hieroglyphic notes on small bed bits of paper about as big as the palm is hand. The bells would begin to ring, and he would write. They would toll loud and r, and his wife would say, 'He will certainly ate,' and there would be running up and n strings of messengers to see that he was hed, until, just as the last stroke of the bell dying away, he would emerge from the study i his coat very much awry, and come down stairs like a hurricane, stand impatiently, esting while female hands that ever lay in adjusted his cravat and settled his coat ar, calling loudly the while for a pin to fasten ther the stubbed little bits of paper afore- , which being duly dropped into the crown is hat, and hooking wife or daughter like a hel on his arm, away he would start on such ce through the streets as left neither brain breath until the church was gained. Then came the process of getting in through crowd- ed aisles wedged up with heads, the bustle, the stir, and hush to look at him, as, with a matter- of-fact, business-like push, he elbowed his way through them and up the pulpit stairs.—Relig- ious Telescope.

Judge Kindly.

"And above all these things, put on charity" (Colos- sians iii: 14.)

One of the most important accessories to human happiness is to be found in a charitable judgment of those with whom you are brought into contact.

To be kindly rather than harsh in criticism is an imperative duty which we most easily neglect. Charity may seem to be an insig- nificant virtue, but it is very wide in its re- sults and has a great deal to do with making your life sweet, fragrant and smooth.

A small vice may change the whole com- plexion of a character. The habit of finding a good motive wherever it is possible to do so is one of the noblest peculiarities of a true soul, and the habit of attributing a bad motive, or of searching for a bad motive, or of suspect- ing that an ordinary act may have a bad mo- tive behind it, is just as discordant with the nature of things as a false note.

It is so much better to look on the bright side that I am inclined to say you cannot live a beautiful life without doing so. The most hateful and exasperating thing I know of is the tendency to see evil where you may just as well see good. Its effect on yourself is spiritually depressing, and its effect on others is disastrous. To cultivate suspicion is to force the heart, the affections, to take slow poison.

In the first place, it is unchristian to judge people harshly. There is religion in confidence, but none in suspicion. I do not care what your creed is, or how earnest you are in your as- pirations, or how diligent you may be in the performance of your duties, if you are a fault- finder, or if you seek for the faults rather than for the virtues of your neighbors, you are as far removed from true religion as the stars are from the earth.

In the second place, you cannot afford to condemn, for the reactive influence in your own soul is as unfortunate as it is powerful. To cultivate the spirit of criticism is to dis- courage the upward tendency of mankind. To denounce a sinner is to give him a push along the downward path. He needs a helping hand instead of a curse. That is what God gives him, and that is what Christ has promised him. Are you greater than they, that you dare to refuse it?

In the third place, we are largely the result of circumstance and environment. I do not know what I should have been had I been born in different surroundings. When I see what temptations beset half the world I wonder that they are as good as they are. I do not blame as much as I pity. It is possible that if I had been rocked in another cradle and been nursed in another mother's arms I should not be what I am now. Temptations are strong and the power of resistance is weak.

And so I come back to the Christ. He is my philosopher, my guide, my revelation. Two duties lie before us—to be generous in our judgment of our friends and to be kindly and helpful to all the world. Herein we find a hard task, but it is a task on which the growth of the soul depends. Look for the good side in the character of your neighbors, and as far as possible make excuse for their weaknesses. Cultivate a spirit of love, judge gently rather than harshly, make the kindliness of your own soul felt by all, and you will soon discover that you have entered upon a new and higher life. As to this seething world, which throbs with sorrow and guilt and remorse, be a noble in- fluence, give of word and thought and deed into the great treasury of virtue, and so spend your days that not one of them will accuse you of neglect. That is the holy life to live, the only true life, the only Christian life.

G. H. Hepworth.

Ninth Month 24th, 1892.—Attended the Meeting of Ministers and Elders of our Yearly Meeting, which I felt to be a time of close searching of heart, in which perhaps all felt the great responsibility which rests upon this body. Afterward the Yearly Meeting for busi- ness, which I thought was a remarkably fa- vored season throughout, in which I felt that a great responsibility rested on me, a poor, un- worthy creature, there having been so many standard bearers removed by death since our last meeting, from works to rewards.

After Yearly Meeting, my two nephews, Wil- liam and Isaac C. Milhous came home with us and we had a very satisfactory visit with them.

Eleventh Mo. 24th—was our Quarterly Meet- ing, held at Chesterfield, which I believe was owned by the Great Head of the church, in which I was engaged in testimony.

First Month 1st, 1893.—Another year has passed over and I have been spared still, I hope in mercy. It may be that my Heavenly Father has more service for even poor me, in his milit- tant church, and in the world as well as in my own little family. To-day in our little meeting I struggled for a little life and hope. Before it closed was favored to feel a little evidence of it. May I be for the future more earnestly engaged to be found in a state of acceptance. I know "the way of man is not of himself. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps."

Second Month 12th.—At our little meeting to-day, I was brought under much exercise of mind, and the necessity seemed laid upon me to testify that I was very sensible that the time of my sojourn here could not be long, and the desire I felt for myself and all of us that we might be brought to see and feel the ne- cessity of being wholly redeemed from all our sins, before we are prepared for an inheritance in the kingdom of heaven, and that no mere profession of religion will avail us in that solemn day, when brought to appear before the just Judge of all the earth, but we must be clothed with the white robe which is the right- eousness of the saints.

Sixth Month 4th.—I think it may be right for me to leave on record for my dear relatives and friends to read after I have passed away from works to rewards, a little account of my deep exercises and trials of late. My dear companion in life has been at Columbus for near eight weeks, at a surgical hotel for the treatment of a cancer on the forehead. The separation has been a great trial to me. Besides I have been brought under great exercise that I might be favored to experience the great work of the salvation of my soul fully accomplished, so that nothing might remain within me, contrary to the Divine will. So low have I been at seasons that it seemed as though I might sink under the mighty waters, as it were. But through all I have been sustained and still enabled to trust in that Almighty Power, which has been with me from my childhood unto this day. And I would encourage all to put their trust in the Lord through all the trials that may be permitted to come upon them, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.

(A letter from my father to my dear mother, while she was at Columbus):

"First-day eve.

"My Beloved Rachel:—As our dear Martha is writing to thee, I feel like embracing the opportunity of sending a few lines from my own hand, as I believe it will be acceptable and I know not but as a little means by the way of strengthening thy hands, which may have been similar to my own, at times ready to hang down and thy feeble knees to smite together. But, my dear, let me say, put thy trust still in that Almighty Arm that has hitherto sustained thee (which I do fully believe thou dost). Thou knowest my aptitude at seasons to get very low, but I have interceded much when lying upon my bed and at other seasons when engaged about my lawful business, that my faith may not fail, and I have reason to believe that my feeble petitions have been heard and answered by Him 'who slumbereth not, and whose ear hath not grown heavy that He cannot hear.'

"And I humbly trust that his sustaining arm of Almighty Power is still underneath for my support, even mine. I know thy quiet, trusting spirit, and my belief has been, since thou hast been separated from us, that if thy natural life should be taken away, and we should no more meet in mutability, that doubtless thou would be gathered into the fold of everlasting rest with the redeemed of the Lord Jesus Christ. I believe also that thou hast interceded for me and our dear Martha, that we may be preserved in the faith of the Lord Jesus unto the end. We know very well, both of us, that the shadows of evening are lengthened out and the night cannot be far off, but if thou might be cured of painful disease, by means appointed by the great Creator, put into the hands of skilful men or women, it will be a favor. I do much desire thou may in time return to us, well and in peace. I desire that our trials and separations for a season, may only be a means, through holy help, of uniting us more in love, even that love which emanates from our Father in Heaven, the Fountain of all goodness. May all praise be ascribed unto Him. Amen. The roses and pinks are in bloom, showing forth the wonderful works of 'the Lord, God Almighty.' They are indeed 'great and marvellous.' . . In very much love to thee I remain, thy affectionate husband, ROBERT MILHOUS."

(Soon after this letter was written my dear mother returned home, apparently cured, but it proved to be only a temporary relief, as will appear from the following memoranda.)

"Second Month 10th, 1894.—Since the previous date on this sheet, it has been my lot to pass through deep conflicts of mind and great poverty of spirit, and yet, I believe, sustained through all by that Almighty Arm of Power, which has watched over me for good, even from my childhood to this day. Blessed be the name of the Lord. The dear partner of my life, who was a true helpmeet and sympathized with me in my trials and exercises was taken out of time at Columbus, Ohio, on the second instant, where she had been about four weeks, being treated the second time for the renewed appearance of cancers on the face. My dear daughter Martha was with her at the time of her death, as was also her daughter, Louisa W. Stedman, and they brought her home a corpse, and I met them at Malta in the evening, feeling much broken down in mind. But may truly acknowledge, with humble thankfulness, that strength and favor from on high were mercifully extended, even to poor me, and a precious feeling of resignation to the Divine will was felt, which I hope may continue to prevail until all my will is laid low, and the Lord's will be done, even as it is in heaven. The funeral of the dear departed one took place at our graveyard, on the Fifth instant, about noon, largely attended. In the meeting-house, the coffin was opened for all present to look upon, and the precious canopy of heavenly love, was we believe, in a remarkable manner, spread over the assembly, under a feeling of which I was brought upon my knees, and as I believed, enabled to ascribe thanksgiving and living praises unto the Father and the Son, therefor and for his mercies to his poor dependent creatures.

"May we continue to look to the Lord, day by day, for counsel, direction and preservation, and if we do rightly, I believe He will abundantly care for us and comfort us."

Fourth Month 15th, 1894.—This day I have reached my eighty-third year, through mercy, and there yet remains a precious hope that I am not forsaken, and at meeting to-day I believed I was called upon to express my belief that all who are truly brought under the baptizing power of the Holy Ghost, feel often strong desires for the salvation of their fellow-beings, but that "no man can redeem his brother or give to God a ransom for his soul," with a solemn warning to us all to be engaged, each one for ourselves to see to our own accounts—how they are in the sight of Him who sees us just as we are.

"HOW DOES the past affect the future?" It warns by its mistakes. It encourages by its successes. Its character grows into the character of the future, for we build block by block. But, chiefly, the past makes us understand God's working, so that we grow to know Him better and trust Him more as the years go by. This is brought out so finely in that beautiful poem of Helen M. Williams, beginning, "While Thee I seek, Protecting Power," particularly in the last verse:

"When gladness wings my favored hour,
Thy love my thoughts shall fill;
Resigned when storms of sorrow lower,
My soul shall meet Thy will.
My lifted eye, without a tear,
The gathering storms shall see;
My steadfast heart shall know no fear,
That heart shall rest on Thee."

Brooding Over Evil.

"Became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened" (Romans i: 21.)

The imagination plays a more important part in our lives than we are apt to believe. I dare to say that if you could give me control of your imagination I could make you happy or miserable at will. To curb and train the imaginative faculty, therefore, is just as necessary as to discipline a wild horse fresh from the prairies before you can hope to make him useful. I do not overstate the truth when I say that until you have your imagination well in hand you cannot be religious in any high sense.

We brood more than we are aware of, and we reason impartially less than we think we do. A perfectly fair view of any subject in which prejudice may possibly affect our judgment is one of the most difficult accomplishments of human nature, because prejudice is strong and domineering, while reason is weak and fickle. A prejudice gets possession of us at once, while reason comes lagging on behind. Prejudice may even indulge in a coup d'Etat and so entirely capture the reason that entire fairness is out of the question. This is only another way of saying that we feel more quickly than we can think, and that the feeling may do great injustice to friend or foe before reason can come to the rescue and set things right.

Now, prejudice has no place in a true man's life, and a mere impression as a substitute for calm and sound judgment may be followed by consequences which we will later on regret. And prejudice is the offspring of imagination. We dream of circumstances which may or may not be true, we imagine motives which may or may not exist, and on the strength of these vain imaginings we make our decision on very important subjects, and frequently the decision is not only discreditable to ourselves, but unfair to others and will not stand the test of reasonable survey.

The Christian rule is to make light of trouble so far as it may be done, and to dwell constantly on the brighter side of life. It is better to be cheerful than gloomy, and if we properly discipline ourselves we can always find good cheer and nearly always avoid the gloom. Loving your neighbor as yourself means that you should judge him as kindly as you would like to be judged. Keep a check on your tendency to imagine something wrong, and search for what is good until you find it. Be slow to condemn, as you certainly will be if you allow your reason to have full play instead of your prejudice.

I am not speaking of a small, but of a very grave duty. There is no religion in doing injustice to any one; neither is there any religion in cherishing a mere prejudice until it warps the judgment.

I say, therefore, never brood over the ills of life, because you thereby multiply them. Live through to-day, and let the morrow take care of itself. Imagine no evil, and thereby diminish evil. If there is sweetness anywhere, find it as the honey-bee does. Be a friend to mankind, do a kindness wherever opportunity offers, be quiet, calm, self-possessed and self-controlled, and then you will discover the very essence of Christianity.—G. H. Hepworth.

WHEN WORK IS DONE.

It is as if the world were glad:
Whether in light or darkness clad,
The hour is never dull or sad
When work is done.

The very voices in the street
Are turned to notes more soft and sweet;
We love all things we chance to meet
When work is done.

The gentle music of the breeze,
The tender whisper of the trees,
And every sound has power to please
When work is done.

Upon each dear familiar face
Rests some new trait of winsome grace,
And joy lights up the old home-place
When work is done.

Life's tumult suddenly grows still,
And love and gladness and good-will Comes with their peace the heart to fill
When work is done.

But when the hours of labor close,
And earth is wrapped in sweet repose,
And all things sleep—alas for those
With work undone.

Oh, kind Taskmaster, let thy rest
Be to tired workers manifest
And unto all who do their best,
Say thou "Well done!"

Our Educational Inheritance.

BY RACHEL C. WICKERSHAM.

f we would unbolt every door in our onward gress, if we would ascend every stair that s to something higher and nobler, we must pare ourselves for the work by education. at then we ask is education? To-day it is arded not as something acquired from books ; not something gained in a few short rs of school life; rather is it the combined lt of experience, observation, and study ed in the long journey from early child- d to old age. We must not, however, con- e from this definition that we reap nothing n the experience of our ancestors. Far n it. We find that with no two nations of quity has the theory or practice of educa- been the same, and from them we are nering the good and rejecting the evil to n our standard of education.

ll the oriental countries had incomplete ems of education; each laid stress upon e phase of human culture to the neglect of rs. In China and India the traditional and e systems produced principally a develop- t of the memory; in Persia the preparation he individual for state service led to a sical training; while the sole object of the rew law was to make faithful and obedient ants of God who should fulfill the Divinely ointed mission of the Jewish people.

gypt, perhaps the oldest civilization in the ld, was much in advance of the oriental ntries, so much in advance that even the eks received learning from her. Many of studies of the education of to-day formed of the Egyptian education and many things baffle the learned of to-day were well mas- d in the valley of the Nile.

ext we turn to Greece and Rome. These iest representatives of European civiliza- to whom we are indebted for many nces, for works of merit in poetry, history, oratory, and philosophy, and who have left us a rich legacy in sculpture and art have thrown around themselves a peculiar charm. Greece, who produced such men as Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle might well be called the mother of philosophy; while Rome claims as her heroes such men as Seneca, Quintilian and Cicero. These were the first countries that partially recognized the importance of the individual and encouraged his development. But the education of even these more civilized nations lacked in principle, for the object of the one was but to develop to the beautiful Greek, that of the other only to make the practical Roman.

Turning from these ideas of pagan countries, it is delightful to consider the beautiful characteristics of Christianity and note its influence on education. By teaching that every person is a child of God, that in his sight all men are equal, it swept away the distinctions of class and caste that so marked the oriental education and attached much importance to the individual. Yet we find, even in early Christian educators, an incompleteness, for they often lost sight of the intellect in the uplifting of their morals and religion.

But, before education had received the improvement Christianity was capable of producing, the world was plunged into the darkness and superstition of the Middle Ages. Then, everything which led to a higher and a nobler life, was lost amid the surrounding clouds of ignorance. Education was either that of the cloister or of the castle, each very different from the other. To the monasteries are we indebted for keeping alive the small spark of learning during the dark ages, but the discipline was so hard and the rod ruled with a severity so impartial that educators are yet struggling against some erroneous ideas that were then implanted. In sharpest contrast with this training stood that of the young knight. In his castle were sown the seeds of chivalry, the fruit of which has appeared in the uplifting of woman and the purification of society. We must not, therefore, look wholly with disfavor on this often despised age; for, although it has taught us little that we should do, it has taught us many things that we should avoid, and, perhaps, during that time there were silent forces at work which produced their effect in subsequent years. This thought we choose to entertain, for ever since those gloomy days education has kept pace with the purification of religion and has had at its head noble and resolute men. Greatest among these, whether considered in connection with Church or State, was Martin Luther. His work for the education of the peasants, and for compulsory education, was a decided step in advance of his age; and had his many liberal ideas been put into practice, the schools of the sixteenth century would stand as models for those of our own day. Advancing to the eighteenth century, we find the Frenchman Rousseau, whose Emile has exerted more influence on education than any previous educational book. It taught that child nature should be studied as the basis of all training and that nature should be closely followed. At the beginning of our present century Pestalozzi stepped to the front with the advanced doctrine that "all education should be a natural, progressive and systematic development of all the powers and faculties of the human being," his principles coming haply at a time which was ready to receive them from the foundation for the primary schools of to-day. Thus Pestalozzi may be honored as the founder of modern pedagogics.

All these reformers and many more did their work well, although much of their teaching, especially that of the earlier ones, often seemed to be lost on the ignorant multitude. But let us believe like the German philosopher, that God is leading the world through a gradual, though not uninterrupted, development to greater intelligence, freedom and goodness. "If merely existing once satisfied the loftiest ideas, it will do so no longer; for, from all past experiences, we have gleaned help by which we have risen to a higher plane. Ignorance is now a greater disadvantage than ever before. To leave a child uneducated is to leave him almost helpless, for it is the man with developed faculties that every profession is now demanding. The constantly growing division of labor is compelling a more careful training for every position of life, and is so raising the standard of requirements that a constant call is heard for abler men to cope with the vexing questions presented on all sides. So truly have we learned the aphorism of Lord Bacon that "Knowledge is power." To-day a good education is recognized as the foundation of good government and good citizenship; for, with educated citizens—yes, educated to be as truly serviceable to the State as ever the old Persians, Grecians and Romans were—with such citizens good government is not only possible, but it is demanded. The education of the poorer classes and of women, modern developments of the grand old principles of Christianity working their leaven down through the ages, are constantly narrowing the field of ignorance and prejudice. Co-education, compulsory education, industrial education, free libraries, university extension courses, Chautauquan courses—these and like systems come crowding upon us with a quickness, and are received with a welcome that would have warmed the hearts of the old reformers. They, with much labor, sowed the seed; we, after many settings of the sun, are reaping the harvest.

Thus we see that each successive generation has inherited the accumulated wisdom of the preceding one, that in education as in other department, we are truly,—"Heirs of all the ages in the foremost files of time," and as a result we may enjoy an education that developes the physical, the intellectual, and the moral facilities and helps us to perform our duty to our neighbor, to our country, and to our God.

A "Slander Book"—At your family table, allow no detraction. Teach your children to speak well of others. Show them the difference between a bee and a wasp—the one gathering honey, the one thrusting a sting. I read of a family where they kept what they called a "Slander Book," and when any slanderous words were uttered in the house about anybody, or detraction uttered, it was all put down in this book. The book was kept carefully. For the first few weeks, there were a great many entries; but after awhile there were no entries at all. Detraction stopped in that household. It would be a good thing to have a slander book in all households.

Thomas Paine.

After William Hinsdale's family began to visit him, which was a few weeks previous to his death, (they being near neighbors at Greenwich, N. Y.), he was much engaged in writing, which he performed with great difficulty, bolstered up in bed, with something placed before him to rest his paper on, his shoulders also being stiff, so that he could not move them, which, together with what Mary Rasco saw, convinced her beyond a doubt that he was spending his little remaining strength to leave behind him a proof of his abhorrence of those principles which he had much of his life been endeavoring to inculcate.

This circumstance occasioned Mary Rasco to be less careful to preserve or remember what she saw and heard; but what became of the manuscript has not been fully ascertained, but it is reported and believed that it was sent to a certain printer in this city (N. Y.) since deceased, and, while preparing for the press, was purchased at a considerable expense by some of Paine's former friends, and suppressed.

The first time Mary Rasco saw him, she was going from meeting, and, when opposite the house where he resided, she asked a lad who was with her if he knew Paine? He replied, "Yes." She then asked a description of his person, not knowing that she had even seen him. He asked "if she had ever seen the devil," telling her he looked like him. A voice from the door replied, "If he only looked like him, it would do." She then perceived that the identical person was at the door (which before was hid from their view by trees) and had heard the conversation. During the time of Paine's illness, Mary Rasco was unwell, and the physician who attended him was called to her. She asked how Paine was. He replied, "Very ill; we (meaning the physicians) think we have never before seen such a suffering object," but he tells me to-day (added he) "that his bodily distress is nothing compared to that of his mind." When she had recovered, she went to see him, and in another apartment found a French woman, who had accompanied him from France, in great distress, wringing her hands, and lamenting "that she had forsaken her husband, her friends and her religion to embrace the principles of Paine, that she had spent three years in following him, but now he told her those principles would not stand and charged her not to build upon them," and "now," says she "I have none to look to!"

There was a statement in one of the papers a few weeks previous to his death that two clergymen went to see him, and that he had sent for a clergyman who came attended by an elder, and supposing Paine wished him to proceed in their usual manner, proposed prayer. Paine told him "he did not send for him to pray, as he did not conceive that any form of prayer, invented by man, could avail, but that his motive in sending for him was for the relief of his own mind, to correct an error which he supposed him (the priest) to be in, and then asked him if he thought he was authorized by Christ to preach;" this so offended the priest that he withdrew.

Paine remarked that he preferred the "priest much, to himself, but feared his being in an error might be an injury to others." The last visit she made him, on entering the door she perceived him to be in supplication, and turned to go out, she mostly found him engaged in prayer or writing, but his nurse spoke to him, and said, "There was a friend from Mr. Hinsdale come to see him." He paused and asked her to come in and come near to him, saying, "I hope you are a friend to God and to Christ," and, after another pause, asked her "if she had ever read any of Paine's writings?" She replied, "She had, when she was very young, and did not know better." He queried what she thought of the book? She said, "Dost thou really wish to know what I thought?" He replied, "I trust you are one who has really bought the truth and would not sell it to please such a vagabond as I am." She then told him she thought it was in effect more like a serpent than anything she had ever read; that for days after perusing it she could not think a good thought, but some of his reasoning would twine around and repel it; and, seeing the other children of the family eager to take it up, she could find no peace till she had committed it to the flames.

He then made an exclamation denoting the horror of his mind, saying, "It would have been better for my poor soul, at the present day, if all the world had, like you, destroyed them, but the world was glad to have it so." Adding, "If Satan ever had an instrument on earth to lead into the ways of darkness I have been one. I have passed many sleepless nights in endeavoring to prevent the right way."

When she took her leave of him, he requested her to ask Mr. Hinsdale to come and see him, saying, "I love to have him by me, for when he sits by my side, although he says very little, it seems as though the devil himself was silenced, and I feel as though I could do nothing but pour out my soul in prayers and tears before God."

At a certain time when some of the family were there, one of Paine's former friends and adherents came, and, opening the door, called out roughly, "Paine, I have heard five lies about you! one is, that you were dead, and another, that you have recanted and turned Quaker! As you have lived like a man, I hope you will die like one!"

When he had closed the door, Paine said, "You see how I have lived; this has been my heaven! These, my friends, can do nothing but afflict me!"

He wished W. Hinsdale to obtain permission for his interment in Friends' ground. W. Hinsdale let him know he hardly thought it probable it would be granted, stating his reasons, and, on applying, found the sentiments of Friends, as he expected, of which he informed Paine, with the necessary explanations; he was affected by the refusal, "but thought it just afterwards leaving directions to be interred his own farm at New Rochelle, giving the fi by will for a place of interment for p strangers.

The Kindness of Two Noted Men.

Finiguerra, the master of early engravi had acquired a singular keen eye and delic touch. Being a kindly man, he sometim placed both his sure hand and his fine tools the service of his friends and neighbors, performing for them some of the simpler ope tions of surgery, until he acquired a repu tion for skill in doctoring their hurts.

One day a poor laundress, in wringing ou garment in which a needle had been careles left, ran it deeply into her hand, a part maining embedded in the flesh. She was much pain, and stopped at the house of t artist. Entering his studio, she hastily down her wet and heavy bundle, begging assistance. Finiguerra, after long and de cate manipulation, extracted the broken need The woman thanked him and turned to lifting her bundle from its resting place.

Then he saw that she had set it upon one his engravings. Like all others at that ti it was a plate of engraved metal, complete itself, and regarded as a single and sufficie picture, exactly as if it had been a painting

But as the damp bundle was raised, Fi guerra saw that it had received an impress from the engraved picture beneath, and quick mind seized at once the suggestion the possibility of indefinite reproduction fr a single original.

If Pennsylvania is still in some sense a monument of Penn's "Holy Experiment." I think Friends' influence in the proper establishment of the Doukhobortsi may at some time be a monument of their concern and labors on their behalf.—D. S.

I have observed through life that men of equal intelligence and equal integrity, frequently take diametrically opposite views of the same subject, owing to each one giving the more weight to one collection of facts than the other.

To my mind, the President would have kept us out of the war if he could have had his own way, but the military spirit of the country, in which I think the abominable boy's brigade system has had a large share, swept him into the war, and the Nation is reaping as it sowed.

Missionaries are so vigorous in their assertions that those who had not contact with Christian professors had no light and no Divine grace, that I feel the need of closer acquaintance on my own account with those who know not Christ's name or historic appearance. The sacred books of other peoples from which my knowledge comes, show earnest thoughtfulness and nearness to God,—as near as my own small enlightenment enables me to judge. The rules of righteousness even among uncivilized people, seem to show a laying hold on the Rock that is higher than we.

After his extensive service in the west already noted in our columns. Benjamin P. Brown reached his home in Woodland, N. C., on the twenty-third of Twelfth Month, accompanied by Oscar Bundy, a Friend from Ohio, who after very acceptably spending several days with Friends in the vicinity, started for his home on First Month 1st. Though somewhat worn by his labors, Benj. P. Brown is reported as remarkably upheld in health and peace of mind.

Our friend Inazo Nitobe having, with his family spent several months in these parts, and now returning alone with health in good measure restored, to the scene of his arduous labors in Japan, has left behind him in well-written English, as a fruit of his industry and discerning thought while among us, a recently published book entitled "Bushido; The Soul of Japan, An Exposition of Japanese Thought." The author tells us what the leading precepts are which form the morals and religion of his countrymen. "We feel," it has been said, "as though we were led by a native guide through the hitherto unknown labyrinths of the Far Eastern mind. To every point he makes, he brings a European fact for comparison, so that we are brought nearer to the people on whom we have looked as wholly different from ourselves." The book is published by the Leeds & Biddle Co., 1019 Market St., Philadelphia. Price 75 cents.

Notes from Others.

President Kruger is said to be so close a student of the Bible that he knows fully half of it by heart.

"We can say of our Bible to-day what was once said to the king of France, who was persecuting Protestants: 'Sire, the Church is an anvil, and it has worn out a great many hammers.' So our Bible has worn out many hammers, and will wear out a great many more."—J. Brown.

THE HOLD OF MODERN CHURCHES ON THE PEOPLE, indicated in the following extract from the Public Ledger's N. Y. Correspondence for Tenth Month 8th, 1899:—J. F. Carson has started a discussion that promises to last some time, by his assertion that one-half of the population of Brooklyn was untouched by the churches. The theme was discussed in a number of the churches to-day. Among other clergymen who made it the subject of their sermons were Dr Hillis, of Plymouth Church, and St. Clair Hester, of the Church of the Messiah. The latter said that religions sometimes died out, but religion endured forever. Faith is indestructible. Christianity is not in its dotage, as some claim, and has not lost its hold on the world.

Dr. Hillis, in his sermon, admitted that there was a lack of attendance in churches. Religion and the churches, he said, were passing out of a critical period into a great creative period. The falling off in church attendance, he decided, was due to the American industrial excess. The people, he said, were now under the constant pressure of creative work. Dr. Kinsolving, in a sermon in Christ Church, Brooklyn, said that the thing which impressed him in modern society was man's weakening sense of responsibility and accountability to God. "Life," he said, "is divided between daily toil and a frantic grabbing after those things which give sensual pleasure." Before the sermon, Dr. Kinsolving spoke of the falling off in pew rentals, and dwelt at some length on the unwillingness of people to contribute to the support of their respective churches. In the Green Avenue Presbyterian Church to-day, D. H. Overton made reference to the falling off in Sunday school attendance. "We must endeavor to stop the leak," he read from this report to the Presbytery, "which is present. We must seize our opportunity and use it or we will lose both opportunity and scholars. It is painfully evident that we are not holding our own, and that we are making no impression on the city's young population."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—The American flour recently seized off Delagoa Bay by British warships has been released. Ambassador Choate had an interview with the Marquis of Salisbury on the 10th instant, and received a verbal reply to the representations of the Washington Government. The British note on this subject was sent later to the United States Embassy. The gist of it was cabled to Washington. In brief, foodstuffs are not considered contraband of war unless intended for the enemy.

For service in Puerto Rico, Cuba, the Hawaiian Islands or the Philippines, nurses receive $50 per month and transportation to and from the United States when on leave of absence. The total leave of absence, with pay, does not exceed one month during the year.

A league has been formed in Maine for the purpose of enforcing the prohibition law.

According to Governor McSweeney's annual message, South Carolina will seem be in a position, not only to manufacture all the cotton grown on her own territory, but to import the growth of other States. Of course, then, she will have none for export. It is encouraging to see such signs of development in the South, the section which needs it more, and has waited for it longer than any other part of the country, and it is gratifying, also, to know that the troubles arising from an overproduction of cotton are likely to be ended in so satisfactory a way. There is no danger that the Carolina mills will create a cotton famine, and the country at large will be glad to see as many as possible of them in operation.

Some of the picturesque features of the cataract at Niagara Falls are slowly disappearing. Recently a large mass of rock close to the Horseshoe Fall gave way. Table Rock and Goat Island are said to be disintegrating.

The Philippines supply the most important part of our fibres, Manila hemp, which in the present year will amount to about $6,000,000 in value.

The demand from South Africa for Oregon wheat and flour has been greater than ever before this season.

Tarbintar, an Indian word, meaning telegraphy without wires, is suggested as the single word that shall designate the new wireless telegraphy. A number of other new words are proposed for the new discovery.

Artificial silks are made of wood fibre, reduced to cellulose by the action of acids. This is dissolved to a glue-like consistency, forced through holes in glass and drawn out into threads, which dry and harden in the air just as those of the silk worm or spider do.

The Water Supply Department of Brooklyn has issued a circular to householders, urging them to make an economical use of water and warning them of the danger of a serious shortage in the supply. "Waste of water under the present circumstances," says the circular, "is almost a criminal act."

A flock of 1,000 turkeys was driven through the streets of Columbia, Mo., recently like a herd of cattle. The turkeys had been collected from a number of localities and were driven to Columbia for shipment.

Over $20,000,000 worth of candy has been manufactured in New York alone since Seventh Month 1st, and the total product of the year in that city will exceed $25,000,000.

Carriers on the free rural delivery route for which West Chester is the distributing centre last year handled 409,654 pieces of mail. The net saving to the Government in the way of fourth-class postmasters' pay, approximates $1,000.

Advices from White Oaks, N. M., in the Sacramento Mountains, 150 miles northeast of El Paso, say that section was swept by a blizzard on the 10th instant, the effects of which were disastrous. Many thousands of head of stock were frozen stiff, and two men were caught in the snow storm and overcome. One was dead when found, but the other revived and may recover.

The object of Archbishop Chapelle's mission to Manila is said to be to select twenty million dollars' worth of property by agreement with President McKinley in settlement of the Churches' claims to land.

There were 504 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 9 less than the previous week and 138 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 260 were males and 244 females: 82 died of pneumonia; 55 of consumption; 53 of heart diseases; 28 of diphtheria; 19 of apoplexy; 15 of debility; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of nephritis; 14 of old age; 13 of peritonitis; 13 of inanition; 12 of uræmia; 11 of cancer; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of bronchitis, and 9 from casualties.

The Gibraltar correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph says: "Three thousand time-expired Spanish soldiers from the Cuban war have offered their services to Great Britain in South Africa."

The underground railway of Paris, which is nearing completion, will have a total length of nearly eight miles. It is expected that it will open for traffic next Sixth Month.

A despatch of First Month 8th from Manila, says: The bubonic plague is yet sporadic. There have been six cases and four deaths. Preparations are being made to establish hospitals and for disinfecting and quarantining.

Great numbers of provincial natives are coming to Manila, with the result that the city is overcrowded, the increase in accommodations being inadequate, and the rice necessary for foodstuffs is more expensive than at any period during the last twelve years. The plague is dangerous to the overcrowded, underfed and unwashed natives and Chinamen. Americans avoiding direct contact with the disease are safe.

The British authorities have released the German steamer Herzog, which was seized First Month 6th while on her way to Lorenzo Marques.

The United States Consul General in Berlin reports that during the last quarter there was exported to the United States from Germany goods valued at $14,770,287, an increase over 1898 of $1,847,802. The figures for last year are $51,138,996, as against, $69,920,847.

An epidemic of influenza has broken out in Berlin, and scores of deaths are reported.

Considerable fear is expressed in the German press that American automobiles will invade Germany, and a higher duty is demanded.

Experiments recently made in Europe with forty-nine different kinds of German, French and Austrian sugar beet seeds show that German seed is by far the best.

Publishers in Finland lose from $6,000 to $10,000 a year due to the suppression of books by the Government.

Russia is devising more liberal inducements for European Russian peasants to settle in various parts of the empire in Asia. Approved parties of peasants possessing a capital of from $100 to $300 are to receive transportation free and grants of land, tax free, for twenty years.

Norway supplied Great Britain with twice as much ground wood pulp last year as the United States, Canada, Sweden and Holland combined.

Latest mail advices from India aver that the situation there grows darker every week. Three million are working on Government relief works. The sale of children by starving parents is becoming common. Families are breaking up, each member for himself, in search of food. Abandoned children are found with frequency. It is a famine of water as well as food. Cattle are dying off by thousands, and no rain is now expected until Sixth Month.

Advices by the steamship Empress, of Japan, arrived at Victoria, B. C., tell of a fierce storm sweeping the Japanese coast on Twelfth Month 24th, by which thirty-five junks were lost while being towed from Osaka to Kobe, and 171 persons perished. A tidal wave accompanied the storm, by which 411 lives were lost.

The gold yield for Victoria Colony in 1899 was 854,500 ounces, an increase of 17,242 ounces over 1898.

Venezuela has vast forests of mahogany and ced which have scarcely yet been touched.

The population of Bolivia is about 1,750,000. T total is divided into 250,000 whites, 5,000,000 half-ca and 1,000,000 domesticated Indians. There are, in ad tion, some 300,000 wild Indians living in the eastern d tricts bordering upon the Brazils and the basin of t Amazon and its confluents.

ITY OF MALE AND FEMALE ATTENDANCE OF ENDS' MEETINGS.—A RELIGION FOR MEN.—IBERS NOT AN INDEX OF TRUTH OR SPIRITUAL-—TRUE INCREASE TO BE WON BY THE SPIRIT THE SPIRITUAL.—THE NEEDED BAPTISM.

e largest Monthly Meeting of Friends in delphia reports, in regard to its numbers, equality of the sexes," its membership ting of 371 males and 371 females; an se of 13 members above losses in the ear.

attendance at meetings for Divine wor--as in Friend's meetings generally,—was ked on as being more nearly equal than rs in other denominations. That a larger ction of men attend Friends' meetings are observable in those of others, was uted to the fact that our worship con- in realities rather than in symbolism, ends itself more directly to the masculine

A passage in "Quaker Strongholds" g afterwards been instanced on this line, d its language as follows:

see by the experience of Roman Catholic ies how inevitably the spread of priestly in- amongst devout women is accompanied by er alienation of thinking men from religion

I fear that a tendency of the same kind is in England now. What is the proportion of ıd women to be seen in the congregations of ı churches? Is it not obvious even to our rd senses that there is something in modern anity which the masculine mind rejects? ve, indeed, abundant proof in the literature day that this is the case. Are we driven to de that it is the essence of the religion of Christ which is rejected by masculine thought; the stumbling-block lie in human additions teaching of Christ himself?

anot doubt, and I believe few of the worthiest ntatives of masculine thought would deny, s own teaching, as we have it in the gospels, nal truth; as secure against every storm of and revolt as the sun in heaven is secure t the whirlwind. The Christianity of Jesus himself is the Christianity upon which Friends alone, or almost alone, have boldly taken their stand as all-sufficient. In preaching this essential Christianity we can appeal with boldness to the witness in every human heart; and I venture to say that it is not a religion for women and children only, but one which appeals to and fortifies the best instincts of manly independence.

Some statistics are added to confirm the writer's observation "that there is not any habitual preponderance of women in Friends' meetings."

Speaking of statistics, we are reminded that the New York Independent has lately given the net gain of the Baptists for the year in this country as 89,201; of the Roman Catholics as 52,123; and of the Lutherans as 40,226. These three bodies which have made the greatest gains during the year have lately been pronounced "those which make most of the external features and practices in religion." In a general way, as religious systems ordinarily run, large numbers and externality go together. Popularity and spirituality appear at opposite poles. But while the higher spirituality presupposes the smaller body of adherents, we cannot equally say on the other hand that the smallness of the body is a sure indication of high spirituality. Unspiritual causes can reduce a church, and unspiritual methods may augment its members.

We would not, however, impeach the spirituality of much of the doctrine and much of the membership of the denominations named,—from the Baptists down. But in proportion as an external banner, tinged with a religious mystery, is held out as a distinctive rallying point in proselytism, there is naturally a flocking that way.

Quakerism, on the contrary, means inwardness and spirituality. It means worshippers in the inner temple and not of the outer court. It means few chosen rather than the many called. But the many called unto Spirit and Truth rather than to symbol and surface are not chosen, because they do not choose it. The world will love its own. Accordingly large numbers or large gains have almost come to be significant of a stopping somewhere short of a religion of the Spirit. But a spiritual and cross-bearing Christianity should not be considered as at fault because not popular. The Holy Spirit is no wise in error because so little submitted to among men. It is men that are in error, while "the Spirit is Truth."

On the other hand, it is no part of spiritual-mindedness to make spirituality unpopular, or to be satisfied with its small acceptance among men as a sign that we are in the Truth. The Spirit of Christ is working to subdue all things unto Himself, and his coadjutors are quickened together with Him to that end. If large numbers are to be gathered, if large gains are to be made, until "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord," it will be by the Spirit's own work directly, and through as many as will co-operate with Him. So may the time advance when a multitudinous number of adherents may be as much an evidence of spirituality, as it is now of worldliness, of outwardness, or of superstition.

If any people, more than other disciples, are to be a factor in the true enlargement of the gospel upon earth, we look for them to be a people who are most actuated by the Spirit of Truth, and moving only as they are thus actuated. If we profess to be that people, we confess that we are watchful and submissive to the Lord of the harvest for the service or the suffering into which he may call us. Such was the Society of Friends in its first espousals. If we will again take faithful care of the obedience and the spiritual surrender, without unduly asking "What shall this man do?" He will take care of the ark and the law and the testimony, along with us. These, filled with his Spirit, will be instruments of his kingdom on earth. But if our eye be withdrawn from Him chiefly unto these, both we and our machinery are left without power.

We have long believed that the principles of spiritual Truth, with the doctrines and testimonies dependent on them, as professed by the Society of Friends from the first—and conserved, though less fulfilled, by bodies known as conservative now—are an ample and the best provision, when faithfully and consistently lived up to, for the true revival work which mankind needs. But in what appears as modern mission meetings, we have never known Friends principle for worship to be consistently tried, at the hands of conductors bearing Friends' name. In the mission work of Fox and Burrough nothing else, as a rule, was tried. And their signal success demonstrates what true successors of them, with the same spirit and freedom from program, might do.

What we want as a people, and what the cause of Truth wants on our part, is not borrowed methods, but the in-filling of the Holy Spirit into the members, and so into the methods that we have. And this baptism of the Spirit is given to those who obey Him—who are surrendered to his will and the doing of it in all its manifestations, little and great.

Other African Fighters.

"When Lord Roberts left London the other day for the seat of war in South Africa, the parting refrain of the Prince of Wales and the others of the distinguished group assembled at the railway station was 'Good luck to you!' Now, it is not with words such as these that the missionaries of the cross, or any who leave their native shores under the Lord's directing hand, are wont to part with their fellows. It is not good luck, but God's love that is the lodestar of their long journey.

"When David Moffat, the Scotch stripling from Fifeshire, along the Firth of Forth, left his native heath, upwards of eighty years ago, for the Cape of Good Hope, and, pushing northward, over mountain and veldt, beyond the Orange River, into Great Namaqualand, went straight to the kraal of the dreaded murderer and marauder, Afrikaner, he showed a degree of intrepidity that not a man of the historic Gordon Highlanders or of the Black Watch, so eloquently descanted upon of late, could have excelled. And what a trophy was here! 'Wolfish rapacity, leonine ferocity, leopardish treachery,' we are told, 'gave way before the meekness and mildness of the lamb or kid.' So that, when Moffatt's life hung in the balance with African fever, the theretofore cruel Namaqua chieftain nursed him most tenderly through the crisis of delirium. When he was obliged to visit Cape Town, Afrikaner went with him, knowing that a price had been set for years upon his own head as an outlaw and a public enemy. 'No marvel' (to quote from a graphic account of the incident) 'that when he made his appearance in Cape Colony the people were astonished at the transformation. It was more wonderful than when Saul, the arch persecutor, was suddenly transformed into Paul the Apostle. The whole road, a distance of six hundred miles, lay through a country which had been laid waste by this robber chief and his retainers. The Dutch farmers could not believe that this converted man was actually Afrikaner, and one of them lifted his hands when he saw him, and exclaimed, 'This is the eighth miracle of the world! Great God, what a miracle of thy power and grace!' There was no drawing back from the ranks of the Master with whom he had enlisted to serve, and it is recorded as a curious coincidence that the reward of £100 which had once been offered for his head as an outlaw was eventually laid out by the Government in offerings of good-will to be bestowed upon himself. But Moffatt went eastward into the land of the Bechuanas, and at Kuruman (the same Kuruman that to-day's paper relates has been the scene of bloody conflict between Briton and Boer) labored forty years to bring the benighted natives to a knowledge of our civilization and the religion of the Prince of Peace.

"In his entertaining book 'How I Crossed Africa,' Major Serpa Pinto, that doughty Portuguese traveller, tells how he met, in the course of his adventurous journey, the French Protestant missionary explorer, Francois Coillard, and listened to his recital of his overcoming a terrible crisis among hostile natives. Confessing that this man possessed a coolness of courage that he could not fathom, Pinto, nevertheless, admitted it was 'a courage and a reliance on Divine protection which I grieve not to call my own.'

"There was quoted in the Ledger several days ago a portion of the New Year's speech of Germany's war lord to his army, wherein the Emperor repeated, with high approval, this saying of Frederick William the First, that 'when one in this world wants to decide something with the pen, he does not do it unless supported by the strength of the sword.' As a single example in refutation of this axiom, the history of this Commonwealth during its first seventy years, under William Penn and his immediate successors, shows quite the contrary. When the founder set forth his purpose of establishing, in the wilderness and among so-called savages, an enlightened colony governed upon Christian principles, there was no reference to sword or gun, and, indeed, during three-score years and ten, neither of these weapons supplanted the constable's staff—that mild instrument of authority. It was a simple staff that was Coillard's companion through the savage wilds of Africa.

"And now as to the 'terrible crisis' that has befallen the south of that country. Had the Christian Queen of England, who had said she would never sign another declaration of war, and the much loved youthful sovereign of Holland, together with their respective chief Ministers of State, been permitted simply to outline a suggested settlement of the British-Boer difficulty, an adjustment might have been reached infinitely more satisfactory than such as can be effected by the cannon of Buller and Joubert."

Several years after Moffatt had appeared at Griqua Town and Kuruman there was for a while a good deal of disturbance growing out of an incursion of the tribe of Mantatees, and subsequently of a horde of evil characters, runaways of mixed blood from Cape Colony, with Korannas, Bushmen and Namaquas. The disastrous effects of strife were at that time so manifest that, when, in 1835, a scientific expedition, under the leadership of Dr. Andrew Smith, reached Kuruman, and went northeastwardly, Moffatt accompanying, to the land of the Matabele, along the upper border of the Transvaal, the worthy Scotch missionary used his utmost persuasion to influence the explorers to lay aside all military tactics. He had previously made a visit to the kraals of that aggressive chief, Mosilikatse, and been received by him in a very friendly manner, and hence was persuaded that now to make an approach which should seem to indicate distrust, might bring about most serious results. Happily, his counsels were heeded. The embassage to the Matabele chief was successful and Moffatt received permission (one object of his journey) to obtain from Mosilikatse's well-wooded lands some fine timber for the roofing of the missionary building at Kuruman, such as could not be had in the latter locality.

The biographer of Robert Moffatt (his son, John S.) thus reviews the situation at Griqua Town preceding his father's arrival there, in 1820. "At an early period, about the year 1799, missionaries made an effort to collect the scattered Bushmen in the northern part of the Colony. They were only partially successful, and they extended their plans so as to include others as well as Bushmen. There were many people of mixed blood, descendants of the Dutch farmers, who had taken to a roving marauding life. The missionaries, Ande and Kramer, spent several years of almos credible hardship following these peopl their wanderings, and at length succeede prevailing upon a large body of them to s down. When once this was accomplished, new village soon became a rallying point members of all the broken tribes. Ande lived to see a large and orderly community, ing great progress in industrious habits, a Christian church formed. Then the governr took a very strange step. An order was to Anderson to furnish twenty Griquas as cruits to the Cape regiment. It might been supposed that these people would been left alone. Anderson had no option to give the message, and the effect was di trous. He at once lost the confidence w he had earned by years of patient labor self-denial." Looked upon as an emissar the interest of the government, he felt at constrained to leave the settlement, while n of the people were scattered to other p There has been a good deal said since the between the British and Boers broke out t tive to the harsh treatment of the native ple by the burghers. An incident, occurrin the first journey of Moffatt from Cape T suggests that Woolman's way of dealing the custom of slavery is one to be preferre the forcible rending of the shackles. One e ing he halted at the farm of a wealthy burg a man holding many slaves, who, hearing Moffatt was a missionary, gave him a he welcome, and soon proposed, a plentiful r having been partaken of, that there should religious service. After his retainers had come heard with great interest the message of preacher, and then dispersed: "My friend, took a hard hammer, and you have broke hard head." JOSIAH W. LEEDS

WE die as to any love when we refuse to the subject of it, and thus when we reject allurements. Thus man spiritually dies as his bodily appetites, when they cease to c mand his service. When the man who been ambitious, and whose heart has the been stirred by a powerful love of self-pro tion, turns from that passion, and utterly fuses to be governed by it, then he may said spiritually to die to his ambitions. Reindeer, &c., in Alaska.

n the recent Report of Dr. William T. Harris, United States Commissioner of Education.)

ken and horses need grass, but grass is not d in Alaska, except for a few weeks, in red places. Reindeer moss grows in all es where trees do not grow, and in enor- s quantities, so that there is a food supply en millions of reindeer in Alaska as a whole. reindeer is the natural mediator between Arctic soil and the support of man . . . eive all Alaska as one vast rock. The es of nature— the sun, the rain, the frosts, ital power of the seeds of the moss and rdy trees—all these elements work on the to subdue it for vegetation. On the coast the ocean, where the winds are laden with ture, as well as in the river valleys, the beginnings of vegetation appeared. The was eaten into by the moss plant. After noss had flourished for untold ages, it had ted a humus or soil, in which the seeds of r plants could take root. The moss epoch, , was followed by the tree epoch. When rees grew in the river valleys, and on the regions the moss could not any longer ish. But by this time the moss had con- ed the rock regions far up the mountain and over all the hills in Alaska, even up e Arctic Ocean. This gives at one glance actual view of the situation in Alaska. nd the southern coasts and in the river ys, trees flourish and moss is not found. on the hills and for a mile up the high tains reindeer moss is to be found in im- e quantities. A careful estimate finds suf- t food for ten millions of reindeer, basing estimate on the present capacity of Finland Lapland for the support of the reindeer. t the routes for reindeer travel must not id out in river valleys nor along the coast ne ocean. The reindeer would starve on unt of the lack of moss. This was the ac- experience in the journey made by Kjell- n, in the winter of 1897, from Port Clar- south to Bristol Bay. He accomplished ther parts of his journey, even the scaling gh mountain passes, without difficulty, but tempting to conduct a portion of his re- journey through the forest between the okwim and Yukon Rivers he could not find enough to subsist his reindeer, except by ng down trees and using an inferior qual- f moss. As it was, a half-dozen of his deer hed. These reindeer journeys can be ac- plished only on trails leading over the hills e the river valleys. The reindeer, with his h lips and shovel-shaped hoofs, can find under the snow at any point in Alaska, ot the forest regions which line the rivers outhern coast.

is too much to expect that miners will herds of reindeer, or indeed that reindeer ossibly be raised in the immediate vicinity mining camp, but the missionary stations, ved at a safe distance from these villages, roduce hundreds and thousands of rein- together with skilled natives who have ed to speak the English language and have ired the manners and customs of our people. These will become herdsmen and teamsters for the mines.

The Aleutian Islands are all said to be moss bearing, and they should all have herds of reindeer. If not tame, at least a few should be placed on each island to run wild and stock the pastures.

The reindeer team in Lapland and Finland, over a smooth, hard snow surface, often makes a hundred miles a day. Kjellmann, the superintendent of our reindeer herd at Eaton Station, north of St. Michael and east of Unalaklik, made eighty-five miles in twelve hours on one occasion with a reindeer team. At the easy rate of five miles an hour, with a relay every twenty miles, and with a change of teamsters every eight hours, a mail route of five hundred miles could be travelled in five days—for where darkness holds for twenty-four hours the night hours are as good as day hours for travel.

The reindeer imported from Siberia numbered 554 up to 1895. In the years 1896 and 1897 none were added from Siberia, but the 554 herd increased to 1,466 by June 30th, 1897. In 1898 161 were obtained from Siberia, and although 180 had been used for food and 66 more had been lost in the expedition to Point Barrow for the relief of the sailors imprisoned in the ice, the total herd surviving October 1st, 1898, numbered 1,918. This number is swelled to 2,062 by the addition of 144 deer turned over from the War Department as the survivors of the herd purchased in Lapland for the relief of the miners reported to be starving in the Klondike mines.

Within the past three years thousands of white men have settled in Alaska, many of them taking their families with them. The population of the older settlements has largely increased, and several new towns have sprung up, which are clamoring for school facilities. I organized local committees as long ago as 1891 in Sitka, Juneau, Douglas, Fort Wrangel, Kadiak and Unga and Unalaska. At Metlakaht a most intelligent supervision of school matters has always been exercised by William Duncan, founder of the colony of Indians that occupies that island.

In a list of settlements, older and more recent, presented by Dr. Harris, as calling for government aid, occurs this item: Kotzebue Sound, beyond Behring Strait, on the north side of Prince of Wales Peninsula, is a new mining district. There should be a school building of one room established near the mission supported by the Friends, to cost $1,500.

In the canary breeding establishments of Germany only the male birds are valued, for the females never sing. The method of training the birds to sing is to put them in a room where there is an automatic whistle, which they all strive to imitate. The breeder listens to the efforts of the birds and picks out the most apt pupils, which are then placed in another room for further instruction. These are the best singers and ultimately fetch high prices. The less gifted birds are sorted into second and third quality and are sold, while those which show no vocal powers are destroyed.

If I Were a Girl.

If I were a girl, but warned and guided by the knowledge of life that comes with maturer years, there are some things frequently done by well intentioned girls in this year of grace, 1899, that I would try to leave undone and some other things frequently neglected by them that I would try to do.

If I were a girl, I would determine to have, if possible, a sound, healthful, well knit body. I would not ruin my digestion by eating caramels, nor my nerves by keeping late hours, nor my lungs by breathing bad air, and wearing uncomfortable clothing. I would have my regular hours of eating and sleeping, and not be tempted from them oftener than once or twice a year. I would have what was sensible, economical and appropriate in dress and never be tempted from it on any occasion.

If I were a girl, I would learn as early as possible to do the homely duties which come to the vast majority of women sooner or later. I would learn to make and mend my own clothes, to sweep and dust and iron and cook, and to do all these things so easily and well that the doing could never be drudgery.

If I were a girl, I would not make a confidential friend of a new acquaintance. I would know just as many pleasant people as it was possible for me to know, but I would try them for a long, long time before I began to share my innermost thoughts and feelings with them.

If I were a girl, I would try very hard to keep my lips clear of slang, hasty words and stupid gossip. I would not seek a reputation for vivacity and "smartness" at the expense of candor and kindness. I would resolve, and resolve with all my might, to say what I meant, and to mean what I said.

If I were a girl, I would learn something about the events and prominent characters and questions of the day. I would learn to place the central figures of history. . . I would not go through life tortured by an ignorance which may be remedied wherever the English language is known and a public library is accessible.

If I were a girl, I would not spend hours in reading light novels—even harmless ones—when the same time, wisely used, would give me life-long acquaintance with . . the masters of literature.

If I were a girl, I would be a Christian, and I would not be ashamed to own that I bore the name. If I could not be a wise, mature, and influential Christian, I would be content to be an honest Christian girl, and wait for time and training to do the rest. I would let my position regarding the dance, the card-table and the theatre be so clearly defined that I need not go through the agony of decision every day I lived. I would try not to make myself and my religion offensive by cant and "goodishness," but I would try to have it understood which side I was on and why I was there.

To put it briefly, if I were a girl, and if youth could look forward as easily as later life can look backward, I would begin to be, in girlhood, what I shall in old age, wish I had become.—Jesse B. Pounds.

The material universe is full of mysterious powers and hidden resources, which have only just begun to disclose themselves in their adaptation to the needs of human progress. What will the end be?

J. H.'s diary, Sixth Month 24th, 1879.—"Those lines of Thomas Ellwood seem to be so with me to-day, that I venture to pen them, viz:

"'Thee, Thee alone, oh God, I fear,
In Thee do I confide;
Thy presence is to me more dear
Than all things else, beside.'

"And in looking at the beautiful fields with their luxuriant growth for the good of man; and the red and ripening fruit before me; oh how it raises my thoughts to the great Giver of every good and perfect gift! And in the fresh flowing of his love, I feel constrained to pen a few lines in commemoration of his goodness, who filleth our basket and our store; who feedeth us with food convenient for us . . at times satisfying the longing and thirsty one with soul solacing bread. To thee, oh holy Father, belongeth thanksgiving and praise."

First Month 11th, 1880.—

"Trials and troubles surround us,
While journeying over the sod,
But the heart is the safest, the happiest,
That's centered and anchored on God."

Eighth Month 5th, 1880.—"I have for some months past had to pass through some sore trials, besetments and temptations, in which I have at times almost lost confidence and hope; when gloomy forebodings, tedious days and wearisome nights were my portion; which has caused deep searching of heart, and caused me to look over my past life, my omissions and commissions, wherein I have not kept pace with knowledge. But as I trust a little crumb from his all-bountiful table has been given. I have to admire at the loving kindness and the condescending goodness, of my good Lord and Master, who I trust and believe, has followed me and borne with me through all. Praises, be to thy great name and power. And oh, may I, in humble resignation say, 'Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.' And oh, I beseech thee, Holy Father, leave me not now in the evening of my day, when the outward man faileth, but be around about me in the hour of trial, either of body or mind, so that I may praise and adore thee, who art forever worthy of all praise."

Seventh Month 16th, 1882.—"In looking over my life from the days of my youth, I have to admire the preservations, gracious dealings, tender mercies and loving kindness of the Lord, my bountiful Creator, toward me a poor unworthy creature. My soul doth bless, praise and magnify his great and ever worthy name; and I can with some degree of propriety use the expression of Jacob, when he said, 'God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac, did walk, the God who fed me all my life long unto this day, the Angel which redeemed me from all evil,' to Him be honor, thanksgiving and praise forever! Oh, that I may live so near to Him the remainder of my days that my end may be peace."

Sixth Month, 1883.—"Oh thou covenant-keeping God, oh thou eternal fountain of goodness. Thou who hast followed and kept me all the days of my life, be with me to the end. Oh praises, praises to thy ever-adorable Name."

Under date of Sixth Month, 1884, he wrote to his cousin, E. Wilson: . . . "Iowa is now in its beauty. The fields of waving green oats and grass, and the cornfields are beginning to look pretty. The prospect for fruit is good; strawberries very plenty. These, with the singing of birds, the lowing of cattle and the bleating of sheep all seem to be animating; all show the handiwork of a great and All-wise Creator; and call for gratitude, thanksgiving and praise. For surely man is abundantly provided for, and I oftentimes think that we have been remarkably favored with health and kind and dutiful children . . and I often feel to number the blessings."

Diary, Second Month 26th, 1886.—"I am eighty years old to-day. Old age has come, with now and then a pleasant day; long in coming, soon away. How long, oh righteous Father, wilt thou suffer the enemy to tempt me; to lay baits for my soul; to allure me into by-paths on forbidden ground? I find it just as necessary to keep on the watch in old age, as in the prime of life. To thee, oh Holy Father, do I look for help to keep me in the way I should go; that as the end is near approaching, I may be prepared to render my account with joy. For I have no merit of my own; but all my help must come from thee and to thee alone all praise belongs."

No date:

"Oh lovely, gentle peace of mind,
Be thou on earth my constant guest."

Sixth Month 23rd, 1887.—"Oh time! time! how it flies. . . When the mind is brought in retrospective view of the past, oh what scenes it presents of alternate pleasure and pain.

"Oh how little did the writer of this scrap think fifty years ago to-day, when a girl babe was born. . . that he should live to see that infant's fiftieth birthday arrive. And now as he looks back he thinks of the many changes time has made.

"With what care and tenderness was this infant raised to womanhood. With what pleasure he looked upon her when she was married to a noble young man. How he enjoyed with them the brief life they lived together [and mourned with her], when He who doeth all things well, thought fit to intercept that happiness by the premature death, I might almost say, of that noble young man, leaving her with an infant son . . . in the wide world of trouble and care: which for a time seemed too great [a trial] to bear. But He who severed the tender cord, and allowed the string to remain for a season, has provided a way, so that the languished nerve shall not break, but hope and tranquillity may again reign triumphant.

"Then in process of time another happy union took place; and hope and prosperity for a time abounded; until the cherished partner was called to foreign lands to promote peace and tranquillity amongst his fellow men, the poor Indians."

Here scenes of a very trying nature were brought to bear on mind and body.

(Here the sketch being rather obscure, as it is thought, for all but those familiar with the occurrences, the following paragraph is inserted in place of a few sentences.)

The continued anxiety for her distant loved one, whose life she felt to be in imminent danger, and the constant care of her family of young children, were a continual trial to her, all through the time this separation lasted.

And when he returned to her, it was w broken health; and inability to take a share of the care which naturally belonged him. This tax for so many years upon on delicate strength, brought bodily infirmit To resume my grandfather's sketch, at time of her fiftieth birthday.

"Hope as to comfort in this life seem be almost gone. But round about are Everlasting Arms. He who sleepeth not day nor slumbereth by night, will protect, be strength in weakness, riches in poverty, a present help in the time of need. And encouraging language may properly be appl 'Lift up thy head in hope, Oh, thou tossed troubled one, for though thou hast drunk cup of sorrow and hast spent toilsome d and wearisome nights, yet the language be applied, as it was to one formerly, ' grace is sufficient for thee.'

"Yes, He will give 'the oil of joy for mou ing, the garment of praise for the spirit heaviness.'"

Although we find no account of this belo daughter's* death in his writings, yet it known that it was a great trial to him, as w as to his dear wife, to give her up, which t had to do a month after the above was writ But such was their confidence in the overrul of Providence for good, that the couplet the poet might well express their feelings,

"His will we may not question nor the hidden tive tell,
But rest in the assurance that He doeth all thi well."

Dangers of the Dance.

here are many professed Christians in the rches who send their children to dancing ols. We wonder whether they know the gers and evils to which they expose their iren ? We know a most excellent man who his boy take lessons in dancing. Now, what be his object, but that his boy may learn o as the world does, to mingle more grace- in its society, to spend his evenings in that h they think is the queen of worldly amuse- ts. If this be his object, how can it be nciled with the plain word of God, "Be not ormed to the world ?"
ie Bible clearly indicates that there is to be riding line between the world and the dis- of Christ. On which side is the dance ?
re the low-cut dresses, bare arms and tightly ging gowns befitting the modesty of one ssing to be clothed in Christ's robe of teousness ? Can the giddy music, the heated room, the early morning hour, and position assumed in the waltz be tolerated y other place? In a word, is it not all ing to temptation, if not actual sin, and can a Christian pray, "Lead us not into otation, and then allow his children to go the most captivating temptation ever in- ed ?

answer to the question so commonly d, "What harm can there be in parlor and ding school dancing ?" we will give the ls of T. A. Faulkner, for many years presi- of Dancing Masters' Association of the Pa- Coast: "In these places," he says, "are ht the rudiments of an education which make them graduates of the saloon or hel. I do not say that it always does, but say that it often does. I only wish that ain parents who think they are restricting their children to 'parlor dancing at home only,' could see, as I have often seen, their girls, some of them but twelve or fourteen years of age, dancing in a public hall, and with immoral men."

This is usually the result of teaching the child to dance and then restricting it to home dancing. If they once become fascinated with it, they must and will, by some means, fair or foul, have more of it than their homes afford. The safe side is the best side. FOR "THE FRIEND."

"Of Faith, Fire-winged by Martyrdom."

We may not measure the far-reaching influence of Whittier's lines:

"Mother's look, more grave,
And soberer tone, as, some tale she gave
From painful Sewell's ancient tome,
Beloved in every Quaker home,
Of faith, fire-winged by martyrdom."

The vivid sense of such a faith is traced in his daring deeds, as well as in his bold words. The martyr spirit of the abolition movement was strengthened by the constancy, endurance and fortitude of those of other generations, who had a faith more dear to them than their natural lives.

"A faith that mountains could remove
A faith that finds its energy in love,
A faith that cannot die."

From the time that the martyr Stephen proclaimed to a stiff-necked generation that they did always resist the Holy Ghost, martyrdom has been a strong element in the dissemination of the gospel. Saul, afterwards called Paul, was consenting to Stephen's death, and pursued the Christians even unto strange cities, until confronted by the plaintive question, "Why persecutest thou me?"

In his answer, "Who art thou, Lord?" is found the honest confession and the would-be honest inquiry of many a persecutor since: They have not known the Lord of Glory.

Many have not had the integrity to admit this, and more have not sought the author of that life against which they were contending, and over which they were powerless.

The spread of Christianity during the periods of persecution was confined to those who had a well established faith, valued beyond all earthly preferments. As those in power were convinced of this faith, other motives for adopting it, occasioned a popularity that led to its weakness. From its pristine purity and simplicity it degenerated into forms and ceremonies, the darkness of these ages being illuminated by a few faithful witnesses only, some of whom surrendered life as "burning heretics."

Huss and Wyckliff served as beacons at the beginning of a much needed reformation. The visitation of Divine light was the means of awakening the convictions of great numbers of the people during the seventeenth century. The more destructive the measures adopted to stamp out the new faith, the more it spread as upon wings of flame.

Other societies besides Friends suffered for the maintenance of liberty of conscience, but for constancy and consistency history is beginning to accord to Friends the foremost place. Over four thousand were imprisoned at one time, and it is recorded that during thirty years of suffering, not a single Quaker was induced by it to abandon his profession. The authorities of New England who sought freedom to worship God, were strangely intolerant of a faith that differed from their own. Persecution was carried so far that the common people revolted from their inhuman practices, and many were made willing to share the cup of suffering with a despised people. As we look back more than a century to those times of suffering for our own Society we have accustomed our minds to think the day is past when liberty of conscience is questioned by these in authority. Our peace principles are yet at variance with the war spirit of our land. While this condition exists, there remains a particular service for earnest, faithful workers in the Master's cause.

These considerations combine to make the sufferings of the Doukhobortsi especially eloquent in their appeal to our feelings. Some of them have proven martyrs by their faithful adherence to the Prince of Peace, rather than yield to the laws of an earthly ruler. Expressions of theirs, during very trying circumstances bear evidence of a living faith. One said, "I shall live on, but thou shalt perish;" which so wrought upon the mind of the persecutor that he was checked in his designs. We may hope this knowledge of an endless life awoke in him the query, "Who art thou, Lord?" accompanied with the answer, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." Would that the powers of this world, who advocate its wars, might come to know the reign of the Prince of Peace, whose kingdom is everlasting and beyond their transient rule, who holds a spiritual life that far outweighs the natural, and that to live in this life of the spirit, is the essential errand in the state of probation.

E. H. Crosby, in the "Missionary Review of the World," gives as the reason that Russia has never ceased to persecute them, "because they take their Christianity seriously, really love their enemies and shrink from the idea of slaughtering them."

The inference is sad, but too true that many so-called Christian denominations do not accept the gospel seriously.

If there is a work for Friends in assisting those yet under exile in Russia to find their beloved families in a land of freedom; a blessing would result to those who labor, to those who are under affliction, and our example of practical Christianity would be placed before the people. DILLWYN STRATTON.

First Month 10th, 1900.

MORE than fifty years ago, a wise and patriotic speaker (Dr. W. E. Channing), uttered words of warning that we fear are quite as applicable to us now as they were to those whom he then addressed. He said: "The desire that our country should surpass all others would not be criminal, did we understand in what respects it is most honorable for a nation to excel; did we feel that the glory of a State consists in intellectual and moral superiority, in pre-eminence of a knowledge, freedom and purity. But to the mass of a people this form of pre-eminence is too refined and unsubstantial. There is another kind of triumph, which they better understand, the triumph of physical power, triumph in battle, triumph not over the minds but the territory of another State.

Here is a palpable, visible superiority, and for this a people are willing to submit to severe privations. A victory blots out the memory of their sufferings, and in boasting of their extended power they find a compensation for many woes. . . Let us teach, however, that the honor of a nation consists, not in the forced and reluctant submission of other States, but in equal laws and free institutions, in cultivated fields and prosperous cities, in the development of intellectual and moral power, in the diffusion of knowledge, in magnanimity and justice, in the virtue and blessings of peace. Let us never be weary in reprobating that intolerable spirit of conquest, by which a nation becomes the terror and abhorrence of the world, and inevitably prepares a tomb, at best a splendid tomb, for its own liberties and prosperity."

Saints.

When it has seemed good to the Holy Spirit, by whom the Holy Scriptures were dictated, to use a term as applied to certain men, the abuse and wrong application of that term by men who wrest the Holy Scriptures to suit their own perverse doctrines, does not justify those who love the Truth in discarding that term in its true application, for, so doing, they diminish the glory and beauty of Truth. Therefore, because an apostate church has robbed all true members of the church of Christ of the term saint, like as it has done other terms such as priest, has changed the characteristic features which mark the true saint, supplanting them by suppositious ones of its own devising, has built on this a structure of its own having its foundation in the sand, that is the way and will of man, and not on the word of the Lord, deducing therefrom the doctrines of superogation, penance, the mediation and intercessory prayers of those canonized as saints by their church dignitaries, who direct that prayers and adoration should be offered to them, and to crown all the selling of indulgences, compounding sin for filthy lucre; thus like the merchants of Babylon the great, trading in the souls of men; yet because all these abominations have found a place in the professing church of Christ, still we are not justified in discarding the truth of God, nor released from individually striving by God's grace to become that which in God's love Christ died for, to which end He sends the Holy Spirit of promise, which through his sufferings and death and by his work of regeneration and sanctification on our heart, He accomplishes in us and for us to our salvation and his glory, in making the members of his church saints of God and of Christ. And, indeed, none but those who by Him have been made saints on earth can company with Him in Heaven.

Man originally created for immortality, through sin fell and became subject to death. God's work, man, through sin was marred. God's love towards man changed not. But God, who is holy, cannot dwell where sin is, nor could man joined to sin come into the presence of God. Sorrow alone for sin and its consequences does not put away sin. This is God's work, not man's. Man cannot do it. Nathan said to David "therefore the Lord hath put away thy sin." Man is then accounted of God, to be a sinner whilst joined to sin, a saint, when separated therefrom. To sanctify means to set apart as holy. Saints are then those who are thus separated and set apart from sin, and as such from sinners who are yet joined to sin.

If sinners cannot come into the Divine presence, how can such become saints, since the work is not man's, but God's? God hath appointed a way, a Mediator, who himself one with the Father yet mingles with sinners, calls them to himself, sanctifies his people, and presents them to God. All have sinned, all are sinners, and as such find themselves separated from God. God sends his only begotten Son, the beginning of a new and more glorious creation than even Adam was. He came in the likeness of men, subject like Adam to temptation, but, untouched by the taint of sin; imbued with the mighty power of God, who being tempted, foiled the tempter; as man, walking blameless before God; as God coming in the name and power of God, plainly declaring the Father's will, proving his mission by mighty works and miracles, God's voices and angels being heard and seen testifying before many witnesses of the Son's divinity, and God's spirit in the hearts of those who truly feared and loved God, bearing witness to Christ Jesus, which testimony was received by them, many of whom sealed their testimony by their blood. God's immutable law, promulgated in Eden, demanding death as the penalty of sin, had never been repealed, and remains for ever in force. And this is not a death merely to the body, which is but the earthly tabernacle of the immortal spirit, but it is the death of the soul to that Divine life and communion which whilst in innocency man enjoyed. This death passed upon Adam in the day he sinned, and all men through sin have died. The death of the body is but a secondary and it might almost be said a minor consequence, for men have power to kill the body, but not the soul. God alone, who is the author of life has power over death. And coming in the power of God, Jesus as a spotless Lamb, gave his life for ours, tasted that death which was our due. Through the power of the Eternal Spirit, He offered himself as a sin offering to God, by the same power He raised himself from the dead. This offering was ordained by and accepted of God, who could but cry as He did to Abraham, "It is enough." God in Christ makes a new covenant with man. One of forgiveness, pardon, reconciliation through repentance toward God, and faith in and obedience to his Son. His seal set thereto is the blood of the everlasting covenant, even Christ's offering of himself; man's seal is that circumcision of the heart, whereby through the obedience of faith, sin is put away, and sinners are washed and cleansed therefrom "in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God."

The first death is that which through sin has come upon all men, from which by Christ's power men are raised. Were it not for God's mercy in Christ this death would be eternal. Could fitter words be chosen to describe the bitterness of this death, than those uttered in the hour of his agonies, by Him who coming from the bosom of the Father, and tasting of this death, cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me."

This death, the fruit of sin, is the deadliest work of the devil, and the Holy Scriptures declare that it must needs be that the Saviour pass through death, in order that He might de stroy him, who had the power of this deatl the devil. Through this victory Christ brougi life and immortality to light, which by th gospel is preached and made known to me Jesus Christ said "I am the resurrection an the life." Those who come to Him in faitl who are born again of his spirit, are ushere into a new life, and as they continue faithft to Him who has called them, these receive li and power from Christ Jesus, the fountai and find salvation, a present one from sin an a future one from its wages, death. For th Scriptures testify that there is a second deatl whereunto the devil and all his servants wi be cast, without any hope of a resurrection.

But God himself, and Jesus too has cautione us, no man can sin with impunity. Adam ha life and lost it. The Israelites believed in Gc and his servant Moses and obtained delive ance passing through the Red Sea, and bein fed with manna from heaven they came t the border of the promised land. Here the faltered, their faith failed them, they disb lieved God. These died in the wilderness, ar God made known to them the "change in h purpose." God put a new heart and a ne spirit into Saul; he prophesied in the spiri he fell away, rejected of God.

Saul of Tarsus, too, as the apostle Paul speal of the same susceptibility through unwatchfu ness to fall, saying, "I keep my body unde lest after having prophesied to others, I myse should be a castaway." Jesus said, "If ye co tinue in my word, then are ye my disciples i deed." So, in Hebrews is it written, "Christ house are we, if we hold fast the confiden and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto t end" (Heb. iii: 6.) Again, "if we hold t beginning of our confidence steadfast unto t end" (v: 14).

A saint like a garment may be soiled, b the washing pool is there. Happy are th who keep their garments unspotted from t world. Being born again they grow in grac pass through the washings of regeneratio and "having made their robes white in t blood of the Lamb" are accounted worthy attain to the resurrection, and to enter in eternal life. None then are saints in heave who had not been made so on earth, for t washing of the robes is done whilst in t body. The clean linen which is the righteou ness of saints is theirs whilst in time, so th when Christ appears these are not found nake but ready to be clothed upon with more glo ous robes and an effulgent crown.

interesting editorial appears in the Louis-Courier-Journal of the 13th instant, bear-he above title, some parts of which are so and timely that the writer desires to share with the readers of The Friend.

these days, when militarism seems so popu-vhen even professed ministers of Christ, 'Prince of Peace," are beguiled into justi-on of this "Scourge of the Nations," it is shing to find a great newspaper willing to its voice against the atrocities inseparably ected with war, even if it does not take igher ground for its opposition thereto the cruelty and inhumanity and horror of we add to these sufficient objections to the ary system, its contravention of the Divine as this was manifested and inculcated by fe and teaching of Christ, we are brought e true ground whereon the Friends, Men-es, Doukhobors and some other religious ties have long stood and borne their testi- against the spirit and practice of war.

e editorial says:

he story cabled Monday that General Gat- shot dead with his own hand the guide who ed him into the Boer ambuscade, brings the genuine horror of war with a shock. ave heard so much of Red Cross services, uch immense sums have been devoted to tal work that the average man is tempted get the actual brutalities and waste of hat war implies. He forgets in the elabo-work of the medical corps that all this ex-ture of money and self-sacrificing devotion in only an infinitesimal degree the enor-losses in battle, and that all the tender-shown the wounded makes but scant ds for the cruelty that the conflict de-s.

iat the common soldier does in the lust of ge does not attract notice as it does when e told an officer had to commit a deed that, h necessary and justifiable, according to ws of warfare, is nevertheless unutterably ing!"

instance is then given of a great South-eneral, during the civil war, who, after a , went into a tent where lay a wounded nant of his own command, and deliberately out his brains because he had disobeyed instruction in battle; and another, of a early British admiral who encountered a h squadron, and was not supported by onsort ships. After he had defeated the h he summoned the captains of these two to his own vessel and hung them to the arm.

e article also recalls the fact that, after attle of Omdurman, General (now Lord) ener, "sent his soldiers over the field to ie wounded dervishes who had fallen in for their country and their religion," his for this course being that "the dervishes herously assaulted the soldiers passing, hat even in dying they were a menace. ıry necessity is accepted as palliation for cruelty, but none the less it is horrifying." conclusion the editorial says: "A useful lesson would be conveyed to all nations, erhaps war would be diminished, if, instead velling upon the glories of the military r, the inhumanity and crime inseparable from war would be more plainly set forth. War means lust and rapine as much as it means bravery and devotion, and it means cruelty as well. A great statesman once said, 'There never was a good war, nor a bad peace,' and while war seems a part of the state of mankind, yet there is no question that every one avoided is a great gain to humanity, as every one brought on means an inevitable debasement in many forms. Blessed are the peace-makers."

May we, as Friends, be alive to the importance of maintaining our testimony against the spirit of militarism now so prevalent in the two great English-speaking nations of the world, in which it seems that the lust of power and wealth, "the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not (and also of many who profess to believe), lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine unto them." We need to be watchful and careful that we do nothing to lower the standard of our profession, earnestly and prayerfully endeavoring to so live that we "may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom "we should shine as lights in the world" (Phil. ii: 15).

Statistics of Crime for 1899.

The total number of persons who committed suicide in the United States during the year 1899, as reported to the Chicago Tribune, was 5,340, as compared with 5,920 in 1898, 6,600 in 1897, 6,520 in 1896, and 5,759 in 1895.

The cases of murder numbered 6,225, as compared with 7,840 in 1898, 9,520 in 1897, 10,652 in 1896, and 10,500 in 1895—a marked decrease. In the matter of lynchings, while there has been special barbarity displayed in quite a number of cases, the total shows a decided decrease, 107 for 1899, as compared with 127 in 1898, 166 in 1897, 131 in 1896, 171 in 1895, 160 in 1894, 200 in 1893 and 235 in 1892. The legal executions numbered 131, as compared with 109 in 1898, 128 in 1897, 122 in 1896, 132 in 1895, 132 in 1894, 126 in 1893, and 107 in 1892.

It may be that the falling off in the homicide cases for several years past has been in part due to more favorable business conditions, but it is probable also that our foreign wars have drawn off not a few who had grown reckless and were not averse to shedding blood. It may be a proper comment to make that the daily paper furnishing the above statistics, being published on every day in the week, published these in its Sunday edition of Twelfth Month 31st last, a woful make-up of forty-eight pages, no copy of which number, it was stated by the publishers, "is complete without the pink sporting sheet" of four additional pages. In the latter, amongst other things, was given the record of the prize ring for the past year, including the number who had met their death as the result of the brutal encounters. Does not such printed poison as this directly feed the noisome stream which eventuates in the harvest of disorders, overt crime and shedding of blood? And is it to be wondered at that a convention was lately held in New York to specially consider what it was possible to do to withstand that great enemy of the people's peace, "the Sunday paper." J. Died Rather Than Kill.—The responsibility of taking human life under any circumstances is tremendous. We cannot but admire the wonderful self-control of an Armenian who preferred to die rather than live with blood upon his hands.

It was during the horrible massacres in Armenia. A native, says George H. Hepworth, was employed in one of the railroad stations. He was standing on the platform when the mob approached. A Turk, who knew the man to be a faithful servant handed him a pistol, saying:

"It is an outrage. Take this and defend yourself. It is good for six of the rascals."

The Armenian took the weapon, hesitated for a moment, then handed it back with a groan.

"I can't do it," he said. "I had rather die than commit murder."

In less than ten minutes he was a bruised and bleeding corpse, and the fiends had started on the track of another victim.—Youth's Companion.

A notable enterprise has been undertaken by Christian workers of Philadelphia. It is nothing less than a complete census of the city's homes, all to be taken in a single day, Second Month 22nd. The army of workers who will be engaged will come from nearly all the churches. There is a complete co-operation of denominations and organizations for this purpose—Roman Catholics, Unitarians, Universalists, Salvation Army, Y. M. C. A., W. C. T. U., besides the regular denominations. The city has been divided, and district leaders secured, so that the census will be taken with all the system and accuracy of a government census. The statistics gathered will be placed in the hands of the pastors and First-day schools.

A contest involving the disruption of the public school of McDonald, Washington County, arose over the fact that in the ten rooms of the McDonald public school different forms of prayer, different attitudes while reciting them and different passages of the Bible have been for some time forced upon all the children, irrespective of their own religion. Some of the children refused and were expelled. The parents of the expelled pupils sent their children back to school again, and also sent word to the principal and teachers that the children would be silent and respectful during any religious ceremony the others went through, but that they would not participate in it against their conscience, but they were refused admission as long as they held to that idea.

Louise Frœbel, widow of Friedrich Frœbel, who founded the kindergarten system, died in Hamburg, Germany, on the seventh instant, aged eighty-five years. Her husband died in 1852. Like most educational leaders and reformers he was ridiculed through most of his life-time for the method of child-training which he originated, but in the nearly half a century which has passed since his death Froebel's views have become largely incorporated with the educational systems of Germany, England and America. In fact they are now generally recognized as of great value among educators in all civilized countries. Froebel's case is thus another instance of the fact that the mental and moral inertia of mankind is such that the race is always from a generation to a century behind time in recognizing and appreciating its greatest leaders and benefactors. Still, as of old, the fathers kill the prophets and the sons garnish their sepulchres.—Free Methodist.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—Southern white men are realizing the importance of definite and tangible plans in solving the negro question. As a result of this feeling, a conference is called at Montgomery, Ala., next spring of both races, to exchange ideas on the subject.

The Legislature has elected ex-Governor McLaurin Senator from Mississippi, for the long term, and Sullivan for the short term.

James H. Gear has been chosen by the Iowa Legislature to succeed himself in the United States Senate.

The election of J. C. S. Blackburn as United States Senator, was duplicated in both Houses of the Kentucky Legislature on the 16th inst., this action being taken on account of a question among lawyers as to whether the election on the 9th was legal.

The imports of merchandise into the United States during 1899 amounted to $799,834,620, as against $634,954,448 in 1898. The exports amounted to $1,275,486,641, as against $1,255,546,266 in 1898.

The Senate after ratifying the Samoan treaty, reconsidered its action and the subject is open for further debate.

The Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, agreed unanimously to report a bill for the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal.

In the House the Pension Appropriation bill, carrying $145,245,250, was passed, after a sharp debate, provoked by an attack by Northern Democrats on the Commissioner of Pensions.

The Navy Department has prepared a tariff for the island of Guam based on the schedules now in use for the islands of Cuba and Puerto Rico.

Statistics show a reduction, by curfew ordinances, of 80 per cent. of the crimes committed by children under fifteen years of age.

Maine stands second among the States in the daily output of pulp and paper. Including the product of the three plants now building it is estimated that the daily output will be 2165 tons and the total investment in this class of property will be $30,000,000.

There will be $85,000,000 expended this year in Greater New York in the construction of buildings. This estimate is exclusive of the cost of structures contracted for by the city.

The 1899 production of beet sugar in Minnesota was 4,340,166 pounds, on which the state paid a bounty of $20,000.

So far this season about 80,000 boxes of oranges have been shipped from Manatee County, Fla.

In the last year the railroads of Connecticut carried 50,269,468 passengers, with a record of none killed. The trolley lines of the State caused the death of eleven passengers in a total of 59,084,702.

A large Glasgow (Scotland) tea chest company has purchased 10,000 acres of forest land in North Carolina, with 75,000,000 feet of stumpage, to use the lumber for veneering of tea chests. A factory to prepare it will be built at Wilmington.

Boston's municipal debt increased $3,000,000 last year.

The Chicago Tribune says: "The year that established the supremacy of the United States in steel and iron manufacturers also placed this country at the head of the coal producing nations of the world. Our coal output for 1899 was over 244,000,000 tons, or 49,000,000 tons more than in the preceding year. Between 1870 and 1895 we trebled our production, but last year we mined nearly one-half as much coal as the entire average output of any other country during the five years of 1871-75. During the last thirty years the other manufacturing countries have also been increasing their coal output steadily, though in a smaller ratio, and until last year the order of the four leading countries was Great Britain, the United States, Germany and France. Now the United States heads the list, as it also does in steel. Americans are now mining one-third of the coal of the entire world, while thirty years ago they mined only 17 per cent. of it. Nothing could more strikingly illustrate the growth of our manufacturing industries or illustrate more clearly the industrial supremacy henceforth to be maintained by holding on to our European and Oriental markets. Thirty-seven states and territories produce coal, and there are said to be coal beds underlying one-sixth of the surface of the country."

The canal gates at Lockport, Illinois, were opened on the 17th inst., allowing the water from the Chicago drainage canal to flow into the Desplaines River.

News has reached Victoria, British Columbia, on the 16th inst., from Skagway, that a large part of the business section of Dawson was destroyed by fire on the night of the 9th. The loss will exceed $500,000. The Skagway operator says that great suffering would undoubtedly follow the fire, as the temperature at Dawson was forty degrees below zero with the wind blowing. The city is without the regulation water supply.

Reports are received of the ravages of the bubonic plague, which, in spite of the efforts of the Hawaiian authorities, appears to be on the increase. There have been twenty-three deaths from the plague since Twelfth Month 12.

Within five years the exports of coffee from the Hawaiian Islands have increased nearly fortyfold.

There is a steady demand for eight cars of beer a week in Manila.

Aluminum stoppers for bottles are now being made at the rate of several thousand pounds a week. The blanks are cut from sheet metal, and, after shaping, rubber gaskets are forced over them. Such stoppers have retained the gas of effervescent fluids for four years.

There were 525 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 21 more than the previous week and 61 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 255 were males and 270 females: 86 died of pneumonia; 59 of heart diseases; 56 of consumption; 26 of diphtheria; 19 of bronchitis; 18 of nephritis; 17 of convulsions; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of cancer; 14 of marasmus; 14 of debility; 12 of apoplexy; 12 from casualties; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of old age; 9 of Bright's disease, and 8 of typhoid fever.

HOGS were firm at 6¼ a 6¾c. for Western.

FOREIGN.—The tension over the situation in Natal Colony was relieved in London on the 18th inst., by the announcement that General Buller's army had crossed the Tugela River and seized strong positions about two miles from the north bank. General Warren's column, it is said, encountered a heavy fire in its advance. The British losses in killed, wounded and captured up to the 18th are 7,987 officers and men, according to a cablegram from London.

A despatch of the 20th instant from London states that John Ruskin died on the afternoon of that day of influenza. He was nearly eighty-one years of age.

The recently seized German steamer Marie, loaded with sulphur, has been released by Great Britain unconditionally.

Russia in Europe has a forest area of about 500,000,000 acres. One-third of the country, indeed, is forest.

The Calcutta Council, on the 19th instant, considered the famine situation. The official estimates show that the cost to the Government of the relief works, etc., to the end of Third Month will be 40,000,000 rupees. About 22,000,000 persons are now affected in British territory and about 27,000,000 in the native States. The Viceroy, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, said that the famine area had expanded, surpassing the worst fears, and they were now facing a cattle, water and food scarcity of a terrible character. About 3,250,000 persons, he continued, were already receiving relief.

It is no unusual thing for a vessel plying between Japan and London to carry 2,000,000 fans as a single item of cargo.

It is learned that the wrecked steamer on the New Foundland coast is the Heligoland, the property of the Dutch-American Petroleum Company. Her name is found on a boat picked up off Cape Fine. She s from Philadelphia First Month 5th, and was bound Bergen, Norway, and carried a crew of 36 men. All

The needy are not causing us to waste ime by drawing us into sympathy, into acrifice, into doing for Christ in the per- of his destitute or afflicted. They are ng us into durable riches above any of emporals they can receive of us. There- let no timid or needing heart shrink away overwrought humility from friends whose tion they long for, under the plea, "It is ry for me to take time where I, in my un- iness, cannot leave an equivalent." But the more highly favored, if faithful, get more than the equivalent, if not from thee, yet through thy need. The full and the abounding need the needy in a higher sense than the wanting ones need them. 'Tis only the wasting of others' time that would be robbery—wasting it on our foolishness, our selfishness, our lack of edifying, our procrastination, our whims or our lusts—but it is not wasting their time to be the occasion of their improving it for our own or another's relief and upbuilding.

Turning from our dealing with men's and women's time, which "is money," we are brought to the question, "Will a man rob God?"

In the journey of our lives we pass through large deserts of waste time, made so by heedlessness of occupying it even with thought. We set high value on a silent hour in a Friends' meeting, but hours at other times carry the same intrinsic value, and when long stretches of enforced silence or solitude are our lot, a fearful waste often goes on.

The waste of silence everywhere where silence might be occupied with our God—whether in the watches of the night or in solitary outward occupations, or in sickness, or in waiting for others—is ground for great accountability to be known when we shall be inquired of "What hast thou done with thy Lord's money?"

It is not less of silence that we need, but revival in the silences which we have, and all must have. In proportion as there is a revived silence in the Omnipresent One prevailing through the quiet periods of the week, will there be a revival of or in the true silence in Meetings for Worship. And as our daily silences are rightly occupied will anointed services arise day by day in their season, and the Giver of every good and perfect gift will not be robbed in time, in tithes or in offerings.

TABLE MANNERS BEFORE THE DIVINE HOST.—It is a custom with Friends to hold a brief opportunity for Divine communion at each meal when they sit down. Where this is more than a perfunctory form, the silent saying of grace to us will tend to modify and season the remaining conversation of the repast.

But it is sometimes said, "After the gift the thanks grow cold." Shall the Christian leave his table less thoughtful or thankful than when he sat down? "So when they had dined Jesus saith unto Simon Peter, 'Simon, lovest thou me more than these?'" (John xxi: 14.)

The after-dinner thanks and love were directed to be expressed in terms of feeding others. Thus a spiritual Lord's Supper may be continued. We may safely refer to the witness of the Spirit each man's required form of answer to the question: "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?" Three answers were given to that question:—"I will take the cup of Salvation," "I will call upon the name of the Lord," and "I will pay my vows unto the Lord." (Ps. cxvi: 12-14.)

Falling by Heredity, Rising by Grace.

G. Campbell Morgan, in an article on "Heredity" in the Record of Christian Work, after speaking of the evil tendencies by which human nature is handicapped, says:

"We have to face these facts. Young men who are going from our city and country homes are suddenly overwhelmed and fall in the conflict. Why? They did not choose the sinful things, but suddenly, under certain conditions of life, they find a devil in them that had been sleeping. Somehow, he is aroused, and he masters them. They have inherited evil tendencies from someone gone before. So that I say to-day, men are starting in life from this standpoint, without the semblance of a chance; they are handicapped in the race from the beginning, and from before their birth.

"That is exactly what the apostle says here, 'By one man's disobedience,' and whether that man be Adam or your father, it does not affect the matter. 'By one man's disobedience many were made sinners.' That is the great law; sinners by yielding to the hereditary force that dwells within them, and for which they are not responsible. Such is the story of the lives of thousands of our fellow men to-day. What have we to say to these things? What has the preacher to say? What has the gospel of Jesus Christ to say?

"It has to say that there is another truth which Jesus Christ came to proclaim, side by side with that first one, and that the man who only declares that, tells but half the common truth of every life and soul of man. And what is the other truth? It is contained in this same passage to the Romans and the twentieth verse, 'Where sin abounded grace did much more abound.' . . . . "My inheritance in Jesus Christ He has trusted to no line of succession, but He brings it to me himself, by the power of his Spirit, and deals with me in direct personal communion."

THE only serious instruction is that which cultivates reason and conscience. The words which the teacher utters, however true or wise, have less influence on his hearers than his character. The man, not the speech, is eloquent. It is the spirit that is Divine, and words have irresistible force only when they spring from the hearts of Godlike men. They who create new and beautiful ideals, which give a new and holier sense of the worth and goodness of life, are our greatest benefactors. The supreme need is of good men, for only they upbuild the kingdom of earth and heaven.—John L. Spalding.

A Testimony Concerning William Penn from the Monthly Meeting for Berkshire, Held at Reading, England, the 31st of First Month, 1719.

Our Friend William Penn departed this life at his house at Ruscomb, in the county of Berks, the thirtieth of the Fifth Month, 1718, and his body was conveyed thence the seventh of the Sixth Month following to Friends' burial ground at Jordans in the county of Bucks, where he was honorably interred, being accompanied by many Friends and others from divers parts, and being a member of our Monthly Meeting at Reading at the time of his decease and some years before, we can do no less but, in giving the foregoing account say something respecting the character of so worthy a man, and not only refer to other meetings where his residence was in former times, who are witnesses of the great self-denial he underwent in the prime of his youth and the patience with which he bore many a heavy cross, but also think it our duty to cast in our mite, to set forth in part his deserved commendation.

He was a man of great abilities, of an excellent sweetness of disposition, quick of thought and ready of utterance, full of the qualification of true discipleship, even love without dissimulation, as extensive in charity as comprehensive in knowledge, and to whom malice and ingratitude were utter strangers, so ready to forgive enemies that the ungrateful were not excepted.

Had not the management of his temporal affairs been attended with some deficiencies, envy itself would be to seek for matter of accusation, and yet, in charity, even that part of his conduct may be ascribed to a peculiar sublimity of mind.

Notwithstanding which he may, without straining his character, be ranked amongst the learned, good and great whose abilities are sufficiently manifested throughout his elaborate writings, which are so many lasting monuments of his admired qualifications, and are the esteem of learned and judicious men among all persuasions. And though, in old age, by reason of some shocks of a violent distemper, his intellects were much impaired, yet his sweetness and loving disposition surmounted its utmost efforts, and remained when reason almost failed.

In fine, he was learned without vanity, apt without forwardness, facetious in conversation, yet weighty and serious, of an extraordinary greatness of mind, yet void of the stain of ambition, as free from rigid gravity as he was clear of unseemly levity. A man, a scholar, a Friend, a minister surpassing in superlative endowments, whose memorial will be valued by the wise and blessed with the just.

Signed on behalf and by appointment of the said meeting. William Lambell, Jr.

Contentment.

"Do you see that little brown cottage on the hillside?" said my friend, as we drove along the bustling city in which she pursued the busy anxious calling of a physician. "Yes," I replied, "How cozy it looks with the apple tree at the side, and the old-fashioned garden and front yard."

"It's a genial, restful spot," continued the doctor, "and to it I often go to learn lessons of contentment. Two women, a mother and a daughter, have lived there for many years. The mother was once wealthy, but her husband died, and riches fled. The old story, you see. Since her childhood the daughter has known little of life but as a hand-to-hand struggle for food and shelter. But you never hear a word of complaint. I often get discouraged, hard things come into my life, as they come into most lives, and I am tempted to grow bitter and cynical and ask the question, 'Is life worth living after all?' Then I go to Widow Jackson's, and she is so cheery and bright as she talks about her plants and her work. Perhaps she tells me of her early experience in this western country when she was first married. how they roughed it, yet how happy they were. All the time her needle flies along the garment she is making, for she cannot afford to be idle a minute. In some mysterious way, the hope and cheer of her brave soul are breathed into me. I look at her, and feel ashamed that I ever harbored a discontented thought, and I go away quite happy again.

"It is for such humble souls, 'the unnamed millions,' that this old world is kept going rather than for the noisy few about whom every one is talking. Widow Jackson will never know how much her brave endurance helps me—she would not believe me if I told her. Perhaps that knowledge is kept for one of the blissful surprises of heaven. I am not the only one to whom she has given what no money can buy. Where, in all our busy city or in any other far or near, would we go for cheer, hope, courage and endurance?

"Truly does the Bible say, 'Godliness with contentment is great gain.' It is gain to those who possess it, and to all upon whom the serene light of their influence falls."—S. W. H. in S. S. Times.

A Japanese Convert.

A Japanese divinity student in Cambridge, Mass. was once asked to speak. He said he would tell how he was converted. He desired to enter the Imperial University of Japan that he might study philosophy in order to counteract the influence of foreign missionaries in his native land. He was unable to secure admission there, but was able to enter a school carried on by the American Episcopal church, where he had a Christian room-mate. One day these two young men went to Bishop Williams, the head of the school, as the representatives of the students, to complain of the defects of the building in which they roomed. It was cold, especially on the north side, where the speakers had their room. The venerable Bishop listened attentively, and expressed his regret that the Mission Board had not been able to send them sufficient money to keep the building in good repair. Then he turned to the Christian student and said:

"But this matter can be settled as far as you are concerned. You are young, and I old. My work is nearly ended. Yours is beginning. Your health and comfort must considered. I have a sunny room on the so side; you shall take that room and I will t your cold room on the north side." In vain young man protested; but the Bishop was sistent. His life was of little value. young man might injure his usefulness by pairing his health. The Christian student b into tears, and soon the heathen student the same, for around the brow of the self-sacrificing man of God he seemed to see a li divine. He had never seen such a spiri sacrifice among heathen people or heat teachers, and he said, "If that is what Ch tianity does for a man, I want to be a Ch tian.—Selected.

iary, Tenth Month 6th, 1888.—"When I ke this morning this language ran through mind, 'Search me, oh God, and see if there ny iniquity in me.' This is not the text, is what took hold of my mind, followed n desires that I might be cleansed of every g that is offensive in the Divine sight, and prayer of my heart was that I might live life of the righteous, and that my last end ht be like his."

ate unknown.—"They who are fond of their ss know in their hearts that it is with a r to be admired that they thus adorn themes, and that they would not go to the pains e there none to see them but God and the angels. Oh, stop then. Aim at pleasing alone, and all these ornaments will soon o off."

econd Month 26th, 1889.—"This day comes my eighty-third year, and the thought es up, 'What good have I done? How often e I, through unwatchfulness, been so off my rd as to do or think that that was not t.'

And oh, how often have I besought forgive- and obtained a little relief!" And now, at advanced age, oh, how I have to admire goodness and compassionate, loving kind- of my Almighty Heavenly Father for his watchful care and long-suffering forbear-, following as with a rod and a staff; at es reproving, and then, as it were, pouring ne 'oil and the wine.'"

How can I ever be thankful enough or sufntly render unto Him his due? Who is ever hy of all honor, thanksgiving and praise? I am confirmed in the belief that true reon is a heartfelt work, a real birth in man, ion and communion with the Father and his son Jesus Christ. And it is by giving l to the inward Teacher, these little manifations of his love, that we may partake of peace, that comfort and that hope that world can neither give nor take away. And earnest desire of my heart is that, through few remaining days of my life I may 'live life of the righteous, and that my last end be like his."

welfth Month 18th, 1889.—"My heart goes in gratitude and thankfulness to the Great g . . . and I have to admire his good-, not only to myself, but to the rising eration, who are the joy of the present and hope of succeeding time. And as I trust g desires have been raised in my mind that, hey have begun they may continue.

'Although discouragements do oftentimes und, the gloomy state of society may be ressing, and the evils in the land cause sor- of heart, yet the language formerly may y, 'What is that to thee; follow thou Me.' The world has many attractions: The love loney, the love of self, the love of applause, many other things to allure us from the ight and narrow way, [following] which e can give true peace—that peace which, ve everything else we should strive to at-.

Oh, may I with you, and you with me, renunto Him his due who hath called us to y and to virtue, who hath followed us far ugh our lives, and showered spiritual and temporal blessings, and preserved us through dangers seen and unseen. Can our hearts be thankful enough for such numberless blessings?

"While on a visit to Ohio in the autumn of 1890, after attending the Yearly Meeting at Stillwater, my dear grandmother was taken sick at her cousin Elizabeth Wilson's in Barnesville. In writing to his children at home my grandfather said, 'Don't be uneasy about us, for we are very kindly cared for and in the midst of plenty. We try to feel contented and to feel resigned, that, in the ordering of Divine Providence, some unseen good may be the result of our being thus circumstanced, and taking this view, I hope it may all turn out right.

"Extract of a letter from grandmother to her cousin. E. Wilson, dated Eleventh Month 1st, 1890: 'I feel that we were wonderfully blest to have thy house for a home while I was so sick, and very thankful to thee for thy many and various kindnesses in so many ways. I do feel as if we never can remunerate thee, but believe thee has been, and will be, blessed for such kindnesses. I feel that we were cared for and blessed all the way home, for which I hope to be very thankful to the great and good Master, who has watched over me all my life long."

The three following extracts are to their son-in-law and daughter, then in charge of the boarding school at Hickory Grove, Iowa:

(After speaking of several of their children and grandchildren visiting them, he says): "So we have some company, but, oh, we do miss you so much! We want you to come just as soon as your time is out there . . . for I feel like we will not be here long, or I in particular, for bodily symptoms and old age induce me to think so. But as times and seasons are not at our command, I think it best to look on the bright side, and try to be ready.

"We have so many favors, so much to be thankful for, that my heart very often (as it were) goes out in praises, praises to his ever adorable and most excellent Name, and, as I trust, living desires go out for the preservation of my children. Yes, for the children that you have the care of.

"I have very much desired that you and they may all love one another, for where true love is there are harmony, friendship and every virtue. . . . Now, with love to you and all the school, I bid farewell, and remain your poor old father, JOHN HAMPTON."

Eleventh Month 30th, 1892.—"Viola, Iowa. Dear Children: We are all in usual health and getting along in our usual way. We often think of you and the . . . care that rests upon you, with desires that you may be favored with strength, wisdom and ability to discharge the trust committed to you to the good of the school, to the good of society, and to the peace of your own minds. We feel lonesome without you, but hope you are in your proper places. And —— says he thinks you are."

M. H. to her children:

Fourth Month 23rd, 1893.—"Father asked me a while ago what they should do for a surprise for me next Sixth-day. I told him I thought if I lived to be eighty-one [years old] that would be surprise enough. A great age indeed, not to have attained to any more experience than I have. But I can say, I believe, in truth, that I feel more often than the coming morning a feeling of thankfulness for the blessings and favors bestowed all through my long life, now more than four score years."

Tenderness of Mother Love.

A wise, prudent mother, one day happening to leave some change on the table, near which her little girl, four years old, was playing, on returning to the room, missed the money. It immediately occurred to her that the child had taken it up to play with, and accordingly she asked her where the money was.

The child denied that she had touched it, but in a manner that betrayed some uneasiness. The mother, however, did not notice this, and rang for the servant, who said she had not been in the room since her mistress left it. The mother, now feeling certain that her daughter had the money, and seeing something folded in her apron, requested her, in a gentle manner, to show her what she had there. The child turned away, saying she had been picking some stones up in the garden.

How did the mother act? She wisely led the little girl into an adjoining room, where they might be quite alone, and then firmly but quietly unfolded the tightly grasped hands and discovered the money. How difficult, in such a not uncommon case, to act wisely, viz., to prove to the child the greatness of the fault, and yet avoid the appearance of severity. The mother thus touchingly surmounted the trial. Instead of betraying anger, instead of upbraiding or inflicting punishment, she sank into a chair and burst into tears. The child, instantly overcome by this direct appeal to her feelings of attachment and her highest sentiments, rushed broken-hearted, into her mother's arms, and hid her tears of shame and repentance in her bosom. The impression thus made has never been effaced, and the child was forever rescued from a tendency which, however slight in the first instance, might, if often repeated, have become a direct habit.—Zion's Watchman.

WOMEN IN MEDICINE.—The first woman in the world who was enrolled as a physician was an American woman, Elizabeth Blackwell, in 1849. One of America's most noted female doctors, Marie E. Zakrzewska, was a native of Berlin, but she had to leave the German capital in consequence of the strong prejudice aroused against her. That was many years ago, and women as physicians are now tolerated even on the continent. Even the far East has women as doctors, the best known among them being a Chinese woman, Dr. Hu King Eng, first physician to the household of Li Hung Chang. Dr. Eng is a Christian, and comes of a wealthy family. She took her degree in the United States, and is now in charge of a hospital at Foo Chow. As to the earnings of the female doctor, they vary, of course, very largely. There are women who count their income in thousands, and one practicing in the West End of London earns $20,000 a year. Annie Romberger, of Philadelphia, has a practice worth $6,000 a year, and she is one of many who earn as much. Exchange.

On Dress, Viewed in Connection with the Society of Friends.*

BY HELEN BALKWILL.

It is not in the hope of being likely to say anything new, that we propose to add another to the already numerous articles, many of them so valuable, which are to be met with on this subject, but rather on the principle enunciated in the well-known words of the prophet Isaiah, "Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little, and there a little."

There are some subjects not in themselves of primary-spiritual importance, which are yet so closely inter-woven with those that are—the seen with the unseen, and the temporal with the eternal—that we can hardly fail to recognize the skill of Divine handiwork, or to feel that, when we endeavor to disunite these diverse but associated elements, the work of Christ is interfered with, and confusion ensues. Such a subject we apprehend is the one under consideration, and if so, it is worthy of our earnest prayerful thought.

Although dress is itself utterly inconsequential, except for such self-evident requirements as personal comfort, cleanliness, adaptation to climate, etc., it acquires an importance in the thoughtful mind which feels that nothing affecting life is too small to be made an instrument either to God's glory or his dishonor, and which observes, in looking abroad on the world and back over the history of the past, how potent an agency it has been for good or evil, and how widespread its influence is both in action and reaction.

It is a subtle connection, but one perfectly easy of recognition, that exists between the social condition of any age or country, and the style of dress accompanying.

All barbarous and heathen nations love ornament; this taste is the unrestricted prompting of human nature. Should a country advance in its moral condition under wise and beneficent rulers, the requirements of dress will probably be few and inexpensive. Should it lapse into sloth and luxury, even although at the same time advancing in art or intellectual culture, the dress will follow suit, and become, among those who can obtain it, laden with decoration, luxurious and costly. This verdict is given by history again and again. Take, for example, the contrast of Spartan simplicity and Persian splendor and effeminacy; the plain costumes of the Vaudois or Huguenot, and the rich and gorgeous clothing of the voluptuous Court of Catherine de Medicis, and of the French nation under its influence. Again, the homely garments of the Puritan Fathers and Scotch Covenanters, and the extravagances of dress which characterized almost universally all other classes during the Stuart régime.

But individual contrasts are even more striking. Let us set side by side and compare a few of these as they arise in the mind. Socrates, in his philosophical contempt for outward show, and his gay pupil Alcibiades, with his gorgeous robes and hair decked with golden butterflies; John the Baptist before Herod; Paul and Nero; Cornelia, the noble Roman matron, whose sons—afterwards the famous Gracchi—she brought as her jewels of value, to put to shame the glittering ornaments of her friends; Cleopatra and Monica, mother of Augustine, each in their age a type of worldly, and holy womanhood. Let us set Savonarola (whose preaching led the citizens of Florence and the surrounding districts to collect their frivolous adornments together in large heaps and destroy them), and Luther, against the gay courtiers and ecclesiastics whose sumptuous attire as well as luxurious living they denounced. The fair and unadorned Madame Guyon rises up to the mind beside the richly apparelled Madame de Maintenon, her contemporary and patroness; and which picture commends itself the most to our approval? Again, and not to make our list too long, let us lovingly regard for a moment the dignified simplicity familiar to us in the portraits of William Penn and his sweet wife; of Elizabeth Fry, William Allen, or Mary Fletcher, and sigh as we also think of the long train of gay ladies and courtly gentlemen who trod the earth at the same time with them, but who spent their time, money and talents, in endeavoring to propitiate that most fickle goddess, the "Fashion of this World."

Dress, then, as other accidents of life, is important in a twofold aspect: firstly, as it is the result of certain causes, and, secondly, as it is the cause of certain further results. In the examples we have adduced it will be seen that both moderation on the one hand, and excess on the other, originated in adverse states of feeling, whether of communities or individuals. This being so, and dress being, therefore, an indication of exalted or debased moral conditions, and of every variety between these two extremes, it must be taken as one evidence of the class to which the wearer belongs; how desirable then, that to Christians it should be as the unfurling on a ship's masthead of a dearly-loved national flag—or the steady upholding of a banner representing some cause with which we have willingly united ourselves. In other words, dress should be to the children of God in Christ Jesus (to borrow a well-known formulary of the Church of England) but an "outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace."

What, then, it may be asked, is the standard that we, as a religious Society, should strive to uphold, that so we may still fulfill the spirit, although many have laid aside the letter of the time-honored query of past days in regard to dress?

As before indicated there are certain desiderata that all admit in theory, although many dispute the exact definition and application of each word in practice. Adaptation of dress to climate, to the means of the wearer, and to circumstance, neatness and cleanliness, modesty and graceful propriety, we all approve—none probably being inclined to offer a plea in favor of unmended gloves, or thin boots in wet weather.

When we say that dress must be adapted to "circumstance," we know that on this word quite a superstructure may be raised in favor of the style of dress we deprecate.

A good position in life is said to be a "circumstance" which necessitates a certain richness and variety (if not ornament) of costume; but is it really so? Need a Christian woman, because she is entrusted with money or social influence, make more ado about the question wherewithal she "shall be clothed" than others? If she superabounds with this world's goods are there no worthier means of spending ever superfluous penny than on her own wardrobe? If such have their hearts glowing with the love of God, and devotion to his service, having raiment sufficient for cleanliness, neatness and warmth, will they not be therewith content, and joyfully devote their means as well as time to higher purposes?

A truly refined woman cannot fail, in the least expensive, or least ornamented attire, to be recognized as such. Simplicity is not a contradiction of good taste. Harmony of quiet coloring and elegant propriety of outline will be hers in right of her refinement; but her dignity will be maintained, and she will carry influence, and hold her position whether poor or rich, by the exercise of those Christian graces which the Apostle declares to be woman's best ornament. Apart also from the higher aspect of the case, it seems to us very questionable, whether good taste or delicacy of feeling permits the advertisement in personal attire of the resources of the wearer's purse.

In passing, we may here just advert to another "circumstance" which some Friends plaintively lament as preventing their adherence to the plain style of costume they would gladly maintain were it easily feasible; we refer to the obtuseness or self-will of the dressmaker, tailor, or milliner, who persists in sending home their garments more a-la-mode than their orders really justified. To remain thus subservient to the dulness or greed of those whose position makes them for the time our servants, is, however, evidently a weakness of our own, which we shall find some way of overcoming if we are really in earnest. As a rule, self-interest will prompt those we employ to seek to satisfy us if once they can be persuaded that what to them seems so extraordinary an idiosyncrasy is our real preference.

Another plea for following the stream is that "circumstances" throw the apology among those who hold a middle course between the open following of ever-changing fashion and a dress sufficiently plain to be singular. Against the practice of these they do not like to protest, saying, with an amiability admirable in itself, but we fear misapplied, "We see as those we love would have us to do; for we are we that we should set ourselves up to judge those so much better than we are or oppose their wishes?" Modesty and humility are beautiful in themselves, but may, like other virtues, be carried to extremes, and do harm. If we permit our deference to the views of others ever to interfere with our faithfulness to the dictates of what we feel to be the Spirit of Christ in our own hearts, we lend ourselves to the abettors to that stagnating policy of the Evil One by which he, transforming himself into an angel of light, chokes the natural upspringings of individual conviction, and hinders the growth and spread of Truth in the earth.*

To our own Master we each of us must stand or fall individually, and to the puzzled inquiry "Why then may ——— wear this or that with impunity which I cannot?" the answer may be applicable, "What is that to thee? Follow thou Me."

John, the Nurse.

everal years ago, when yellow fever was ing in Memphis, a stranger entered the city went directly to the relief committee.
I want to nurse," he said.
he physician looked at him critically. These e appalling times. The city was quaran-
d. Patients were numbered by hundreds, nurses were so scarce as to command r own prices. The man who had applied for perilous position was the last person one ld have picked out for such a service. He of rude appearance. His face was coarse, no trace of heroism in it. His hair was pped close, and he shuffled as he walked.
physician concluded he was not fitted for work, and told him he was not needed.
I wish to nurse," said the stranger. "Try for a week. If you don't like me then, niss me; if you do, pay me my wages."
he doctor again looked at the man's eyes professional scrutiny, and found them un-ching.
Very well," he said, "I'll take you, although,
e candid, I hesitate to do so. Keep honest sober. What's your name?"
he man hesitated. "Anything," he an-
red. "It doesn't matter. Call me John."

ked his way into the confidence of those storm yellow fever is as deadly an under-ng as the ride of the Light Brigade. John tireless and self-denying. Wherever the ilence was hottest he worked the hardest.

he suffering and the sinking loved and rev-l him. To the neglected and forgotten his gh face was as the face of an angel. In a of his own he spoke of Christian trust to dying patients.
I cannot understand God," he would say, ut I know Christ well." Before the nurse w it he was greatly honored in the stricken

Yet there was still something suspicious about the hero, and especially about his conduct on pay day. He dodged around back streets, and when he returned he was always without money. What did he do with his large wages?

One day he was followed. The spy felt confident that he should entrap John in some misdemeanor. Relief boxes had been placed in certain streets for the benefit of the yellow fever sufferers. Before one of these, in an obscure spot, the suspected nurse stopped, and put into the box the whole of his week's earnings.

That was John's noble secret.

But his story, like that of many another heroic life, had a tragic end. John sickened and died of the plague. When his body was made ready for its unnamed grave, a livid mark was found upon it—the terrible brand of a criminal—and the hospitals rang with the news that John, the noble nurse, had been a convict.—Youth's Companion.

For "The Friend."

Life—Temporal and Spiritual.

It is written "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

What life is, no man can tell. We see its effects, but mark neither "its entry nor its departure into the body." And in this respect life temporal, which is but as a spark and goeth out, and life spiritual, which endureth throughout eternity, are alike, for the presence of either is only known by its effects. Man may destroy the body which is the tabernacle of the earthly life, but he cannot touch the life which is eternal, for it dwelleth in the soul. And as the life of the body is sustained by the daily partaking of natural food, so is the life of the soul sustained by daily partaking of spiritual food, a hidden manna, which, silently and all unseen, falls around the tents of those who walk in the spirit. And as he who lives, hungers and seeks for his food, so does he, who is born of the Spirit and lives and breathes the same, hunger and thirst for spiritual food, and this food is the "word of God." And like as the life, so is the food—the natural bread, like the body, is perishable; that which comes from above is imperishable, it "abideth ever." When therefore the Spirit prays, to the Father of the spirits of all flesh, "Give us this day our daily bread, it undoubtedly craves for that food which is essential to a child of God who thus prays in spirit, food, both temporal and spiritual. And he who prays not, does he live? What of the child, who neither hungers nor seeks for food? Does it live? Can it grow? Can we ever have hopes of its becoming strong? Alas! no. We sorrow that it is doomed to die. And what of that higher life and higher end of man's creation? Can that soul live which neither hungers nor asks food of the Father of mercy? All souls are mine saith the Lord," and God who created man and gave to him hunger and the power of speech to ask for food to satiate this natural craving, also gave to man this spiritual life, a life needing daily food, and He by his Son has told us "Men ought always to pray and not to faint," and again "Ask, and it shall be given you." He pours out according to his promise "the spirit of grace and of supplications" that we may look to Him, ask, and receive that our joy may be full. But if a man hunger not, does he need food? If he be not hungry, will he ask? If he ask not, will he receive? Can God hear and answer prayer never breathed to Him? Doubtless He pours out many blessings upon men, which they neither ask for nor desire. Such was the priceless gift of his only begotten Son, who died for us even whilst yet enemies to God. Such is God's goodness and mercy in daily loading mankind with benefits. But it is God's desire that man should come into a closer union and communion with Him, should become one of the family of God, those who do the will of the Father, and God makes this well known to man by his word, and the hearing of this word and the doing of the will of the Father is the child's food whereby he is nourished up into eternal life. "Jesus said to his disciples, My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish his work;" so may each servant of Christ say, "My meat is to do the will of Him who hath called me with a high and holy calling." And he that hears the call and follows on in the path of obedience yet hears the voice of the Good Shepherd leading him in the way, by the still waters and into the green pastures of life.

Christ Jesus is "the way, the truth, and the life," and as He prayed the Father, so does his spirit in those who are his, breathe in prayer to God. God is a spirit, and prayer, an essential part of worship must needs be, whether expressed in words or not, "in spirit and in truth." Our inmost thought is not unknown to God, yet He by his Holy Spirit moves to and begets true prayer, for "Prayer is" as beautifully expressed by the poet Montgomery.

> "The soul's sincere desire > Uttered or unexpressed,
> The motion of a hidden fire
> That trembles in the breast."

Christ Jesus by his light whereby He "lighteth every man that cometh into the world," makes known to man his need; by the power of his love He draws man to himself, and prepares his heart to seek the Lord and pray to Him; as man's faith is begotten and grows He enlarges his needs that he may ask the more, but no prayer asked according to faith, and in the spirit of resignation to the Divine will, exceeds the power of God to grant, for this, if we walk well pleasing to God, He will answer far more abundantly than we can either ask or think.

Since then God provides so bountifully for the wants of our natural bodies which crumble into dust, beyond compare does He provide for our spiritual needs. Let us see to it then, that we neither reject nor neglect his abounding mercies, but, draw near to and live close to Him, so fulfilling his desire and purpose in our creation, to "glorify God in our bodies and in our spirits which are his."

Some think they are too well to go to a doctor, though dying of a stealthy disease. Others have a sort of spiritual hypochondria, imagining they have everything ailing them, while a visit to the doctor reassures them that they are well. All should welcome God's revelations of self, for they can but reassure the holy, and will clearly indicate the weak spot of the sickly.—The Christian Standard.

James Green.

James Green was born in 1813. He was the fifth son of John and Mary Green of Annahilt, near Hillsborough, and was one of a family of sixteen. He had thus the discipline which is inseparably connected with such social surroundings, especially in humble life. His elder brothers were educated at Lisburn School, but he had not that privilege. He was sent to the village school.

His father was a small farmer, struggling hard, with a devoted wife, to provide things honest in the sight of all men. In later life James Green often spoke of his father, remarking on his devout bearing in family worship, and how, after the reading of the Bible, he would frequently address his children, sometimes in a few words, on other occasions at greater length. He was in the station of Elder, and in this capacity words of exhortation in meetings often fell from his lips.

His mother lived to be eighty-seven years of age and was held in loving remembrance. Her son had been heard to say, "I seem now to see my mother walking through the fields, with her 'Friends' cap' on her head and the 'plain bonnot' hanging by the strings at her side."

Nurtured among religious influences, we believe in very early life the Divine call was distinctly heard by our dear friend, to which he was wise enough to respond. The fact that he had enjoyed but limited advantages as to education did not hold him back from obeying the heavenly voice, or yielding to the belief that his Lord had a public service for him in meetings for worship.

The Master, who selects his instruments from every walk in life, who sent "Amos the gatherer of sycamore fruits to prophesy in the King's Court," took possession of our dear friend and made him a channel through which the Divine blessing reached many hearts.

Though obedient to the heavenly vision, his times of conflict and discouragement were very real and humbling to the natural man. In his youthful days the Society of Friends was only recovering from the shock of Unitarian heresy, which desolated its borders and carried away every minister in Ireland except one, John Conran, who came into the Society by convincement. This state of things having robbed the Church of fathers and mothers in Israel, it became difficult for the younger people to obtain the help and encouragement they needed. But in simple reliance on his heavenly Master he continued speaking in meeting for nine years, without receiving any encouragement, and not until he had been speaking for fourteen years was he recorded a minister.

He settled down with his first wife, Sarah Douglas, near Brookfield School, and they attended Ballinderry Meeting. Speaking of his wife he used to say: "She left a little earthly paradise to come to me."

We have already stated that he was no stranger to spiritual conflicts; and to these were added after his marriage many severe temporal trials. Having invested his money and strength in his farm it seemed as though his faith was to be tested by the loss of all things. His potato crop failed; his cattle died; and his great fear was lest he should now be unable to meet his small debts At one time, quite overwhelmed by this prospect, chiefly on account of his position as a Christian, he retired to his room and buried his face in his hands, ready to say with one of old: "My affliction is greater than I can bear." Just at this moment his faithful wife stole into the room, and laying her hand on his shoulder, said: "James, it will all come right." She encouraged him to look up and trust in his Heavenly Father, and soon the truth of her words was proved. Next year, in consequence of the high prices during the Crimean war, the crop of grain was sold at four times the amount of the former year. This relieved the anxiety under which he suffered, and enabled him to pay his rent.

Up to this time he had been attending Ballinderry Meeting, a short distance from his home; but a concern was now laid on his heart that it would be right for him to attend Lurgan Meeting, involving a drive of six miles twice a week. Lurgan Meeting-house was the first built in Ireland, erected by William Edmundson in 1696. The old building had fallen into a dilapidated state; the rain was making its way through the roof, and the attendance had diminished to about a dozen Friends.

It was a trying prospect to James Green to give up to this service. In the first place there was a turnpike gate on the road, which made him very thoughtful as to whether he could afford to pay the toll twice a week, when going to meeting; secondly, to change his Monthly Meeting and to leave his own larger meeting of friends and relations was a close trial. The first day that he and his wife mounted their gig and turned their horse's head towards Lurgan he could not restrain his tears, which continued to flow most of the way. Very soon the toll-gate ceased to exist; and finding peace in attending Lurgan Meeting, he set to work to renovate the old meeting-house and make it comfortable; and soon the attendance of the meeting largely increased. Eventually our friends believed it right to move to a smaller farm somewhat nearer Lurgan. In process of time, largely through James Green's influence, subscriptions came in, and a beautiful and commodious new meeting-house, capable of holding three hundred people, was built in 1887 on the site of the old building. He also lived to see Lurgan Meeting enlarged in numbers and spiritual power, so that it now holds quite an important place in Ulster Quarterly Meeting.

The revival of the meeting was not accomplished without much prayer and earnest effort. James Green told a friend that he used to rise in the night to plead with God for blessing on the objects near his heart.

A nephew thus adds his testimony: "When accompanying my uncle in several of his journeys in Scotland and Ireland, I was in the habit of sleeping in the same bedroom, and was much impressed with his deep spiritual exercises during the night for the welfare of souls and the spread of Truth."

It was not only at home that he was known and loved; he very frequently held a minute for visiting meetings and families throughout Ireland. For the latter service he seemed to be specially gifted; and in his ordinary visits, after pleasant and social intercourse, a hush would fall on the circle, and our dear friend would be led out in loving sympathy and exhortation, in which the children, if any were present, were not forgotten, as they held a special place in his regard. He received three minutes from his Monthly Meeting for service in Scotland, and retained the last for several years, visiting that country five or six times. Of these visits, some were paid to those in Ayrshire and the neighborhood who had adopted Friends' views. The first visit was some thirty years ago and led many to closer inquiry into Friends' principles, some of whom afterward joined the Society His interest in these continued to the last.

Among the causes which built up Lurgan Meeting was his kindly hospitality to the members and attenders, many of them in humble life, whom he often invited to his house. He had a living concern that the Society of Friends was suffering from the want of social intercourse in these days of rush and hurry.

After many years of domestic happiness, his wife was taken from him by death, and a time of loneliness ensued until he once more found a true helpmeet in his work of faith and labor of love. He married Fanny Chapman in 1883, and his testimony on his death-bed was touching in regard to the blessing, temporal and spiritual, which followed this union. His home became increasingly the resort of those who needed help and sympathy. Each winter he collected a sum of money from his friends for those connected with the congregation in Lurgan who had fallen into needy circumstances and he took pleasure in distributing personal coals and clothing amongst them.

A few days before his death a friend asked him if there was anything she could do for him, when he replied: "There is a poor woman greatly afflicted; her income is very limited and she fears she may not be able to lay enough to pay for her funeral expenses." The matter was easily settled; but it showed how his mind even then was dwelling on the needs of others rather than his own.

In the spring of 1899, he contracted a severe cold. Being a healthy and active man, he did not pay sufficient attention to it, and pneumonia followed. After medical treatment and confinement to bed the lungs cleared and improvement set in, to the doctor's surprise; but at eighty-five years of age there did not seem power to rally. For three or four weeks after this he lay peacefully trusting in the great mercy of his heavenly Father through the blessed Saviour to one so "unworthy" as he; ways and constantly expressed himself to be When able he was much pleased to see friends. He was greatly interested in his young medical attendant, his Christian concern and love flowing out towards him.

He was very anxious not to give trouble to any one. He would say: "I should like the room to be a sanctuary." One of his friends exclaimed on leaving his bed-side: "This place is like a little heaven on earth!"

When oppressed by weakness and wearing he exclaimed: "How long, O Lord, how long I am listening for the chariot wheels! Bless be God for a well tuned harp! I am unworthy unworthy, but Thou hast given me the victory."

Near the end he awoke, exclaiming: "The glorious First-day morning! It is not a day Christ we worship, but a living and risen Lord And again: "I love everyone. Oh, if I could gather the whole world in my arms and them at the feet of my Saviour!"

Over and over again he spoke of God's lo

Items Concerning the Society.

only we as individuals are to be faithful to ts entrusted to us, but that we as a Society, be faithful also. We are not to consider es simply a band of Christians united in l Christian work, but as a body of believers to be faithful to the trust given to us. This cially important at the present time, when s such a strong tendency towards ritualism. Episcopalians show tendencies towards Roman-ism, the Methodists towards Episcopalianism. All denominations are more or less affected by the same tendency, and Friends have by no means been an exception. There is, under the circumstances, a peculiar need that we not only maintain our position, but that we become aggressive in showing forth the truth of the simplicity of the Gospel.—The Interchange.

Philadelphia, at Fourth and Arch Sts., on Second-day, Second Month 5th.

Abington, at Germantown, on Fifth-day, Second Month 8th.

Concord, at Media, on Third-day, Second Mo. 13th.

Salem, at Woodbury, N. J., on Fifth-day, Second Month 15th.

Caln, at East Caln, on Sixth-day, Second Mo. 16th.

Western, at West Grove, on Sixth-day, Second Month 23rd.

Burlington and Bucks, at Burlington, N. J., on Third-day, Second Month 27th.

Haddonfield, at Haddonfield, N. J., on Fifth-day, Third Month 15th.

Notes from Others.

WOMEN'S MINISTRY AS INCREASINGLY RECOGNIZED IN DIFFERENT CHURCHES.—The first woman in the world to be ecclesiastically ordained was Antoinette Brown Blackwell, who now lives in New York city. She was a graduate of Oberlin, and was ordained in 1852 in South Butler, Wayne County, N. Y., by the council called at Malone, N. Y., in 1863. She is the first woman ordained in the Universalist denomination. She was closely followed by Augusta J. Chapin, who was ordained in 1863. She is the first woman to receive the title of doctor of divinity. She was ordained by the First Congregational Church, but a Methodist minister preached the ordination sermon. Olympia Brown was the next woman ordained. Next came the ordination of Phœbe A. Hanaford, who was the first woman to be ordained in New England. She was ordained at Hingham, Mass., in 1868.

Since these women were ordained there have been nearly one hundred ordained in various denominations. Twenty-five years ago the appearance of a woman preacher in an orthodox pulpit would have created no end of excitement. To-day, it is so common an occurrence that on a recent week in Chicago three women preached in three different pulpits and no one saw in the fact anything unusual.—Phila. Times.

Brooklyn, N. Y., has often been called "The City of Churches," but there is only one church in it to every five thousand five hundred people. It is estimated by the clergymen who are united in a revival movement, that there are seven hundred and eighty-nine thousand persons in Brooklyn "who do not attend church."

It is absolutely necessary for a Church to uphold the standard under which it exists, if it would continue as a separate organization, even if there was no question of faithfulness to the truth involved.—N. Y. Sun.

Forms are important, but perilous if we forget what they stand for. Phrases are convenient, but easily become conventional. Religious forms tend toward formalism, and strike our honesty a blow. —S. S. Times.

Being born, the first time or the second time, is clearly not a duty to be performed by ourselves. No man can "born" himself. Turning to God, submitting himself to God—that is a duty. Being made a new man, being spiritually renewed, being given a clearer sight—that is a blessing from above. Turning, trusting—that is man's part. Renewing, regenerating—that is God's part. If we will do our part, God can be relied on to do his part. To doubt this is wrong and unjustifiable.—S. S. Times.

Theodore L. Cuyler asks whether some of the falling off of conversions in recent times is not to be attributed to a falling off in many minds of an implicit faith in the perfect truthfulness and inspired authority of the sacred Scriptures. "A certain style of reckless and irreverent criticism is working sad havoc in these days. The minister who wastes his week over studies that unsettle him, and then mounts his pulpit with shaking knees is not likely to win many converts."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The Senate has refused to reconsider its vote of ratification of the Samoan Treaty.

The House of Representatives, by a vote of 268 to 50, adopted the majority report in the Roberts case, and refused to admit the Representative-elect from Utah. The minority resolution, to seat and expel, had previously been defeated by a vote of 244 nays, 81 yeas.

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger says: The President has approved a recommendation by the Secretary of War that a part of the peninsula in Alaska embracing part of Point Spencer be reserved for public use.

The N. Y. Anti-Saloon League has started in this city the crusade which has proved so effective in Ohio. It hopes to combine the churches in a life to life grapple with the saloons. To-day (First Month 28th) addresses on the subject were made in fifty to sixty city churches, Rev. J. Q. A. Henry, who is the State Superintendent of the League, speaking in the Park Avenue Methodist Church. The work is not confined to this city. The whole State is to be divided into twelve districts, with a man in charge of the work in each district. J. Henry said in his address: "We want to accomplish a federation of all the churches to work against the saloons. This is the first time in the history of the temperance reform movement that there has been a plan in which the churches of all denominations can combine. The reason is that in the minds of ministers and laymen there is a firm conviction that there is a finish fight on between the church and the saloon. One or the other is right; one or the other is wrong. One must triumph. If the saloon stays, the church must go. The solution of the problem is in the church. The charge cannot be turned over to any other body. The saloon is hostile to Christianity, to citizenship and to true Americanism."

A report shows that there were landed at New York during 1899 107,415 cabin and 303,762 steerage passengers. They were brought over in 826 ships.

Since Third Month of last year New Jersey has enrolled corporations that represent a face stock value of $4,403,400,000.

It is said that the definitive notes, growing out of the negotiations for the "open door" to trade in China, have been received in Washington from all of the Powers, excepting Japan and Italy.

The official census of Puerto Rico, just completed, shows that the population of the island is 957,000. San Juan has 32,500 inhabitants and Ponce has 56,000.

Professor Henry A. Hazen, of the Weather Bureau, whose skull was fractured in a bicycle collision in Washington on the night of First Month 22d, died the next night.

The Kansas City Journal says: "The people of the United States consume 4,000,000 bushels of peanuts annually, at a cost of about $10,000,000. The growing of the peanut in this country is gradually increasing, but much of the product consumed is still brought from abroad, notably from Spain, Egypt and Japan. Yet the South Atlantic seaboard and the Lower Mississippi Valley, as well as other parts of the United States, have been shown to be abundantly responsive to the cultivation of this ground nut, the average yield being about sixty bushels per acre.

"Although the peanut has been used mainly as a confection, rather than as a food, its value as a substantial is remarkable when analyzed and placed in comparison with the values of other vegetable products. For example, it is shown that the nutrition of this nut is greater than that of bacon or butter, nearly twice as great as that of cheese or peas, about three times as great as that of veal, beef, rye flour or rice, and about ten times as great as that of milk or potatoes. The cost of the peanut per nutritive unit is about one-eighth as much as that of beef or veal, one-sixth that of butter, one-fifth that of bacon, one-fourth that of cheese or milk, and considerably less than that of rice, rye flour, potatoes or peas.

"The peanut vine is a most excellent article for fattening cattle. Its fatty property is 15.06 per cent., as compared with 2.11 per cent. for clover hay, 1.97 for timothy hay, 4.04 for cowpea hay and 2.03 for alfalfa.

"Isn't it time that the peanut were taken more seriously by our agriculturists in the peanut zone?"

The wages of mill operatives in New England are higher than at any time since 1881.

Vermont in maple sugar stands first in the Union, making nearly 2,000,000 pounds annually. More butter per cow is made in Vermont than in any other State—more pounds of wool per sheep are clipped than in any other State, and more bushels of potatoes are raised per acre than in any other State.

"Within the next five years Missouri will startle the world," predicts State Geologist Gallagher, in a recent interview, "with the great amount of lead, zinc, copper, nickel, cobalt and coal mined in the State. Missouri is rich in these minerals, the richest of any State in the country."

The Chicago Tribune says: According to the American Lumbermen's annual review the stock of white pine lumber in the country continues to decrease rapidly. The stock at the mills is now 2,278 million feet, a decrease of 766 million feet from that of last year. Going back through the previous years it appears that the present stock of white pine is the smallest since 1890, while at the same time the white pine resources of the country are over 25 per cent. less than they were at that time. This shrinkage in the forest area already means a shortage of 2,000 million feet, which must be annually filled by the substitution of Georgia yellow pine. It has been estimated that the whole remaining area of white pine forests will be practically denuded within five years, and by the time that happens the areas of Southern pine will also be greatly reduced by supplying the increasing deficit. At present the Minnesota pineries show the greatest activity, while those of Michigan and Wisconsin have ceased to produce in large quantities. In what is known as the Chicago district, including Michigan and Wisconsin, the cut of 1899 showed a falling off of 345 million feet since 1898, and of 1,200 million feet since 1892. Even Minneapolis already feels a shortage. In a few years the white pine industry will have gone the way of the whaling and sealing industries. Unfortunately it will be more difficult to supply the place of white pine than of whalebone and sealskins.

The American troops, under General Schwan, have occupied Santa Cruz, on Lagunda de Bay. The town was found to have been deserted.

General Otis reported that the coast of Lagunda de Bay and neighboring sections will be opened to unrestricted traffic on the 27th, and that the western coast of Panay is now open to commerce.

General Otis cabled from Manila that released Spanish prisoners, including 74 officers, 1,000 enlisted men, 22 civilian officials, 21 wives and 35 children, were furnished transportation to Spain on First Month 26th.

There were 498 deaths in this city last week, reported by the Board of Health. This is 27 less than the previous week and 20 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 270 were males and 228 females: 72 died of pneumonia; 58 of consumption; 44 of heart disease; 23 of diphtheria; 18 of convulsions; 17 of apoplexy; 16 of debility; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of marasmus; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of nephritis; 11 of pericarditis; 11 of old age; 10 paralysis; 10 of uraemia; 9 of peritonitis; 9 of bronchitis; 8 of cancer, and 8 from casualties.

WHILE the principles of Truth and righteousness, for which this periodical must stand, have their bearing on all politics and human conduct, yet we deem the usefulness of THE FRIEND will be best maintained by holding up the standard of Truth for its universal light upon all departments of life, rather than lowering it to the dust of partisan politics. If the Truth, faithfully presented, smites at a party, we cannot help that—but our aim is the Truth, and not the party.

We desire to be preserved from admitting any political mention which shall draw out political discussion, as such, towards our pages, since these are not designed for such an arena. Even the admission of a correspondents' view that our Chief Magistrate would, in the first place, have avoided the war had Congress permitted him, has seemed equivalent to our exonerating him from responsibility of all the warfare of which he has been the instrument since. We cannot exonerate any man from being the consenting instrument of a war which he administers. Every Adam has his first inducement, which does not excuse the sin which is the sequel of yielding to the temptation. With this general statement we leave campaign details to papers whose business they are.

WE regret that, through an error, both of memory and of judgment, in attempting to transfer a name in Stephen Grellet's account of Thomas Paine's last days (page 214 of this volume), the initials "W. H." were made to read as William Hinsdale." We are informed that there was no William Hinsdale connected with the matter. The inference under which we spelled out the initials appears now unwarrantable.

WE may take occasion from this circumstance to remark that we have generally preferred to see, in literary articles, the names (or at least surnames) of persons printed in full, rather than their mere initials. There may sometimes be, as there was in the above case, a reason more serious than brevity for presenting the initials only. But in general the effect of the bare capitals is to mar the appearance of a page and to cheapen the dignity of the name so scantily presented. As different parties are having in preparation for our columns manuscripts concerning deceased Friends, this suggestion may be timely.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Our Attitude Towards Pastorate Bodies.

My attention has been arrested by an article in THE FRIEND on "An Aspect of the Pastoral System." The statements made by the writer in the Atlantic Monthly are informing. . . . I was not aware that the tendency spoken of by the author to confine the paid ministry to young or middle-aged men, had made such progress. But if it has, it is a tendency inherent in the system. Friends need have little to do with it beyond being quiet spectators.*

Yet we need not be looked upon as waging warfare against the prevalent theological training of the clergy, while steadfastly maintaining that such practice is altogether foreign to our vital principles. Nor do we feel hostile to the Christian sects around us in maintaining that such educated ministry is foreign to the religion introduced by Christ and his Apostles. It does not appear that any of the primitive messengers of the Cross had a literary training for that office. The case is so plain to the mind of an unprejudiced observer that Neander, a converted Jew, says, in his church history, "The institution of a separate order of men to attend to the religious interest of the masses of humanity, has no warrant in the sayings of Christ or in the writings of his Apostles. It is altogether borrowed from the Jewish priesthood."

Friends, while formerly maintaining this ground, should provoke no controversy with their neighbors who patronize theological seminaries. The distinction between their system of worship and ours is a broadly defined one, so that while a stated ministry can have no place among Friends, it is one of the necessities of the manner of worship of others. It is a well-known circumstance in Christian history that, along with the outward Church, coming under the patronage of the temporal powers, arose the demand for a body of trained clergy to administer its offices.

And it is also known that during the first centuries of the Church there was a considerable body of Protestants who, in their deeper

* Our correspondent here evidently confines his view to bodies outside the name of Friends, as carrying on the system of paid and stated ministry. His position has our sympathy wherever that exclusive view is permissible. It would be a relief to stand apart in a living, silent testimony, and as quiet spectators of others' systems, if we could do it as at a distance, and not see their pastorate system entangling itself with bodies under our own name. We may say these thus adopting the foreign system are not Friends. Their change to the outside principle of ministry is a rightful forfeiture of the name of "Friends." Still, their profession of our name brings on us the burden of a disclaimer and of remonstrance concerning practices which belie the name of Friends. Our contention on the pastorate system is aimed without the camp, chiefly for its application within the lines professing our name. Here, also, we may yet come to the point where a free and living ministry will be its own best and sufficient vindication.—EDITOR.

In realizing a closer walk with God, the preaching among them was by revelation from a Divine call to the ministry. History appears to show that most of those who were steadfast in the faith amid the rigors of persecution, those whose names, if we had them, would make up the list of martyrs, were dissenters from the ceremonial worship as maintained by the learned and the great of this world.

From the sheltered position which Friends occupy, we may look with a deep interest upon the progress of our fellow-professors, whose mode of worship thus differs from ours. It is obvious that, apart from the question of youthful energy, their system has its difficulties. If it were the extent of their object to hold a congregation together on a platform of respectability, the trouble would be lessened. But as the solemn business of bringing souls to Christ is a foundation purpose of their organized association, there is involved the necessity of pressing home upon every member, high or low, the great work of regeneration. To do this earnestly is calculated to give offense to the refined respectability of the people, and the consciousness that he is dependent upon that people for the means of supporting his family adds sadly to the embarrassment of the instrument who is disposed to be faithful to his high trust. It was for fulfilling his duty just here that the great and good Jonathan Edwards was discharged from his living at Northampton, and I am inclined to think that here is one of the causes for the preference of young or middle-aged men for clerical services, as stated by our author.

But the distinction between the worship of Friends and that of those who pay their ministers is so well defined that, while a sermon and vocal prayer are an essential part of the latter, they are no necessary part of the former mode of worship. We believe that God, in his care for his Church, does, from time to time qualify and call men and women to the ministry, and when this ministry is exercised in faithfulness to the Divine guidance, it promotes the comfort and edification of the assembly. But as this is not a necessary part of worship, we may enjoy a full measure of heavenly help without it. So fully is the worship for which He calls to be performed in Spirit and in Truth, that we have cause to believe the Divine life is best nourished where meetings are commonly held in silence. On these solemn occasions it is highly unprofitable to be in continued expectation of hearing preaching.

THE SECRET OF A CALM AND HAPPY LIFE.—The secret of a calm and happy life and death is to have an habitual sense of God's presence and communion of our soul with Him. To walk with Him in the absorbing consciousness of his loving eye never removed, his loving arm never untwined. Christ dwells in the believer's heart, and He is always near. What we all need to learn is how to walk with Him, hour by hour, as a man with his friend—without effort thinking of Him, without hesitation obeying Him, to have Him wherever we go, to make joy safe by asking Him to share it, to rob care of its carefulness by casting it on Him in prayer.—The Episcopal Recorder.

First Month 2nd, 1893.—"In an unsent note for a circulating letter among some of his grand-children, J. H. wrote, 'In looking over a long life, I think my stream has run remarkably smooth, the ripples and currents have been small, compared to very many others, and I lay it to three things: First, by endeavoring from early life to do right; second, favored mostly with good health; and third (but not the least), a good companion, a real help-meet. . . . I often look back with thankfulness that I was thus favored in my choice, believing that I was wisely directed. Oh that every one would seek wisdom! Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom, and with all thy getting get understanding' (Prov. iv: 7).

"I presume the writer meant Divine wisdom. The whole chapter is worth reading. I have so little to do. I read a good deal. I have read the journal of Ann Branson regularly through and am now going through the five volumes of 'Piety Promoted.'

"It is very interesting to me, as there are accounts of so many that I knew, or knew about. But I can't read all the time, and I sometimes think . . . that I most wish I had something I could do, for . . . time sometimes hangs heavily upon me, and I am ready to wonder why I am kept here so long, unless I could be of more service."

"A Morning Thought," written about two years later, seems to be appropriate here:

Why do I live? I've sometimes sighed,
In walking thus life's thorny road,
But stern reproving thought replied,
"Ask not such question of thy God."

Then—how can I improve my time,
Since I've no work my hands can do,
But read and write until I'm tired,
Then sit and take a nap or two.

Sometimes a friend or two comes in,
And then in pleasant conversation
We seem to while away the time,
And thus receive some consolation.

Thus day by day speeds on,
And year succeeds to year,
Until the sands of life have run
Their nine and eightieth year.

What has this lengthened life attained
With all the accounts brought in?
Have I the cause of Truth maintained,
Or walked in ways of sin?

And now my allotted time is short—
Earth's pilgrimage 'most done.
Oh, may my end be joy and peace,
A crown of life be won!

Thus I with firm, resigned will,
My stay upon this earth commend
To Him who holds the thread of life—
My Guide, my Comforter and Friend.

JOHN HAMPTON.

Second Month 26th, 1896.—"I am ninety years old to-day. Was at our usual week-day meeting, and all our children that are living, six in number, came here to dine with us. We received several letters in kind remembrance of my ninety-first anniversary. We had a very pleasant day indoors and out. The children are now gone home: The evening has come, and to me it has been a solemn, yet agreeable day. Gratitude, thankfulness and praise are feelings of my heart, as I pen these lines.

"Where shall I find language to portray feeling, in thinking of the numberless blessi bestowed on me and mine through such a n ber of years. Oh, how can I enough magn honor and adore the great and merciful G whose tender care has watched over and n cifully guarded me through so long a life. now, oh, Holy Father, leave me not when earthly man faileth, but keep, oh keep m the way I should go and be with me to the that I may depart in peace and be with eternally at rest."

Second Month 26th, 1897.—"According the account of my birth as given in my moth Bible, I am ninety-one years old to-day. I mother's Bible because it was given to he her father Zachariah Betts, and she a s time before her death gave it to me. A vorite legacy, and one that has been well c for. ry Hampton, the loved companion, so af- nately alluded to in my grandfather's ngs, was the daughter of Samuel and Williams, and was born Fourth Month 1812, near Mt. Pleasant, Ohio. Her great lfather was Edward Williams, of Derby-, North Wales; and her grandfather was rt Williams. My grandmother was one of ost unpretending mothers in our Israel, ed most by those who knew her best," as yet highly esteemed by those who were n in her company for only a short time. many who were hitherto strangers, have ied to their appreciation of her worth, a short acquaintance; while those who friends and neighbors through a long pe- f years, can testify to the evenness of her er, constancy of spirit and her readiness lp and cheer in time of trial and affliction. ing little in writing for the perusal of e she has left behind, she, "being dead, peaketh."

r the memory of her quiet, unassuming , her modest appearance at all times, and small appreciation of self, as well as the f cold water she was ever ready to hand , all speak in louder terms than fluent s from tongue or pen.

urneying together through a period of st sixty-eight years, the language seems cable to them. They "were lovely and sant in their lives and in their death they not [long] divided."

ooking with a quiet assurance, that their day's work had not been left until the evening hour, they each calmly waited for the coming of the pale messenger, as trustful children wait for the expected parent to come and take them home.

Illustrative of this, we find these expressions taken down by a grandchild, to whom they gave them forth a few years before their summons home.

She was very unwell and said in substance, "I don't see how this will turn with me, whether I'll get well again or not, but I hope 'twill all be right. It would be a poor time to make our peace of mind on a sick bed."

He feelingly said: "I'm just waiting till my time comes to leave this vale of tears."

The seasons of suffering which these dear ones were given at the close, were of short duration. The sands of life were so nearly run, that it took but little time for disease to run its course.

My dear grandfather was taken with severe suffering on the fourteenth of Fourth Month, 1898, and breathed his last on Third-day morning, the nineteenth of the same, aged ninety-two years, one month and twenty-three days. During his acute illness he was frequently heard to say that it would be all right whichever way it turned. His day's work had been done, and he did not seem to have much to say, though a few times some sweet expressions dropped from his lips, showing his mind to be stayed on the goodness of the Creator.

No dark forebodings harassed his thoughts of the future, and his passage through the dark valley was quiet and easy, so that his relatives and friends believe that he was permitted an entrance into the everlasting realms of peace and joy, prepared for the righteous of all generations.

Not quite nine months after his departure, his beloved companion was also taken to join his ransomed spirit, as we reverently believe, in ascribing glory and honor and high renown unto the Lamb that was slain.

On the eighth of First Month, 1899, she went to the bedside of the first-born son who was very low with pneumonia, he lovingly kissed her, and said, "My dear mother. As bright as an angel!" This she said repaid for all the trouble she felt in giving him up.

The next day she sat beside his bedside, and watched him breathe his last; and a day or so later she was taken to her home, being far from well, but very anxious to go, and expressed herself as being very thankful to be at home.

But she continued to grow rapidly worse, with the same disease, until the morning of the sixteenth, a few hours less than a week after her son peacefully passed away. She too, calmly left us, aged eighty-six years, eight months and eighteen days. Thus ended another beautiful life. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

Neither of them had left it until their dying day to offer loving counsel to their offspring and friends; and these now testify that all along through their long and useful lives they hesitated not to give their testimony to the watchful care of the unslumbering Shepherd of Israel to advise and entreat those with whom they had to do, to follow the guiding of his Holy Spirit; and to count not the pleasures of the world of sufficient moment to estrange them from the love of the dear Redeemer.

An Old Letter Concerning Stephen Grellet, Mary Dudley, &c.

Third Month 5th, 1819.

Thou hast most probably heard that Stephen Grellet has spent part of the winter in London, where he had a meeting with the Jews. From the general abhorrence which these people entertain for Christians and their places of worship, it was expected it would not be large, but contrary to anticipation, about 1,600 assembled, conducting themselves during silence pretty orderly. After Stephen had stood for some time a considerable restlessness appeared, with many going out, which was trying to his feelings. However, this soon subsided, the sequel proving that so great was their satisfaction with what was communicated that they had only gone out to collect and bring in more of their friends. With such a people, (continued M. B., who sent this account to a friend in Lincolnshire), it is cause of humble gratitude that he was so helped, that the excellent cause was so exalted.

S. Grellet's labors have been of an extensive and extraordinary description. His last general service previous to his leaving the city was (accompanied by W. Forster) visiting all the prisons, excepting King's Bench and Marshalsea, to which they were denied access. At least 1,000 individuals were visited in these abodes of misery, and, in Newgate, of unspeakable wretchedness. Their tender hearts were moved with the deplorable state of the females particularly, the prison allowance of three ounces of bread per day being below the par on which human nature can subsist, compelled the sale of every, and more than every, suitable garment. Elizabeth Fry, having been warmly interested, is now engaged, after a survey of the prisoners, in deeds of kindness, providing clothing for the destitute; and probably will prevail on some to go, or join some friends to procure an amelioration of those forlorn ones. The state prisoners of Cold Bathfields stood aloof at first, but a great change in their dispositions to the visitors was evident before the work was got through, and in many instances remarkable solemnity and tenderness evinced that mercy and goodness were there.

Mary Dudley had a meeting in Westminster quarter with the rich and noble. S. Grellet had one in the same quarter with the ignoble and abandoned females. The opportunity afforded him some consolation, and many by their tenderness evinced they felt the touches of Divine love awakening them to a sense of their condition.

M. Dudley's concern extended to Windsor. The invitation that was given was better attended to than in the former instance, and many of the most distinguished persons of the town and its vicinity were present, several from the castle, and, by all accounts, a most memorable time it was. After a most powerfully convincing testimony, she was favored in a most extraordinary manner in supplication, and was led to petition for the king in a way that tendered almost all present. The solemnity was said to be marvellous, and she has at times since acknowledged she had never experienced the like descendings of divinely empowering influence. A person present, after the supplication, penned it down from memory, and presented it to the queen, who was greatly affected at its perusal to the shedding of many tears. She dispatched a lord in waiting, with a message to M. D., directing every comfort and accommodation might be rendered her. A clergyman spoke to her at the close of the meeting, offering her his church I think, saying he was convinced, beyond all manner of doubt, that she was commissioned to preach the gospel, and if she came to his place he would give every information and take the needful care. On her enquiry where he lived and his naming the place, she said she had not been without thoughts of being there, and soon after went, and a season of favor was there witnessed.

She next went to Stains, and there was largely engaged and with great power. Being much exhausted, she fainted as soon as the meeting was closed. On recovering and looking up she saw the clergyman standing over her, and she exclaimed, "Art thou here?" He replied, "Yes; and what is far better, the Lord is here also."

"WORSE THINGS THAN WAR!"

Worse things than war! O breathe it not to me,
That aught on earth more terrible can be!
That men their noble talents should bestow
With dire effect to lay their brethren low!

Worse things than war! Is human blood so cheap
That we therefrom may plenteous harvest reap?
Is tenderness of heart so rare a thing
Men can rejoice in human suffering?

Worse things than war! If fiends were set at large,
Well might they glory in "a splendid charge!"
With lance in rest, and all their soul on fire,
How would they dash through mingled blood and mire!

Worse things than war! These deeds of madness came From lust of power, and thirst for worldly fame!
Heard ye that crash? 'twas but a bursting shell
That 'mid the homes of peaceful mortals fell!

Worse things than war! What do I now behold?
More awful scenes than can in words be told!
Dismembered bodies gasping yet for breath,
And wounds that mean protracted living death!

Worse things than war! Where, Virtue, where art thou?
Nor sex nor age can hope for mercy now!
'Twere vain to plead for grace in Pity's name,
When lust of victory doth its victims claim!

Worse things than war! Well may we kneel to pray,
That from this world such scenes may pass away!
Should not all nations for this end combine,
And round the Saviour's brows their laurels twine?"

—Wm. Kitching, in the Herald of Peace.

"The ground of a thousand mistakes is the not considering deeply that love is the highest gift of God—humble, gentle, patient, love; that all visions, revelations, manifestations whatever, are little things compared to love. It was once thought that the sea separated nations; but we have come to look upon it as the great highway of the world. So we once thought that our trials would separate us from God, but we have learned that they are the highway over which we pass to closer fellowship with God.—M. H. Kendrick.

All will admit this, and grieve that factory and servant girls, &c., should be led astray as they are by the love of display—but are we doing all in our power to turn them aside from this, to them, often fatal indulgence? Could we possibly reckon up the number of lives ruined by the inordinate love of dress, how it would appal us! It is a passion springing from vanity and the love of admiration, and these in turn take their rise in that secret self-love which reigns supreme in the carnal mind, and lurk in hidden recesses of the renewed heart, until finally driven out by the expansive power of the love and life of Christ. Oh, what untold mischief it has accomplished! A favorite weapon indeed in the enemy's hands for the fall of the unwary. What money has wrongfully been used in its indulgence! What thought, what time, what loving hearts and happy lives have been turned to gall and bitterness by its power! Hand in hand with strong drink, this besetment has smoothed the downward path to destruction to many thousands of our sisters—and yet it is so trivial a matter, we are told, so unworthy of our thought, so unimportant!

We have many times lately been led to regret the inclination apparent among some Friends to return to the custom of the world in the wearing of mourning. To enumerate all the evils attendant on this particular bondage would make this essay too long.

We believe the rational explanation of this habit of Christendom is, that the customary style of dress is felt to be incongruous with the solemnities attendant on death. Face to face with the awful realities of such a time, the heart turns with loathing from its accustomed vanities, and finds in sombre garments a more harmonious clothing; but even here fashion often intrudes and deflects this feeling into but another channel for needless display.

The Christian woman, on the other hand, if living in the continual presence of her God and Saviour, is familiar with thoughts of eternity. Death is robbed of its terrors to her, its lessons are consecrated even amid sorrow. She learns to think with peace and trust of those called away, and feels or need feel no unfitness in wearing by the graveside the clothes deemed fit and proper for Christian life. Earnestly do we hope that a testimony so long borne, so much respected, and still so loudly called for by the needs of the present day, may never be relinquished by our Society as a body, whatever may be done in this respect by individual members.

In favor of the study of the beautiful and ornamental in dress, we have heard some Friends adduce the "lilies of the field"—a simile used by our Lord with an opposite application. "Consider the flowers," they say, "how gay, how bright! What variety of form and hue! Does not God teach us a lesson through them that the young in the flower of their age should be adorned, and 'beauty go forth beautifully?'" To this we answer that God has given to every creation its own charm, as to "every seed his own body." The beauty of the flowers is one, the beauty of childhood and youth in the human race another, and they are not to be confused. To deform the fair proportions of the human frame by ugly garments we would never advocate, but the young, when simply attired, to a pure taste, we do not hesitate to say lovelier than when decked in the vagarie fashion.

To each creation its own beauty; and as advancing years produce changes in highest creature, man, we also believe every age should be attractive. Manhood womanhood, not with the fleeting beauty o flowers or the charms of youth, but wi higher and more dignified adornment. Wh say how admirable is the full developmer maturity? While old age and hoar hairs, linked with the Christian graces peculiarl plicable to its advanced stage of life, h beauty all its own—one better felt thar scribed.

The beauty of our race, then, is, we bel best maintained, under every condition, b sociation with moderation in dress, harr in detail and absence of superfluity.

There is a weakness connected with thi sire for beauty, apart from appropriatene dress which leads people to assume a quite unfitted to their years and condi Who, we would ask, can think of Volt decked with wreaths of roses and holiday on the eve of decay and death, without a der, or see middle age imitating the appear of youth, and old age of maturity, without ing that the want of perception portraye deeper than in missing the fitness of c fabric or cut, and consists in a sad, if not gerous, obliquity of spiritual vision or du of spiritual life?

Another argument in justification of the ent liberty exercised on this subject amc us is that it is only a truthful evidence of ing. "The generation before ours," it is "were coerced by moral compulsion intc hypocritical wearing of a badge known as timony against fashion, which their own sciences did not require of them, and matters are better because now we see we really are." Well, supposing this is so that these endless varieties of costume (d ing according to the hour of the day), embroideries and laces and ribbons, chignons and head-dresses, these feather flowers and jewels, these (so-called) pan and other curiously tortured and contrived ments, which to the uninitiated seem wit number, are truthful in what they indicat question still remains, What do they indic Are they not so many "outward and vi signs of inward and spiritual" conditions? (not graces). If so, is it any cause for gratulation?

It is a grief to many to notice that among Christian mothers there is a gro laxity on this point. They gratify their in spending money to adorn their sweet ones, thinking that their innocent minds not in infancy be hurt by the pretty robes ribbons, and, as they grow older, the little and dresses. But we would affectionately these dear mothers when and where they be able to draw the line? Can they detec first sense of gratified vanity, heartbur envy or pride, as it passes over the young h and sears as it passes? Do they consider thus the future character may be marred, rows laid up in store for years to come, or it be bitter struggles, should an awakened science protest against the habits of early equire that they be laid aside? Do these g-hearted ones consider also that insen- their own hearts and minds grow accus- d to superfluities in the dress of their ren which they would never have indulged emselves? Oh, what great responsibilities on the Christian parent in this respect !

ference has already been made to the ads' peculiar dress, and, although it is cer- y contrary to custom to enter a plea for iarity as well as simplicity of style, we hat, while dealing with the entire subject affects the Society of Friends, this ques- of a distinct costume must not be entirely ooked, and, a priori, we cannot help ob- ng that one style of dress, simply and con- ntly adhered to, does away at one sweep a multitude of the difficulties which prac- y beset this question.

course, form is immaterial in itself, and hen one form, unobjectionable in its char- and answering every purpose the garment signed for, is understood by the world as senting a protest against gayety and fash- ve think it may have a mission, and a use- ne. But the Friends' dress does more. It esents striking and uncompromising religi- principles on a variety of topics, and these s of ours need to be upheld before the eyes ristendom by every means in our power. re a very small body, and therefore can- afford to lay aside any justifiable means, r of union among ourselves, or of holding tinct testimony before others. The mere of a plain-dressing Friend is thus useful minding people of wholesome truths they t otherwise forget; and so thoroughly has riendly appearance won the respect of the ral public, that evil or profane conversation ldom attempted in its presence. While is a check upon evil, it is also often pro- ve of good. What opportunities for serious ersation has it not opened? What appar- chance meetings in travel, etc., have gh its means resulted in large blessings ife-long friendships.

before hinted, it is also a bond to unite gether. The pleasure of recognizing "the d" at the first glance we have probably of us felt, and how much we may miss gh our present inability to do so. An y-read distinctive token of membership by should never be divorced from careful licity, but need not in the least interfere as much variety in other particulars as be desirable. It does not at all imply that ho wear it should be tied down to one ex- pattern of dead uniformity.

ch a mark is undoubtedly a help to one has determined to dress plainly, who is ched to our principles, and who yet con- ly associates with those who would not ple to dispute every divergence from com- custom which the young or timid disciple t feel it right to make. "This is so be- ng," and that "nothing but proper." None is, however, is attempted with the wearer well-known plain costume, an innate sense ropriety teaching people that fine clothing congruous with a Friend's coat or bonnet. same remark applies to the attendance of es of public amusement, to which, although y young Friends, and some of them teachers rst-day schools, think it permissible to go themselves, they do not often invite their acquaintance who wear a Friend's dress to accompany them. Can we guess why?

Both to the Friend thus marked, and to his or her associates, the dress is found to be a silent monitor, saying, like the friendly signpost, "This is the way, walk in it;" "This is inconsistent;" or "This is lawful and right;" "Do this;" Leave the other undone." In wearing the Friend's dress you not only feel the responsibility of acting up to your own views, but also of maintaining a course which shall be in accordance with the character of the Society you thus outwardly represent.

Plain dressing is a sign, recognized by all ranks and classes, that you are in earnest, or wish to be in earnest, in the matter of practical piety, and, if it provokes a smile, it also, as a rule, wins respect. It unmistakably opens the door among the poor. The Friends' dress is seldom, if ever, unwelcome by the bedside of the sick, where gay clothing seems little else than a mockery, and to the wretchedly poor and sinful it comes with soothing. They listen to one who they see has a little cross of their own to bear, however indistinctly they may read all its meaning, while they often inwardly resent and turn a deaf ear to the exhortations to self-denial and self-sacrifice which come from some visitors equally devoted to the Lord and to them, and whose words are equally good, but who in themselves bear no evidence of the graces they inculcate.

The chief objection to a peculiar garb which has met us is that of its peculiarity, "making one's self different from others," as if it implied "stand not near to me, for I am holier than thou." But they misunderstand its meaning who interpret it thus. When peculiar attire indicates worldly distinction or earthly honors, it is not objected to. If any ordinary useful purpose suggests its adoption, it is also readily accepted as matter of course. Do we object to the police uniform, or the distinctive dresses of railway officials? But, it may be replied, that the inmates of our prisons and workhouses and reformatories often object to their peculiar dress. Yes; but why? Because that dress denotes shame and disgrace. That is the reason, and these various examples all lead to the conclusion that, if we love that of which a peculiar dress is the outward sign, we shall love the dress, and vice versa. If we thoroughly love Quakerism, and believe in it, as the purest amd highest system of Christianity extant, we shall not dislike the dress. If, on the contrary, we have not adopted its distinctive tenets, but take our stand on the broad basis of entirely undenominational Christianity, then we shake it off.

Before leaving the subject, let us see if Scripture gives any sanction for a distinctive garb. The priestly vestment we will not adduce, as we have not adduced the clerical dresses of the present day, believing both to belong to the old dispensation. But there was the prophet's garb; there was the raiment of camel's hair, and the robe without a seam; there were the holy women of old, who, forsaking the chains, the bracelets and the mufflers, etc., of their day, must have been singular enough among the proud daughters of Jerusalem.

In post-apostolic times there were the early Christians, who long maintained, history tells us, a most striking and singular simplicity. In the middle age the testimony was again upheld, though sadly overstrained and perverted, by the different orders of monks and nuns who arose—and in later times no religious body has more clearly and distinctly held up the standard of simplicity united with singularity than our own. And what women have arisen under its auspices!* Mothers in Israel, adorned not with "that outward adornment of plaiting the hair, or of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel," but with the "meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

And now, in drawing this essay towards a close, we would most lovingly exclaim, Oh, were we but obedient! Could we but be obedient to the discipline of the Cross and to our Master's Spirit on this one point of Christian duty, what blessed results might follow! How would fresh light arise and shine in our hearts, fitting us for higher service, and enabling us cheerfully to brave the ridicule or dislike of that world, which we know, on highest authority, loves its own and hates that which opposes it. Let us, then, weigh afresh, as in the balance of the Sanctuary, the needfulness of these passing fashions, arraigning each one in order before us, and if it is found wanting to our deepest sense of right and fitness, let us unhesitatingly discard it. It was thus our ancestors did in their day, and why should we degenerate? If we do, others must arise to take our place. Already a society is formed to encourage inexpensive propriety of dress, and here and there we hear of ministers and others striving to lift up their congregations and friends to a purer Christian grace. Like the great missionary, Judson, they feel the contradiction that the common custom of Christendom presents to the self-denial they seek to inculcate. These good and enlightened men and women lament with common consent the decadence of our Society on this question.

Surely, then, it becomes us, the women of a Society so long associated with an unwavering testimony against worldliness, to query with ourselves very closely whether the time has indeed come for the standard to fall from our hands? Are we—who alone of any class of women in the world, hold unchallenged and unhindered, nay, warmly encouraged by our brethren, the commission, unmistakably bestowed upon our sex through the prophet Joel, and confirmed to us in apostolic days, to preach as the Spirit of the Lord may direct, the glad tidings of great joy to the praise of his glory; who may also hold dignified and responsible positions in the Church as elders and overseers; and in other ways share in the exercise of its discipline—now to let fall this testimony? The responsibility of our position we cannot escape if we would, and it lays a burden upon us so to endeavor to order our lives and conversation so as to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

Firmly and unhesitatingly do we affirm that the time has not come for so doing, and need not come (if only we are faithful to the light and ability afforded), until that glorious period, shadowed forth in Scripture, when occasion for peculiar testimony bearing shall cease, because righteousness covers the earth as the waters cover the sea.

* This essay, it will be seen, is chiefly addressed to the women of our Society.

May, then, the most seemingly unimportant aspect of our lives breathe the Spirit of Him who pleased not himself, but humbled himself unto death, that his holy life might rise again and shine forth in his children.

Let us open our hearts to the precious influence of his grace more and more, under whose transforming power the commonest, most matter-of-fact and every-day details become worthy portions of a God-glorifying Unity, which, burning as the incense of the olden tabernacle on its golden altar, shall rise up, not only at morning and evening, but unceasingly, an acceptable sacrifice, in obedience to his blessed will whose love first lit its heavenly glow.

"If ye therefore be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth," said the great Apostle of the Gentiles to a convert church, while the beloved disciple left the watchword for all future time—with which we bring to a close these very imperfect but heartfelt remarks: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world; if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."

The Tragic Side of War.

But the life here is not all a joke. A few days ago a reconnoissance was made towards Novaleta. Two battalions of the Fourth Infantry went out with the brigade commander and ran up against the trenches, which we knew were there. It seemed a pity that a life had to be sacrificed for practically nothing, but it was so.

There is in the regiment a detachment of sharpshooters and scouts, made up of four privates and a non-commissioned officer from each company, all under the command of an officer. This detachment had the advance, and coming near the enemy they proceeded to develop the force. That word develop does not sound serious, but it really means getting shot at, and, as the enemy was present, there was soon a lively fire. Our men got down behind the rice dikes and fired volleys. Soon one of them was hit in the left breast, and he toppled over, but immediately straightened up and tried to repeat an order that was being shouted across the field. He was not of the "hero" kind, or, at least, he did not mean to be; he was just paying attention to his duty, and, if anybody could have spoken to him about it, he would probably have said: "Why not? What should you expect me to do?" But in the midst of his attempt the blood gushed from his lips, and he went down again and did not get up.

Can you imagine such a scene? The ground was deep with water and mud; there were no cheers or shouts of encouragement; it was a cloudy, rainy day, and the only thing unusual was the popping of rifles off there from the bamboo thickets that lined a small stream, and the corresponding zipping of the bullets as they kicked up the mud and water. And this man died as quietly as anybody ever died, and with no idea but to do his duty. Pick out some man you know and think of him in that position, and see how it feels. And it has happened several times since we have been out here that only a few days after such an occurrence a letter has come from a mother or sister asking about her boy or brother who had been perhaps a little careless about writing home. I tell you those letters are not easy to answer. I saw a short verse the other day entitled, "Only One Kiled," but to somebody he was the only one thought of and dreamed of and perhaps followed with prayers and hopes for his safety.

Let whoever he may be who shouts for war and doesn't go remember that these men are out here doing this work, and dying, some of them, for his pet theories, and then let him go away and be honest and consider his opinion of himself. Fighting for a principle is all right, but will somebody please tell us what we are fighting for out here?—Ex.

A Recent Rescue.

The story of a vessel burned at sea, days and nights spent in an open boat on the ocean, and of the landing on a strange island near Formosa is told by P. W. Patton, wife of Captain Patton, of the American ship George B. Stetson. She and her year-old baby and sixteen of the crew have arrived here on the United States transport City of Sydney.

P. W. Patton told her story as follows:

"I was the only woman passenger on the ship. On the night of the burning of the vessel I had gone to my cabin to put baby to sleep. My husband ran into the cabin and told me to hasten on deck with the baby, that the ship was afire.

"The ship was loaded with lumber. There was a crew of thirty men. There had been some grumbling among the men because of the quality of the food served to them, and it is supposed that one of them set fire to the cargo.

"As I reached the deck the flames had already ascended the foreriggging. The hold was a mass of fire.

"My husband attempted to rally the crew to fight the blaze, but the men refused to obey. I got into the long boat with baby and my husband. Eight of the crew were in the boat. The ship was now all flames, and burned to the edge as we rowed away. My baby laughed and cooed at the sight, and clapped her little hands as she watched the burning vessel that had been her cradle for so long. We were in the boat two days and two nights. Then we landed on the little island of Ti Pin Tsen.

"Baby and I were the greatest curiosities to the natives. Few of them had seen a white man, and most of them had never seen a white woman or a white baby. They are savages and sometimes practice cannibalism. They crowded around me, placing their hands on my hair, my face and neck. They all tried to touch me, and many attempted to wipe the white off my hands and neck.

"The baby was even a greater curiosity than I. Her blue eyes, golden hair and milk-white face and hands were beyond their comprehension. The baby was pleased with the sensation she caused, and chuckled with delight. The savages treated us well, and directed us down the coast to a harbor, where we boarded a Japanese steamer and received every courtesy. We were landed at Nagasaki, and secured transportation on the Sydney. Every one of the crew was saved, all the boats having landed on the island."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

The Habit of Defeat.

I knew a little girl once who had a habi victory over any hindrance, and she develo a habit of defeat. So it went on, year a year, until one day, in the high school she countered an unusually hard algebra les

She went home with the old phrase. "Mot through the whole long chain of failure.

It was such a useless habit, too. It m just as well have been a habit of victory other little girls no brighter nor stronger t

at any rate, none but Mary said, "I can't!"
so they succeeded where she failed; and

THE VALUE OF THE INDIVIDUAL.—One th that the Gospel has done is, that it has brot out the value of the individual. The time when a single life did not count for much.
community, the nation, the government, everything. The single individual, as an i vidual, was regarded as a trifle. But suc not the case with the present order of ci zation, and the high state of civilization in day is the fruit of Christianity. There ca no doubt in regard to this. The Gospel been moulding human society. And one of things that has been accomplished is that life of every individual has come to be rega as having a value in itself.

And this life needs to be protected and

The Social Development of Peace.

The sympathetic emotions are still too feebly developed, even in the highest races of men. We have made more progress in intelligence than in kindness. For thousands of generations, and until very recent times, one of the chief occupations of men has been to plunder, bruise and kill one another. The selfish and ugly passions, which are primordial—which have the incalculable strength of inheritance from the time when animal consciousness began, have had but little opportunity to grow weak from disuse. The tender and unselfish feelings, which are a later product . . . have too seldom been allowed to grow strong from exercise. And the whims and prejudices of the primeval militant barbarism are slow in dying out from the midst of peaceful, industrial civilization. The coarser forms of cruelty are disappearing, and the butchery of men has greatly diminished. But most people apply to industrial pursuits a notion of antagonism derived from ages of warfare, and seek in all manner of ways to cheat or overreach one another. And, as in more barbarous times, the hero was he who had slain his tens of thousands, so now the man who has made wealth by overreaching his neighbors is not uncommonly spoken of in terms which imply approval. Though gentlemen, moreover, no longer assail one another with knives and clubs, they still inflict wounds with cruel words and sneers. Though the free-thinker is no longer chained to a stake and burned, people still tell lies about him, and do their best to starve him by hurting his reputation. The virtues of forbearance and self-control are still in a very rudimentary state, and of mutual helpfulness there is far too little among men.

Nevertheless, in all these respects, some improvement has been made, along with the diminution of warfare, and by the time warfare has not merely ceased from the earth but has come to be the dimly remembered phantom of a remote past, the development of the sympathetic side of human nature will doubtless become prodigious. The manifestation of selfish and hateful feelings will be more and more sternly repressed by public opinion, and such feelings will become weakened by disuse, while sympathetic feelings will increase in strength as the sphere for their exercise is enlarged. And thus at length we see what human progress means. It means throwing off the brute-inheritance, gradually throwing it off, through ages of struggle that are by and by to made struggle needless. Man is slowly passing from a social state, in which he was little better than a brute, toward an ultimate social state, in which his character shall have become so transformed that nothing of the brute can be detected in it. The process of development is an advance toward true civilization. Fresh value is thus added to human life. The modern prophet may again proclaim that the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Work ye, therefore, early and late, to prepare its coming.

The future is lighted for us with the radiant colors of hope. Strife and sorrow shall disappear. Peace and love shall reign supreme. The dream of poets, the lesson of priest and propet, the inspiration of the great musician, is confirmed in the light of modern knowledge, and as we gird ourselves up for the work of life, we may look forward to the time when, in the truest sense, the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of Christ and He shall reign for ever and ever, King of kings and Lord of lords.—"The Destiny of Man."

African Martyrs.

There have been no martyrs who have shown themselves made of sterner stuff than Africans. It seems amazing to think of the transformation of superstitious, fetich barbarians into Christians of the first rank. Here are two instances given by the missionaries of Uganda, of negro martyrs under Mwanga's cruel order. These are not of the first century, but of the latest; nor where Christianity has been long established, but where yesterday it was not. The story runs thus:

"Fredi was an earnest Christian, whose life was a cause of deep thankfulness to the missionaries. He had been zealous in teaching others and winning them to Christ. When the young converts were murdered he was standing by. The fierce chief who was executing Mwanga's commands turned to Fredi, and threatened to burn him and his whole family. Fredi replied, 'Well do so; I am a Christian, and I am not afraid.' After the execution was over he took one of the missionaries, to visit the scene of the martyrdom. 'When we reached it,' says his companion 'he kneeled down with me and poured out his heart to God that he would bring his salvation to those in darkness.' Fredi was warned to flee. He refused, and at last was taken and unmercifully clubbed to death and then flung into the flames.

"Roberto, another Christian, was a member of the native council. He was engaged in holding prayers in his home with several lads when the executioners suddenly appeared. All the lads save one bolted through the thin reed wall of the house and escaped. Roberto remained. 'Do not be afraid that I will shoot you,' cried the Christian; 'come in and take me.' They bound him and took him with the young lad to the king. 'Do you read?' said Mwanga. 'Yes.' 'Take him and roast him,' was the summary sentence. The lad was sentenced at the same time, but was released on the payment of a ransom by his friends. Roberto was kept a few days in stocks, then one of his arms was cut off and roasted before his eyes, next a leg was cut off and burned, then the whole body was burned.

"After the massacre of the Christians the head executioner reports to the king that he had never killed men who showed such fortitude and endurance and that they had prayed to God aloud in the fire."—N. C. Advocate.

IN France once a church edifice was discovered buried in the earth; it was disinterred, and there it stood in all its old-time beauty and strength. SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES—For the First Month, 1900, the Government receipts from all sources amounted to $48,012,164, as against $41,774,930 for First Month, 1899. The expenditures aggregated $39,189,096, as against $51,122,770 for First Month, 1899, leaving a surplus last month of $8,823,068.

The monthly statement of the public debt shews that at the close of business First Month 31st, the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,125,636,227, a decrease, as compared with last month, of $8,663,780.

A despatch from Washington says: It is learned at the State Department that none of the cargoes seized by the British war ships off South Africa now remain in the possession of the British Government except such goods as await the orders of their owners or those whose ownership remains to be proved.

The Senate, on the 5th inst., ratified The Hague peace treaty and the extradition treaty with the Argentine Republic, without objection or division.

The President has issued a proclamation fixing the tariff duties and taxes for the island of Guam based upon the Philippine tariff.

A Manila despatch says that General Kobbe's expedition has occupied the islands of Samar and Leyte. Troops from two regiments have occupied nine towns and placed 180,000 bales of hemp on the market.

The population of Puerto Rico is placed in the preliminary enumeration at 957,679. The last census taken in 1887 showed a population of 806,708.

The Cuban census shows the population of the island to be 1,572,840, which is between 50,000 and 60,000 less than when the last census was taken by the Spaniards in 1887.

State Senator William Goebel, the Democratic contestant for Taylor's seat as Governor of Kentucky, was shot and fatally wounded in Frankfort on the morning of First Month 30th while passing through the State House yard on his way to the Capitol. The shots were fired from an upper window of a building occupied by the offices of the Governor and other State officials. One shot struck Goebel, passing through the right lung. On the 31st the wounded man was sworn in as Governor of the State by Chief Justice Hazelrigg of the Court of Appeals. Governor Taylor has summoned the Legislature to meet at London, Ky., on the 6th inst. Goebel died on the evening of the 3rd inst., and an hour later J. C. W. Beckham, Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor, took the oath of office and issued a proclamation calling upon the militia to disband.

Governor Taylor, at Frankfort, has announced his willingness to submit the question as to the Kentucky Governorship to any three fair men who might be selected as arbitrators by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The report of Secretary of Internal Affairs of Pennsylvania Latta shows a taxable real estate valuation of $2,725,163,336, and total collections last year in taxes of $55,808,585, an increase of five and a half millions over the previous year.

There has been a total of fifty-two cases of the bubonic plague in Honolulu, with forty-one deaths. All of Chinatown has been burned in an effort to stop the spread of the disease.

A scientist says that only 900 persons in 1,000,000 die from old age.

A special to the Public Ledger of Second Month 4th, says: "Recent experiments in this city have shown the possibility of conveying medicines through the skin and into any portion of the human body by placing them in the path of an electric current. Gout, rheumatism and consumption are now being treated by utilizing electricity to convey drugs to the affected parts, and while no positive cures have been wrought results have been attained that seem to demonstrate the value of the new treatment.

"Electricity has long been used by physicians in treatment of nervous troubles and for its tonic effects upon the system generally, but its employment as an agent to carry mechanically particles of medicines is new. It is asserted, for instance, that by its use the drinking of lithia water for the gout will be unnecessary, as the lithia may be made to pass through the skin and into the member that is affected. Rheumatic joints may be treated in like manner, and the derangement of the stomach by taking medicine in the usual way will be avoided.

A remarkable case of drift was reported to Lieutenant Herbert O. Dunn at the Baltimore Hydrographic Office last week, in a letter from United States officials at Baracoa, Cuba. It was the return to the office of a letter placed in a bottle and thrown overboard by Captain Mitchell, of the Neptune steamer Ohio, on Tenth Month 23d, 1895, while the ship was bound from Carthagena for Baltimore with a cargo of iron ore. Captain Mitchell enclosed a note stating that the bottle, with its contents, was thrown overboard on that date in latitude 35.37 and longitude 36.30. He requested that if the bottle was picked up that it be sent to the Baltimore Branch Hydrographic Office. Remarks were appended to the paper received that it was picked up on First Month 16th, 1900, in latitude 20.21.40 and longitude 74.45, which is in the vicinity of Baracoa.

If the bottle had drifted in a straight line from where thrown into the water to where found, it would have traveled 2,000 miles. In its four years and three months' drift it is possible that it covered several times that distance.

There were 507 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 9 more than the previous week and 5 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 266 were males and 241 females: 88 died of pneumonia; 48 of consumption; 41 of heart disease; 28 of apoplexy; 24 of diphtheria; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of convulsions; 15 of inanition; 15 of nephritis; 14 of cancer; 12 of bronchitis; 12 from casualties; 12 of Bright's disease; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of old age, and 6 of typhoid fever.

KNOW Whom I have believed." This is a mony to direct acquaintance with a trusted ". "I know what I have believed"—this ies to a creed, or things believed about the other to life eternal, that they might Him, the only true God.

his knowledge of Him and of Christ whom as sent is as a house built upon the Rock, that which has no deeper foundation than belief of a creed—statements, traditions, sitions—is built as upon insecure sand. a belief, rather than faith. For "faith evidence of things not seen"—the resting ting on the Witness for the Truth of in- e realities.

e recall no language where Christ has salvation conditional on the belief of a sition—important to right faith as true ments of doctrine must be; but rather the g faith is expressed as "believing Me," or eving in Me"—something deeper than ac- ng a form of language about Him. Through ving Him, or on Him directly, comes a dis- nent of things said about Him, whether are consistent with what we livingly know m. So a saving faith in Him will not only is commandments, but will, according to aithfulness, believe in the sayings of every ture of Truth about Him. "He that be- th on the Son of God hath the Witness in elf."

e faith which in these days we fear for, at which is not founded on the Rock; not l on the true and holy Witness in the heart n living experience; the faith which can say, "I know what I have believed"—not aith which was Abraham's long before the was written, and would still live on, gh every book on earth should be de- ed.—"Before Abraham was, I am."

ut the loss of the sacred Scriptures, or the editing of them, would be a calamity to beyond expression; and we believe they bear delibly the spiritual stamp of proceeding from the Author and Finisher of our faith, that they cannot perish from among men so long as their Author shall "find faith upon earth." But Christian experience is baptized in the Fountain rather than in the "declaration of the Fountain;" and walks in Him as the "primary rule of faith and conduct"—the living authority both of its own life and of all Scripture given by Divine inspiration. And Christ still speaks to men's condition "as one having authority, and not as the scribes" who are planted only on letter and text. It is these who are no more deeply planted, that stand in jeopardy of the shipwreck of their kind of faith, if they place their faith in the "higher critics" in an even balance with their confidence in the Scriptures. To these Bible-wreck and faith-wreck seem the same. They who have insisted on the Scriptures as being "the primary" or "the sole rule of faith and manners," or "the Word," are in a pitiable plight if they now deem they must say: "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him!"

We do not apprehend that in the ultimate issue the Scripture can be found to be criticised away, or broken. But from those who search as if they think they have in the Scriptures themselves eternal life, a slipping of this foundation into unbelief may be dreaded. But "other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, even Christ Jesus." Of Him it is that the Scriptures testify, to direct us to come to Him that we might have life.

Our concern is that, in view of the bewilderment of the times, we may be all the more dedicated now to know Whom we have believed. There is a faith which overcomes the shakings of the "higher criticism," and there is a faith which is overcome by them. For the former we plead. "Turn ye to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope!" Therein alone can we safely see the havoc of the tempest that is passing by. "In the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast."

We have been counselled of late to read Robert Barclay's Third Proposition—that concerning the Scriptures. We may rise from that reading with a feeling that the war now waged over the Scriptures is none of Friends' war; and that others who in their theologies have been giving the Scriptures a preposterous position, will be the chief sufferers. While the transition period will probably be of fearful cost to the churches, yet the Society of Friends is the one which need least be affected by the turmoil, as they stand steadfast upon their primary foundation, which was before words were and shall stand sure when words have ceased. While some are being driven as from bibliolatry to spirituality, and others to infidelity, we anticipate in the distance, as an outcome of the Divine overruling of the conflict of faith, a solid and general movement of the church of Christ to the Foundation once so clearly heralded by the early Friends. Will the church of the future then find a Society or a remnant still preserved as worthy successors of that prophetic movement? It rests with us of today to step humbly and faithfully on the Foundation of all true knowledge, and in the spirit of revelation in the knowledge of Him, to know Him the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent, if we would be worthy welcomers of those who hereafter may, as doves to our windows, be drawn to the like precious faith.

In number 28 of our present volume appeared a statement, which has been read here and there in years past, of the results of the prince of Granada's counting up of chapters, verses, words, letters, and names of the whole Bible, while he was in prison. By comparing a portion of his numbering with corresponding words as given in Strong's Concordance, which undertakes to note every word of the English Bible, we find a great discrepancy. Whether this is accounted for by the prince having used a Spanish version, we cannot say. But we would correct the impression that his figures are wholly to be relied on for our English Bible.

While we would have preferred for the prince a higher engagement for occupying time than with the mere letter of Scripture, yet his assiduous industry has a service in showing possible fruits of leisure, however shut in.

In illustration of the view that the siftings of the Church now taking place are over-ruled to drive some thoughtful minds towards acknowledging the position early taken by Friends, the following quotations from a recent article of S. D. McConnell, a prominent Episcopalian clergyman, seem permissible:—

"It is so much easier to live by rule than to live by spirit. At least it seems to be easier. In point of fact, the distinguishing feature of the religion of Christ is that it vacates all external mastership, turns the individual soul in upon itself, and declares that by so doing it will find itself face to face with God. . . .

The Church, the Bible and Reason, have all their necessary place . . . The question of Holy Scriptures is one which the High Churchman who knows the ground upon which he stands is not vexed by. It does not touch him, so long as he keeps out of questionable company. . . My quarrel is the same with the bibliolater, the ecclesiastic, and the rationalist. They all, and all alike, sit down satisfied when they have reached an authority which in their opinion ought to be final.

"The real vice of all these champions of 'authority' is that they cannot admit the reality of God governing directly. They have the feeling that a moral cause can go before the Almighty only on appeal from a lower court. The contention of Jesus is that God has original jurisdiction, and that he has machinery for communicating his judgments. This is what the Jews could not take in. They lived by [outward] 'authority.' The priest, the lawyer, and the scribe spoke to them the final word. When Jesus bade them venture immediately into the presence of God their Father, they were shocked and scandalized. His disciples, however, gathered courage to follow Him, and so were made free men in Christ Jesus. In the centuries since, they have always tended to grow weary of the burden of liberty, and to turn to the ecclesiastic, the scribe, and the logician, begging to be ruled.

"The real authority in the moral sphere is the actual concurrence of the will of God with the moral consciousness of the individual. Whenever this concurrence is reached in any particular case, the individual recognizes it. He may not obey it, but that is because he prefers to bear the penalty rather than to do God's will, but he knows that the King has spoken. He knows it just as the organ-builder knows that a pipe speaks the right note. . . When he has found it, he is satisfied, for he knows what is truth, and what is duty."

In our last number, third column and third paragraph, the word "formerly" should be replaced by "firmly," so as to read, "Friends, while firmly maintaining this ground, should provoke no controversy," etc.

Some writer, in considering "the sin which doth so easily beset us," has ascribed to it thirteen characteristics as follows:

"1. The sin you do not want to be reproved for. 2. The sin you are readiest to defend. 3. The sin your thoughts run most upon. 4. The sin that leads you captive the easiest. 5. The sin you find the most excuse for. 6. The sin that oftenest beclouds your spiritual sky. 7. The sin that causes you remorse of conscience the most frequently. 8. The sin that makes you doubt your entire acceptance with God. 9. The sin you are most unwilling to acknowledge you possess. 10. The sin you are most unwilling to give up. 11. The sin you are all the time trying to persuade yourself is an infirmity. 12. The sin which must be laid aside in order to enjoy full salvation. 13. The sin which is as dear as a right eye, but which must be given up."

Some Account Respecting Edward Browne, Formerly of Sunderland; From the Records of Newcastle Monthly Meeting, and from a Letter to his Sister, Anno 1729-30.

Although the time is past when many interesting particulars respecting Edward Browne might have been obtained from his cotemporaries; yet some little being known of his character and certain papers having been preserved which tend to its further elucidation, and which may convey highly important caution and instruction to succeeding generations, it is presumed that their being more generally read among the members of the religious Society to which he belonged may have a beneficial tendency. After his apprenticeship at Sunderland, removing to Ireland, the certificate from Newcastle meeting evinces not only their tender concern on his behalf, but also that by early attention to the calls of Divine love, his circumspect walking through the slippery paths of youth, had rendered him a good example to those of his own class and a comfort to his more experienced friends.

Almost every production of his pen marks his superior talents and acquirements; and he was doubtless a truly valuable character, while his mind was preserved under the influence of the principle of Truth, which keeps all things in their places, and bounds the desires of the humble followers of Christ. But when after the decease of his beloved wife, in 1724, he became disobedient to the heavenly vision and let out his mind after worldly greatness, the consequences that ensued are best described by himself in the succeeding pages.

From the following draft of a certificate of removal, it appears that he served an apprenticeship with a Friend of said Monthly Meeting and removed into Ireland presently after. The certificate is as follows:

"To our Friends and brethren in the nation of Ireland or elsewhere, a salutation of dear love in the Truth; we send this on behalf of our Friend Edward Browne, certifying that he served the time of his apprenticeship with a friend who is a member of this meeting, during which time, considering his years, he walked as became the Truth in which he was educated, and was an example of sobriety to the youth amongst us, and is in good unity with Friends, whose tender concern, on his behalf, is that he may be preserved faithful to the manifestation which it has pleased God to visit him withal amongst us, and in that concern we recommend him to you, that the same Christian care may be continued over him, that that plant which the Lord hath planted may be nourished and grow to the praise of his name, and that the exercises and trials he may probably meet with may not blast nor crush that tender bud, is the hearty desire of your friends and brethren in the blessed Truth.

"Signed on behalf of the Monthly Meeting of the people called Quakers in Sunderland in the county of Durham, Fourth Month, 1710."

It is probable that Edward Browne returned again not long afterwards to Sunderland, for, by the minutes of Sunderland Preparative and Newcastle Monthly Meeting, it appears he had been for several years a very useful member, had acted in the capacity of cashier, librarian and clerk, and in 1716 was appointed to the office of overseer. He married Margery M ford of Sunderland in 1715. She died in 17

Edward Browne kept a draper's shop in S derland, and was a considerable coal fitter a ship owner; but departing from that sa humble walking which Truth preserveth its f lowers in, he built a grand* residence for hi self near the moor, the end of Silver Stre also other houses (now called Fitter's Ro for masters of ships and for his keelmen; that time it was understood he intended to h married again, and paid his addresses to A Hodgson of Newcastle; when his affairs beca embarrassed and the balance owing to the c owner was about three thousand pounds, which he was induced to give a bond and ju ment—this the coal owner entered up in courts against him, contrary to intention the time of giving it; and being unable to s port his credit he became a bankrupt, to great concern of Friends, with whom he been held in much esteem. Said Edw Browne went to London to appear to the Ba ruptcy, and while there Friends judged it th place and duty to write to him respecting failure in the payment of his just debts, wh had brought reproach on the Truth we p fess, which, they add, called for an open c demnation either for himself or them." after some time Edward Browne wrote to Monthly Meeting, a copy of which is as follo

n the year 1677, William Penn of the En- h Friends, who was known in those trou- us times as a generous, broadminded Chris- n, in visiting Germany, became acquainted h the Mennonites and preached among the gregations of the Palatinate, and later when came into possession of the province of nsylvania in America, he made known to s people, that he intended the country as an lum for those who were persecuted and op- ssed, and cordially invited immigration to s country. Many accepted the invitation the first of their number sailed on the sel Coneord, which landed in the City of otherly Love, on the sixth of Tenth Month, 83. They settled at Germantown, now a part Philadelphia, and very soon followed many re from the Palatinate and Switzerland and ce this time up to the present, Mennonites e continued to emigrate from Europe to erica. Those who came earliest settled in stern Pennsylvania, especially in Lancaster unty, those coming later settling in Ohio l States yet farther West. From their ther State they have spread within the last y years over a large number of States of the ion and Canada, the first emigration being this province in 1800. In the year 1708 ir first meeting-house was erected at Ger- ntown and in 1786 there were nineteen con- gations in Pennsylvania and one in Virginia. After Joseph II of Austria had issued his ct of tolerance to the Protestants in 1781, ne of the Mennonite brethren of the old ntry, openly confessed the faith of their hers, in hopes that their privileges would the same as that of other Protestants; but ving otherwise, they fled to Russia, and all t remained of these people emigrated in 74-6 to South Dakota where they have at s time eight congregations. These are own as the "Hutterische Bruder"—the Hut- ite brethren, named after Jacob Hutter, who d a martyr in 1536.

There had been congregations in Prussia ce the time of Menno Simons, and from ere at the invitation of the Zarina Catharine Russia, they emigrated in considerable num- bers to the steppes of Southern Russia, where for a number of years they suffered great privations. In the year 1871 the colonists received the alarming intelligence that all inhabitants of Russia should become subject to military service, and although this was afterwards modified so that the Mennonites are now chiefly employed in forestry, instead of serving in the army, yet thousands of families were induced by the restriction of their privileges to emigrate to America, where they settled during the years between 1873-6 in Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota and Minnesota in the United States and in Manitoba, in the Dominion of Canada.

There are (census of 1890), five hundred and fifty-one congregations and four hundred and five houses of worship in the United States, with a membership of about forty-two thousand. These are divided into a number of branches, of which the most numerous are the Mennonites proper, the Amish Mennonites and the General Conference Mennonites of America. Indiana and Michigan have twenty places of regular worship, while Lancaster County, Pa., alone has seventy-four places of worship. As regards the literature of the Mennonites see pamphlet of John Horsch, called the "Mennonites, their History, Faith and Practice." We have obtained from the same valuable source nearly all the data for this article.—Young People's Paper.

Pass It On.

Once, when I was a schoolboy, going home from the far-away little town in which I dwelt, I arrived at Bristol, and got on board the steamer with just enough money to pay my fare; and that being settled, I thought in my innocence that I had paid for everything in the way of meals. I had what I wanted as long as we were in smooth water. Then came the rough Atlantic, and the need of nothing more. I had been lying in my berth for hours, wretchedly ill and past caring for anything, when there came the steward and stood beside me.

"Your bill, sir," said he, holding out a piece of paper.

"I have no money," said I, in my wretchedness.

"Then I shall keep your luggage. What is your name and address?"

I told him.

Instantly he took off the cap he wore, with the gilt about it, and held out his hand. "I should like to shake hands with you," he said.

I gave him my hand and shook his as well as I could.

Then came the explanation—how that some years before some little kindness had been shown his mother by my father in the sorrow of her widowhood.

"I never thought the chance would come for me to repay it," said he, pleasantly, "but I am glad it has."

"So am I," said I.

As soon as I got ashore I told my father what had happened.

"Ah!" said he, "see how a bit of kindness lives! Now he has passed it on to you. Remember, if you meet anybody that needs a friendly hand, you must pass it on to them."

Years had gone by. I had grown up and quite forgotten it all, until one day I had gone to the station of one of our main lines. I was just going to take my ticket, when I saw a little lad crying—a thorough gentleman he was, trying to keep back the troublesome tears as he pleaded with the booking clerk.

"What's the matter, my lad?" I asked.

"If you please, sir, I haven't money enough to pay my fare. I have all but a few pence, and I tell the clerk if he will trust me I will be sure to pay him."

Instantly it flashed upon me the forgotten story of long ago. Here, then, was my chance to pass it on. I gave him the sum needed, and then got into the carriage with him. Then I told the little fellow the story of long ago and of the steward's kindness to me. "Now, today," I said, "I pass it on to you; and, remember, if you meet anyone who needs a kindly hand you must pass it on to them."

"I will sir, I will!" cried the lad, as he took my hand, and his eyes flashed with earnestness.

"I am sure you will," I answered.

I reached my destination and left my little friend. The last sign I had from him was the handkerchief thrown from the window of the carriage, as if to say: "It is all right; I will pass it on."—Home and School Visitor.

Cultivate Resources.

A lad of fifteen was laid up with a sprained ankle. The injury, though severe enough to make quiet an absolute necessity, did not cause him any especial pain, and yet the days of his enforced invalidism will be long remembered in that household.

He had never cared for reading. He was fond only of those games which demanded physical exertion. He was an indifferent student, and he rejected impatiently the suggestion that he should spend a part of his undesired leisure upon his school-work. He passed his time in complaints which actually retarded his own recovery, to say nothing of the discomfort he produced in the home.

A cousin about his own age, who was confined to the house for an equal time by a slight indisposition, had a very different experience. "I have done so many of the things I've been putting off ever so long," she said. "What with reading and writing letters and helping with some sewing and talking with the people who came in, the days fairly flew."

The contrast between these two young folks illustrates a point we need to emphasize. It does not do to be without resources. Perhaps your favorite enjoyment is bicycle-riding, but if you cannot be content unless you are engaged in that pastime, you are likely to pass a large part of your year quite unhappily. We have all known people to whom a rainy day seemed a disaster, and who could not face a two hours' wait in a railway station with any degree of equanimity. Cultivate more than one faculty of your mind. Find pleasure, if possible, in things widely diverse, which can be enjoyed under totally different circumstances. Have resources, so that if one road is blocked, another will be open to you. It is a sort of slavery to be so dependent on circumstances that our comfort is destroyed by a rainy day or a week of enforced inactivity.—Selected.

For "THE FRIEND."

Whether or Not to Justify the Dangerous Game of Football.

Upon the subject of the justification or the rejection of the game of football, now, perforce, claiming prominent mention in many papers, and lately presented with cogency to our members through the editorial remarks in THE FRIEND of Twelfth Month 16th last, the article following by W. C. Allen, and again, in the Westtonian, by Samuel Emlen, and perhaps by others, the protest against the game, as at present conducted, appears so conclusive that it would seem almost unnecessary further to pursue the subject, were it not that there is an urgency that we forthwith reach safe ground and take our stand there for our own preservation in the ways of Truth and the benefit of our fellows, just as we are enabled to do in the matter of non-engagement in carnal warfare.

When a coroner's jury, as at St. Louis, in the case of the pupil of the Christian Brothers' College, killed at the game, returns the verdict "We find that the game was played strictly according to Rugby rules, but we believe the game is dangerous and should be prohibited," and when we bear in remembrance that, during the last three months of the past year, the record of the dead and severely wounded upon the football field ran up into the scores, there is surely sufficient ground to ask for "a substitute better suited for a majority of the students," and that we can scarcely, with consistency, be found standing in defence of a practice sought to be justified upon arguments that fit "the highwayman's or the prize-fighter's mode of life, and (such as are) used for carnal warfare between nations." So justifying the game, it was the fighting Governor of one of our States who, a few years ago, was rash enough to say that, "if any son of his should weigh broken bones against the honor of being one of a football eleven, he would disinherit him." Nevertheless, some very recent experience of this high official in dealing with prize-fighters and their abettors, and an acquaintance with the football fatality list of the past year would likely incline him to hesitate before again expressing himself in the language given above.

Upon the opening of the winter term of a college in an adjoining State, its president, in his annual address in the chapel, spoke of the importance of athletics, that a sound body was one of the prerequisites of a sound mind, referred gratifyingly to the students' successes, yet reminded them, while "athletics should have a prominent place," they came to college primarily to study. Following these words, however, rival classes, as they came from the chapel, became involved in a "rush," necessitating the interposition of the president to stop the disorderly proceedings. It appeared that athletics were yet too prominent.

This fostering of rivalry, finding rough vent in manifestations of rowdyism, has had its encouragement in the dangerous game now considered; the popular inter-collegiate feature of it; the strenuous play before great crowds of people, with the daily papers' printed details and comments thereupon spread broadcast. With this there is a reaching out for applause, even notoriety—but at what a surrender of the true (comprehensive withal) scholastic idea and proper Christian principle—an idea and principle which may well and unitedly prevail in the hearty, bounding, fun-loving boy.

Writing in the Public Ledger of what he designates a degeneration into "brutal, disgusting and disgraceful 'sport,'" one who signs himself "Class of 1867," having referred to a long list of strains and maimings incurred by chief players on the football field, as cited by a university physician, begs to ask "whether such a game is war or play, healthful exercise or reckless and unnecessary brutality. If the play were by dogs or bulls, in the presence of a crowd of spectators, with such results following, the officers of the law would stop it, or, if they failed to do so, the Secretary for Preventing Cruelty to Animals would interfere. Have we all gone so mad," he concludes, "on the subject of athletics that we approve what are, to all intents and purposes, gladiatorial combats?" *

And this latter remark brings to recollection how earnestly, in his De Spectaculis, Tertullian pleaded with the Christians of his day that they drag not into contempt their religion by countenancing the shows, spectacles, gladiatorial contests of the amphitheatre. "What is more merciless than the circus," he says, "where people do not spare even their rulers and fellow-citizens?" Has it not come to be so that there is shown a good deal of the same indifference to life and broken limbs on the hard-fought football field before assembled thousands?

"Glory or the grave!" were the words said to have been uttered by some British soldiers in the present South African war, when about to risk their lives in the attack upon a strongly fortified position of the enemy. Almost it seems as though this might be the feeling in connection with the pursuit of a game capable of such fatal sequences when the "blood is up."

The Carlisle Indian football team has been cited as one that sets a very praiseworthy example of self-restraint and decorum to its Anglo-Saxon competitors, yet I regret to note—though the accompaniment is not unexpected—that, in complying with our civilization, mention was lately made, after their successful contest with a New York "eleven," of their walking up Broadway to the theatre. Perilous diversion of this sort is a common snare besetting visiting clubs, teams, lodges and the like, and illustrates the Apostle's warning that "evil communications corrupt good manners," a saying of Paul's, be it said, immediately succeeding his remarks as to how "after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus." That sort of fierce combat received none of his approval, but how eloquently and exactly he enumerates the articles of the panoply which should cover and effectually defend the pilgrim in the holy warfare!

So I believe that Friends, in their educational institutions everywhere, would do well to keep clear of, or, where previously adopted, relinquish the game in question for "a substitute better suited to a majority of the students," and that they likewise maintain the rule against inter-school or inter-collegiate matches.

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

* The following, from the Christian Intelligencer, voices a very common sentiment of the religious press upon this subject: "We do not hesitate to say positively that the game should be abolished. Last year five deaths resulted from it, this year eleven, and the number of injuries scores up into the hundreds. Is the sport worth this great sacrifice of life and limb? What is the gain that justifies this irreparable loss? We leave it with those who mourn their dead and wounded."

A NAME IN THE SAND.

BY HANNAH FLAGG GOULD.

Alone I walked the ocean strand,
A pearly shell was in my hand;
I stooped, and wrote upon the sand
My name, the year, the day.
As onward from the spot I passed,
One lingering look behind I cast—
A wave came rolling high and fast,
And washed my lines away.

And so, methought, 'twill shortly be
With every mark on earth from me;
A wave of dark oblivion's sea
Will sweep across the place
Where I have trod the sandy shore
Of time, and been, to be no more;
Of me, my frame, the name I bore,
To leave no track nor trace;

And yet with Him who counts the sands,
And holds the waters in his hands,
I know a lasting record stands,
Inscribed against my name,
Of all this mortal part has wrought,
Of all this thinking soul has thought,
And from these fleeting moments caught
For glory or for shame!

A Peep Through a Window.

An old physician, as well known for his shrewd philosophy as for his skill in healing tells what shaped his life.

"My character," he once said to a friend "was to a degree formed by a single inciden in my childhood. Our home was a log hu in the suburbs of the town in which we lived The door and two windows opened into th squalid street, a pig sty and a vacant lot int which the refuse of the town was thrown. Bu through a small window, hardly more than chink, at the back of the house, we had glimpse of the mountain tops, about which th clouds hung and shifted perpetually.

"My mother had a habit of closing the doo and side windows, and opening this little chink whenever we children were tired or cross, o discouraged. She knew, though we did no that that glimpse of wonderful peace and beaut would probably help us.

"When I was leaving home to seek my for tune, I said to her, 'I wish I could take tha with me,' looking up at this window. 'Yo can't do that, John,' she said, 'but I am sur there never will be a place in your life so mea and poor but that some chink in it will open o something beautiful and good. Keep it open.

"I have tried to obey her," said the old man "If there is but one hopeful symptom in patient, I keep it in sight for him and mysel If there is but one good trait in a man's char acter, I try to look at it alone and shut out a the rest.

"I see that God sends pain into men's live as a discipline, but He does not hinder them from finding comfort in many ways—I hel them to find it. Life is hard and squalid enoug sometimes, but there is always a 'chink' some where through which one can see the mountai tops and sunlit clouds."

There is always a crack in the barest lif through which the stars shine, if we choose t look for it.

It was in the night of his poverty and blind ness that Milton saw the heavens unclose an breathed immortal airs.—Selected.

his testimony on these points is of pe-eciation of the internal power of the Gosby virtue of which it changed the hearts en and made its way in the world indeently of formal organizations:

Nevertheless, all outward dealings and cles would have created for this religion ch access to the hearts of men, had it not essed in its inward nature such an attractive r for that in human nature which is related to God, however it may be darkened and overwhelmed either through false refinement or through carnal grossness. They would have been unavailing had it not shown itself victorious over all the impostures, which taking prisoner the human mind, opposed it; had it not shown itself the only fundamental source of satisfaction to the religious wants excited in an age of ferment; had it not proved itself the only thing that would create for the spiritual world peace and tranquillity in this wild ferment of opposing elements; and had not this religion as soon as it had taken root anywhere by the activity which showed itself in it, been irresistibly impelled forward in its course. As the Redeemer in his prayer, had commended the faithful to his Heavenly Father, that their communion with Him, the glory received from the Father which He bestowed on them, beaming through their life, might lead men to believe on Him, so it came to pass. The witness which genuine Christians gave of their Lord through their conduct, the healing power of the gospel which revealed itself in their life, was a most powerful engine in the conversion of the heathen. The distinguishing virtues of the Christian must have come vividly into contrast with the prevailing crimes and vices. The strictness of Christian virtue was sometimes carried to excess in contrast with universal depravity of manners. The inward brotherly love of the Christian contrasted with the selfishness which divides all men from one another and makes them distrustful one of an other, which prevented men from understanding the nature of the Christian community and made it a source of never-failing wonder to them. "See," said they, "how they love one another." "This surprised them beyond measure," says Tertullian, "since they are accustomed to hate one another, that one man should be ready to die for another."

In the passages which follow Neander expresses his judgment of the general character of the church government that would be adapted to a truly Christian community. He dissents, as may be seen from the order that was established, but still recognizes the body of those who have lived subject to that order as the visible church.

"The formation of the Christian Church as it developed itself out of the peculiarities of Christianity must essentially differ from all other religious unions. A class of priests who were to guide all other men under the assumption of their incompetency in religious matters whose business it was exclusively to provide for the religious wants of the rest of mankind and to form a link between them and God and godly things; such a class of priests could find no place in Christianity. While the gospel put away that which separated man from God by bringing all men into the same communion with God through Christ, it also removed that partition wall which separated one man from his fellows, in regard to his more elevated interests.

The same High Priest and Mediator for all through whom all, being reconciled and united with God, become themselves a priestly and spiritual race. One heavenly King, Guide and Teacher, through whom all are taught from God! One faith! One hope! One spirit which must animate all! One oracle in the hearts of all! the voice of the spirit which proceeds from God! and all citizens of one heavenly kingdom with whose heavenly powers they have already been sent forth as strangers in the world! When the apostles introduced the notion of a priest which is found in the Old Testament into Christianity it was always only with the intention of showing that no such visible distinct priesthood as existed in the economy of the Old Testament could find admittance into the New; that inasmuch as free access to God and to heaven was opened up once for all unto the faithful, through the one High Priest Christ, they had become by union with Him, himself, a holy and spiritual people, and their calling was only this — to consecrate their whole life as a sacrifice of thanksgiving for the mercy of God's redemption and to preach the power and the grace of Him who had called them from the kingdom of darkness into his wonderful light, and their whole life was to be a continual priesthood, a spiritual serving of God, proceeding from the affections of a faith working by love, and also a continued witness of their Redeemer (see 1 Peter ii: 9, Rom. xii: 1, and the spirit and connection of ideas through the whole Epistle to the Hebrews.) And thus also the furtherance of God's kingdom, both in general and in each individual community, the furtherance of the propagation of Christianity among the heathen and the improvement of each particular church was not to be the concern of a particular class of Christians, but the nearest duty of every individual Christian. Every one was to contribute to this object from the station assigned him by the invisible Head of the Church and by the gifts peculiar to him which were given him by God and grounded in his nature—a nature which retained indeed its individual character, but was regenerated and ennobled by the influence of the Holy Spirit. There was here no division into spiritual and worldly, but all as Christians in their inward life and dispositions, were to be men dead to the ungodliness of the world, and thus far departed out of the world; men animated by the spirit of God and not by the spirit of the world." . . .

"The condition of the Corinthian church, as it is depicted in the epistles of Paul, deficient as it was in many respects, shows us how a Christian church should act; how all in that church should mutually co-operate with their mutual gifts as members of the same body with equal honor supplying one another's deficiencies. The office of a teacher was not here exclusively confined to one or more, but every one as he felt called to the office might address a discourse to the assembly of the church for the instruction of all. According to the differences in the particular natures of individual Christians, who served as instruments to the working of the Holy Spirit, and by which the difference in the form of its manifestation among them was determined, the efficacy of the spirit came forth, sometimes under a creative form as in the gift of prophecy; sometimes, as in the gift of trying of spirit, as a receptive or critical power. We hence find great varieties or differences in the degrees of inspiration and in the relation of the human to the Divine among them: sometimes the deep reflective, purely human energy prevailing in others while this is kept in the background, the spirit of God in its omnipotence outweighing it; and here too, we find the manifold degrees of the gift of tongues, down to the ordinary, regular gift of teaching." . . . "Now, although all Christians had the same priestly calling and the same priestly rights, and although there could not be any distinct class of priests in the first Christian Church, yet every church as a society for establishing and extending the kingdom of God, an union for the avowal of the same faith in word and work for the mutual confirmation and animation of this faith, for communion and for the mutual furtherance of the higher life which flowed from this faith, a union for those most lofty aims must obtain a form and consistence proportioned to them; for without this form nothing can continue to exist among men. Christian churches stood still more in need of such an established order, since they must develop themselves and make their progress in a world so foreign to them and under the influence of such various sources of threats and disturbance, or at least of afflictions. In them as in every society a certain government and conduct of the common interest must exist. That form of government must have corresponded best with the spirit of Christianity, and the purpose for which churches were formed, which was most calculated to further their free development from within outwards, and also the most to further the collected and mutual efficacy of all individual powers and gifts. The monarchical form of government would probably lead to a result, by which that which is human would be prized too highly, and one man have too much weight, so that he would become the centre around which everything would gather instead of the one invisible Shepherd of all becoming the centre of all. How anxiously do the apostles strive to keep off such a danger. How much does the Apostle Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians insist on the free co-operation of all, that no one power and disposition might overwhelm the rest and reign triumphant! The apostles themselves, conscious as they were of that higher degree of illumination which was necessary for them alone in their capacity as founders of the first Church, and teachers of pure Christianity for all times, conscious as they were of a higher degree of authority and power, delivered to them by the Divine Founder of the church himself, such as was given to no other men* yet came forward as little as possible in a commanding manner, and endeavored, as much as in them lay, to act with the free co-operation of the churches in all the circumstances which concerned the church. Peter and John in their epistles, placed themselves in the same rank with the leaders of the churches instead of claiming to be the general governors of the churches over them. How difficult must it have been to find one individual who united all the qualities requisite for the conduct of the affairs of the churches and who alone possessed the confidence of all men. The monarchical principle in spiritual things accords but ill with the spirit of Christianity, which constantly points to the feelings of mutual need and common deliberation and prayer. Where two or three are gathered in the name of the Lord, there also He promises He will be among them."

Doukhobor Notes.

WEST GROVE, Pa., Second Month 10th, 1900.

WM. EVANS:

Dear Friend—This morning's mail brought Canadian letters relative to Doukhobor interests, so little has been known regarding the Russian settlers of late that even limited information will be of interest.

Interpreter Leonhardt, who was with J. S. Elkinton and myself among the settlements, is now engaged in travelling through the villages as a government correspondent. His instructions, from Commissioner of Immigration McCreary, are, in part, to inspect a "dry wood" section between Conan and Swan River, the region having been visited by fire, and if satisfactory, arrange for Doukhobors to cut and pile the wood for 75 cents per cord. It is quite an extensive undertaking; he is expected to make a general tour among the various settlements, to ascertain their condition at this time, and know of pressing needs.

It is relieving to know that this particular person is making the rounds. It would seem that a Providence was in his apparent accidental appearance in Winnipeg when the first company of Doukhobors arrived there. He had left Russia perhaps ten years before, partly to find relief from military duty, and went to Dakota to farm; he drove his team all the way to Winnipeg, and engaged in hauling, for some time, in the city. Hearing of the expected arrival of the Russians, he was at the R. R. Station when they came; his mother tongue had been for the most part forgotten; but, knowing a little of the language, he was pressed into service by the Commissioner. He entered into sympathy with the immigrants, went with them, located some of their villages, assisted them in planting crops last spring, and has been actively engaged in various ways to ease the burdens of strangers in a strange land. That he was held in esteem by the Doukhobors in general, was quite evident, when we were in that country.

Nearly 950 pounds of garden seeds have been purchased and forwarded to Winnipeg, there to be divided into packages for the various villages, about fifty-five in number.

As there seemed a lack of knowledge on various matters, a circular, giving directions regarding planting crops, and advice on other matters, has been prepared and forwarded to the Director of the Canadian Experimental farms for his approval or criticism. This has been translated into Russian, and five hundred copies are now being printed at a New England establishment, together with tags for each bag of garden seed, with name in English and Russian, the idea being that, having gone to some trouble to ascertain varieties adapted to their climate, if these were satisfactory, they would know what to order another year. Farm seeds, in large quantities, will be needed in the near future, and much more money will be required in their purchase than was the case with garden seeds. The Dominion Government intends to supply seeds not furnished by our Friends, though the amount thus advanced must be returned by the Doukhobors, who must also pay a ten-dollar Government fee for each quarter section in order to gain a title to their lands.

Thy friend,

WM. B. HARVEY.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATI
WINNIPEG, Manitoba, January 26th, 190

TO FRED. LEONHARDT,

Sir:—As agreed upon verbally to-day, I sire that you should proceed to-morrow to S River with Zeberoff and Archer, in the capa of interpreter and correspondent for the G ernment among the Doukhobor colonies, b North and South, for the next few mon Your engagement will be by the month at rate of forty dollars per month, we to pay y expenses and to furnish you with a team conveyance. . . . .

You will first get off at Fisher's Mill, betw Cowan and Swan River and, with Zeberoff John Sinnott, Contractor, inspect the limit dry wood near that station, and if the re sentations of Mr. Sinnott are correct, b Zeberoff close a contract on behalf of the Do hobors to cut and pile this wood at seventy- cents per cord. Sinnott to furnish camps, e stoves and saws, together with one or two to keep the saws in shape. In this way Doukhobors should be able to earn consider money, as women can assist in piling and men should be able to cut a cord to two c per day. Urge upon them to be careful of standing trees, as it is quite likely that the will have burned the earth away from the ro and should a windy day come these may t down and are liable to injure the Doukhol without warning. From personal experie I know this is a most dangerous bush to w in—that is what is known as wind-fall standing trees here and there. So warn t specially on this point. . . . .

On reaching the North Colony, you could your horse a couple of days, and on foot the various villages, show them the letter w I have addressed to the Doukhobors—encl —and have a general talk with them as to t future condition, telling them that you return later on with more details.

The object of your going among these pe is that you as a representative of the Gov ment, may meet them, learn their wishes write me. You will keep a diary . . and report to me three or four times a mo at least, in writing in German language, w you have done. These letters with your d sent in each month will keep me in close to with the colonies. One of the chief thing do on your first trip is to learn definitely much seed of various kinds they will requ . . . . When you visit a village you sh devote at least a couple of pages of your di telling exactly what they have in the wa ploughed land, cows, horses, oxen, water sup food supply, and in fact all particulars that can think of, and which I should know. I s be able from this book to check the statem sent me down by Archer and the Philadel Friends, a copy of which statement Mr. Ar tells me he has handed to you. . . . . leaving Pelly you need not call at many villa as I said before, but I think it might be ne sary for you to go to the villages of Koge of the Cyprus Doukhobors, where the Gov ment horse which St. John has been usin being wintered. You will take this horse, bu and harness into Yorkton. . . . .

You will, of course report to Crerar t trip through the South Colony, and to Ha while in the North Colony. Write to me have them write full particulars, and keep t of what is transpiring. I will write ain to Yorkton.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

Good Reference.

John was fifteen, and very anxious to get a desirable place in the office of a well-known lawyer who had advertised for a boy, but doubted his success, because, being a stranger in the city, he had no reference at present.

"I'm afraid I'll stand a poor chance," he thought, despondently; "however, I'll try to appear as well as I can, for that may help me a little."

The keen-eyed lawyer glanced him over from head to foot.

"Good face," he thought, "and pleasant ways."

Then he noted the neat suit—but other boys had appeared in new clothes—saw the well-brushed hair and clean-looking skin. Very well, but there had been others quite as cleanly; another glance, however, showed the finger-nails free from soil.

"Ah! that looks like thoroughness," thought the lawyer.

Then he asked a few direct, rapid questions, which John answered as directly.

"Prompt," was his mental comment; "can speak up when necessary. Let's see your writing," he added, aloud.

John took a pen and wrote his name.

"Very well, easy to read, and no flourishes. Now, what references have you?

The dreaded question at last!

John's face fell. He had begun to feel some hope of success, but this dashed it again.

"I haven't any," he said slowly; "I'm almost a stranger in the city."

"Can't take a boy without references," was the brusque rejoinder, and as he spoke a sudden thought sent a flush to John's cheek.

"I haven't any references," he said, with hesitation, "but here's a letter from mother I just received. I wish you would read it."

The lawyer took it: It was a short letter.

"My Dear John:—I want to remind you that wherever you find work you must consider that work your own. Don't go into it, as some boys do, with the feeling that you will do as little as you can, and get something better soon, but make up your mind you will do as much as possible, and make yourself so necessary to your employer that he will never let you go.

"You have been a good son to me, and I can truly say I have never known you to shirk. Be as good in business, and I am sure God will bless your efforts."

"H'm!" said the lawyer, reading it over the second time. "That's pretty good advice, John—excellent advice. I rather think I'll try you, even without the references."

John has been with him six years, and last spring was admitted to the bar.

"Do you intend taking that young man into partnership," asked a friend lately.

"Yes, I do. I couldn't get along without John; he is my right-hand man!" exclaimed the employer, heartily.

And John always says the best reference he ever had was a mother's good advice and honest praise.—Selected.

Selected for "The Friend."

The Friendships of Duty and of Choice.

. . Behind all personal relationships which men establish with one another, there is the common bond of the universal human relationship; this larger fellowship inclosing all lesser fellowships, as the nation includes all shades of citizenship. All men and women of any sensitiveness put the highest value on personal relationships, and count their friends among the foremost gifts of life and their friendships among their invaluable possessions; but there are a great many who never recognize in any practical way the larger fellowship of humanity; who treat friendship as if it were a luxury to be prized and guarded like a precious vase or a rare book, and not a large, free, noble opportunity for drawing out the best from another and giving the best in return.

Our friendships are often selfish without our being conscious of the fact. We look to friendship as a fountain from which only sweet waters ought to flow; as a tie which ought to bring us only good cheer, comfort and pleasure. But friendship has obligations and duties, and is to be sought, not only among those who are by nature akin to us, and who therefore fall in with every mood and respond to every emotion, but among those who in many ways may be personally distasteful. Most men and women are thrown to a considerable degree with those to whom they are not personally drawn; whose personality, manners, temper or quality of mind repels rather than attracts; and when intimacy with such persons is forced upon us by circumstances, we rebel against it as an intrusion upon a domain over which we have absolute sovereignty. Such persons are often put to us in the place of friends, and in positions in which it is practically impossible not to accept them as friends. Our instincts tell us that we have a right to avoid intimacies with all those who are not thoroughly congenial, but the conditions of life often contravene the instincts and place us in intimacies without our will.

Under these circumstances it is possible to take one of two attitudes: an attitude of unwilling acceptance, or an attitude of open-minded endeavor to get the best out of an association which we did not seek; to attempt to substitute for the personal tie the universal tie, and to treat our forced companionship as a chance to learn something more of our common humanity. If one has the clearness of sight and the courtesy of soul to accept an enforced relationship in this spirit, it is surprising how much he can give and how much he can get out of that relationship. Out of such companionships, unsought and reluctantly accepted, have sometimes come the sweetest of friendships; and in all such companionships there are the richest possibilities of mutual helpfulness and therefore of common growth. We cannot afford to be selfish in the selection of our friends; if we are, we diminish our own capacity and contract our own resources for spiritual growth. The strong nature can afford to give where it does not look for a return; to develop an interest where it does not instinctively feel one; to foster a regard and admiration when these things do not come of themselves. It owes, as a matter of fact, much to the larger relationship which is forced upon men by the mere fact of race-fellowship.

Items Concerning the Society.

The membership of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting is now ascertained to number 197. Statistics collected in Twelth Month and reported in THE FRIEND of the 3rd inst., gave the number as 149.

We are in receipt of the first number of a periodical in Spanish, published in Havana, Cuba, and bearing the title: "EL AMIGO—Defensor del Christianismo Evangelico (THE FRIEND — Defender of Evangelical Christianity). Its publisher is Francisco Gonzalez Cala, whose change from Romanism to a general acceptance of Friends' views has heretofore been noted in our columns. The scope of his monthly periodical may be gathered from these words: "Although our periodical bears the name of the church which its publisher represents in Cuba, this publication does not aim to sustain sectarian religion in the field of the press, but to proclaim Christ and declare his holy Gospel to all men." Some of the titles of contents are: "Divisions of Protestantism," "Romanism and Paganism," "The Love of Jesus," "The Origin of Protestantism," "Notices of the Churches."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES—Last week brings the interesting announcement from Washington that the amount of money in circulation on Second Month 1st was $2,003,149,355, the largest amount in our history, this being the first time the two billion mark has been reached. The per capita amount is $25.98, which also breaks the record. The increase in money in circulation since Seventh Month, 1896, has been $494,000,000. Inflation always means increased speculation and higher prices, and thus on a gold basis has come about that expansion for which Bryan proposed the free silver fallacy.

Thomas R. Bard has been elected United States Senator for California to succeed Stephen M. White.

The Senate has ratified the extradition treaty with Peru and the Mexican boundary treaty.

A bill was introduced in the Senate on the 12th inst. by Senator Foster, of Washington, providing for the construction of a Government cable line from the United States to the Philippines by way of Alaska, and for an independent cable from San Francisco to Hawaii. On the same day, the House Committee on Mines and Mining acted favorably upon a bill to create a new Cabinet officer, to be known as the Secretary of Mines and Mining.

The President has issued an executive order placing the island of Tutuila, our Samoan Island possession, under the control of the Navy Department.

The American flag has been raised over the Tatanes and Colagan islands, which were omitted from the Paris Treaty of Peace, because lying north of twenty degrees of latitude. A gun-boat went to the Bayat islands to raise the flag found the Japanese flag flying there.

The President has appointed Circuit Judge Taft, of Cincinnati, Chairman of the Philippine Commission. He will sail from San Francisco some time after Third Month 15th.

The Marine Hospital Service advises from Honolulu, relative to the plague, indicate that there had been no new cases between First Month 25th and Second Month 2nd. Seventy-four hundred persons were under quarantine, and the outlook was encouraging.

Lieutenant Commander J. C. Colwell, United States Naval Attache in London, witnessed at Yeovil, on First Month 17th, the test of an invention which has been offered to the Government for steering torpedoes and submarine craft by means of a wireless electrical device on the lines of the Marconi system. The invention, however, is not in any way connected with Marconi. Lieutenant Commander Colwell was much pleased with the experiment, which demonstrated that the principles were correct.

The India Relief Association, of Abilene, Kansas, shipped a carload of corn last Seventh-day to Bombay, India, for the relief of famine sufferers. Two more carloads will be sent.

Consul Hill, at Amsterdam, has transmitted an appeal for aid of the diamond workers, 3000 of whom are out of work on account of the South African war.

Governor Taylor, of Kentucky, decided, after a conference with a large number of prominent Republicans from all over the State, not to sign the Louisville compromise agreement, but to let the controversy over the State Government take its due course. He issued a proclamation, reconvening the General Assembly in Frankfort on Second Month 12th, at noon. The greater part of the militia were at the same time ordered to their homes. Applications for injunctions against the Kentucky State Board of Election Commissioners and the Democratic contestants for minor State offices have been made to Judge Taft, in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, in Cincinnati.

The total candy output of the United States last year was at least $75,000,000.

The salaries of New York city for 1900 will amount to $40,804,837, or $6,000,000 more than for 1899.

The arrests for drunkenness in Boston last year averaged sixty-five per day, or 4 per cent. of the population.

Statistics concerning building operations show that the year 1899 was one of great activity. The total for twenty-one cities was $229,900,000 in 1899, and $163,500,000 in 1898, an increase of over $66,000,000.

Eighty per cent. of the cost of the world's governments is caused by wars—past, present and prospective.

Signals have been sent by wireless telegraph through a suite of seven rooms, the doors of which were closed. They were transmitted through a telegraph switchboard containing both dead and live wires.

There were 531 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 24 more than the previous week and 38 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 289 were males and 242 females: 87 died of pneumonia; 61 of consumption; 35 of heart disease; 23 of diphtheria; 21 of bronchitis; 19 of apoplexy; 17 of convulsions; 17 from casualties; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of marasmus; 15 of nephritis; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of old age; 13 of cancer; 11 of inanition; 10 of uræmia; and 9 of atheroma.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5¼ a 6c.; good, 4¾ a 5¼c.; medium, 4 a 4¼c.; common, 3 a 3¾c.; lambs, 5¼ a 7¼c.

HOGS were active at 6¾ a 7¼c. for Western.

FOREIGN.—The third unsuccessful attempt of the British to advance for the relief of Ladysmith was begun on the 5th inst., by Buller's army, which crossed the Tugela on that day. Furious fighting followed, in which artillery and infantry were engaged on both sides, and continued two days. The army then recrossed the Tugela River and took up its old position. It is said that with the fresh additions to the British forces in South Africa, soon to be made, Lord Roberts will have an army of effective men in the field, numbering 194,000.

The olive crop of France, Italy and Spain is practically a failure. As compared with an average crop it will hardly reach a third in the opinion of well informed judges. The Italian olives are the greatest sufferers from the pest to which existing conditions are due. Southern France being also affected, and Spain in some localities. The damage is wrought by a fly which deposites its eggs in the green fruit.

Merchandise imports into France during 1899 decreased $51,000,000; exports increased $79,640,000.

The German direct cable from Embden to New York, by way of the Azores, will be laid by a London company. It will cost £985,000. The cable will be 4336 miles long.

The influenza, which has spread throughout Germany, now numbers 60,000 victims in Munich. In Berlin every bed in every hospital is occupied.

A decree has been issued at Lisbon announcing that the bubonic plague has disappeared from Oporto, and that the quarantine of that port has been raised.

The mortality from the plague in Bombay on the 6th inst. was unprecedented. There was a total of 408 deaths, and the situation is aggravated by the famine refugees.

The British India Office has received a dispatch from Lord Curzon, saying that distress from the famine is increasing, and that those now in receipt of relief number 3,784,000.

On the express trains running between Vienna and Constantinople the use of a sleeping berth costs 60 cents first class and 40 cents second class for every twelve hours.

Within the last two years about a hundred post offices have been established in China. The registry fee for letters is only 2½ cents.

There are 10,000 miles of railway now in operation or under construction in Africa.

Ostriches have only recently been domesticated in South Africa. Only eighty were in captivity in 1865; ten years later there were 21,751 being cared for in Colony, and in 1897 237,960. The true wild bird exists north of the Vaal and Orange river, but is eag hunted for its feathers, which command a higher than those of domesticated brethren.

disciple turned manward in his mind, ind of Godward, is a stumbling-block in the of Christ—a hindrance to his purpose.
lthough our Lord had called Simon "blessed" he fresh recipient of a revelation from the ner that Jesus was the Christ, and there-n He had re-named him "a stone," as by vir-of revelation being of that spiritual Rock vhich he would build his church; yet the next recorded interview between them vs that even a stone so blessed could get Christ's way as a stumbling-block.
ur Saviour, when Peter would humanly deny dvance his crucifixion, called upon the stone, n "adversary," to get behind Him. Peter then turned to be a stone of stumbling to , because he minded "not the things that of God, but the things that be of men."
n Peter's stability as a living stone in the itual house, and his clearness of hindering gospel cause, consisted in keeping his eye le to the openings of Divine revelation, e spirit of wisdom and revelation in the wledge of Him" whom by the same revelahe had seen as the Christ.
he mystery of Christ's cross, sacrifice and ering being yet unrevealed to Peter, he ested against them in the notions of man.
or who among men knoweth the things of an, save the spirit of the man, which is in ? Even so the things of God none know-save the Spirit of God." A human rea-ng on, or reasoning away, Christ's sacrifice
"ransom for the sins of many," has con-ed as a blocking of the way of the gospel n to our own time; and is as obstructive he same carnal mind to-day as it was then Peter's. Upon him who so recently had n blessed as a stone of the Foundation k, but now had turned again to be manded, it brought the title of "adversary," and "an offence;"—because the mind of the flesh is enmity—not subject, and cannot be—to the law of God, and so not disposed to be open to his revealing of truth.

That vacillating course, sometimes Christ-minded and sometimes man-minded, is evident up to the time when Peter was so signally overcome by the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. But neither did this emancipate him from the need of watchfulness, for, according to Paul, a compromising tendency yet appeared in Peter in which he "was to be blamed." But especially before being endued with that power from on high, having in his man-mindedness denied the crucifixion in advance, when this event was about to occur, he followed the Master at a distance, and continued so to shirk an unpopular cause as to deny Him—a lesson to us of to-day that the result of following Christ afar off is denial, and of following close to Him is fellowship.

A danger which besets every professing Christian is man-mindedness, and this is essentially a return to the carnal mind, which amounts, in the face of a sharp test, to enmity. A divided allegiance cannot stand. Even names in the Church are signs of shortcoming. "For while one says I am of Paul, and another I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal?" And also to say, "I am of Christ," is far from security, if we secretly add "more than others."

To "cease from man," from the popular breath, or the maxims of the world, by mere will-power, soon becomes a task of despair. A "separation from," with nothing more lovely to be "separated unto," leaves the seceder still desolate, and disposed to return to that in which his "last state is worse than the first." But the apostle counting all past gains as loss, rejoiced to be "separated unto the gospel of God concerning his Son Jesus Christ." Here is an eternal attraction to cling to. No separation from can be successful without something stronger and better loved to be separated unto. "Where the treasure is there will the heart be also." The cure for man-mindedness is Christ-heartedness. The mind's look will follow the heart's love. We are drawn onward and upward to have the mind of Christ. "Now shall the prince of this world be cast out. And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This He said, signifying what death He should die." The love of Christ constraineth us, reconciled by his death, "not to live unto ourselves, but unto Him who died for us and rose again."

A MEANING MARRED.—In last week's editorial, end of first column, the language, as intended, was, "But the loss of the sacred Scriptures, or the discrediting of them, would be a calamity to man beyond expression." The word "mar," instead of "man," impaired our meaning. We were concerned that readers should not esteem the Scriptures less, but the Spirit which put them forth, more; and not to represent inroads upon them as a matter of indifference, but the foundation of God as standing sure; and to aver that they will be found the truest conservators of holy Scriptures whose life and standing is in Him of whom they testify. The Spirit is a necessity to the life of the letter.

DISTINCTIVENESS IN A MINOR TESTIMONY.—If the writer thus threw away his meaning by the incomplete forming of the letter "r," we would call upon all who place letters upon paper to take warning. We call upon Friends especially who wisely say, "Little foxes spoil the tender vines," and who uphold the importance of carefully guarding little touches of expression as involving great meanings and principles, to be true to their principles in maintaining a conscientious rather than slovenly handwriting. The shaping of each letter has its part in the testimony of truth. If the shaping of a garment spells something to the public eye in the way of testimony; if the form of a phrase plants a principle on him that hath ears to hear; "if whatsoever thy hand findeth to do" thou art to do it "as unto the Lord;" thou art not excused from making the written signs of thy meaning clearly distinctive. We ask not for beauty in the shaping of a letter, but we ask for truth. We ask that when the writer means one thing, he does not let carelessness say another—or a word or letter that might as well be one of several others. We ask for such a compassion on the decipherers' or the printers' eyes as becometh the gospel of Christ. It belongs in principle to little things as well as great whether the trumpet gives an uncertain sound. A mumbling handwriting, and a mumbling utterance of things that ought to be spoken—like an incoherent preaching—serve to frustrate the truth which calls for clearness. Unless they give a distinction in the signs, "how shall it be known what is piped or harped?" It is no one special case that we have in mind, but a variety of them that lately come before our eyes to indicate a large inattention in the smaller things, to a principle of unmistakable plainness of which we suppose ourselves to be representatives in a larger way. As an inspector of older Friends' records and letters we have learned what to expect a Quaker handwriting to be—one that shows the Friends' conscience for care, distinctness, plainness, accuracy, kindness to the reader.

A Brave Act.

The life of a telegraph linesman is one full of peril. In stormy weather the workman holds his life in his hand. Sometime since a shocking accident drew attention to the dangerous nature of the work. Two men were at work on a telegraph pole standing many feet above a line of railway. A wire had broken and they were busy repairing the damage. The wind blew fiercely from the east and the pole rocked to and fro in the blast. Suddenly a strong gust caused one of the men to turn in his position. In doing so he somehow pushed his companion, who, taken unawares, fell backward. He clutched at his mate and both tumbled over amongst the wires.

For a moment the two men hung without speaking a word. Then one of them said:

"Bill, I can't reach the post, and I'm afraid if I move the wire will break." And as he spoke a wire broke.

"Well, mate, it's a big drop down into the grass," replied the other man, "but as you're married and have three children, I don't see why I should stay here."

"No, don't do that, Bill. You'll get killed surely. Let's hang a little longer."

But another wire broke, and Bill made up his mind.

"Good-by, mate," he said to the other, who had tears in his eyes. "Good-by."

Then he dropped—a fall of forty feet. He fell amongst some bushes and rolled down the embankment. When he rose, for he was not dead, he crawled up the embankment.

"I'm all right, mate; I'm going for help."

The station was half a mile distant. When the poor fellow who had risked his life for his mate told his tale he fainted away. The doctor said he had broken his arms and a couple of ribs; but his noble action saved his friend's life and his own.—The Working Boy.

STRENGTH IN STILLNESS.—Those who make the most noise in the world are not those who have the most power in the world. Quiet influences are the most potent forces in God's esteem, and even in man's sight. As Aubrey Moore says, "Great men think, while ordinary men talk. Great saints pray, ordinary men preach. High-sounding words and showy acts may impose upon the few, but it is silent effort which moves the world." This truth is not held popularly; yet Elijah learned it when he was divinely shown that God was not to be recognized in the whirlwind, the earthquake or the fire, as he could be in "the still small voice." Even this world's wisdom testifies to the truth in the adage, "Deep waters run stillest." It is God's voice which says, "Be still, and know that I am God."—S. S. Times.

THE people of this world admire only the exterior of a man, and pass by what is within the mind, which alone is worthy to be esteemed and valued.—The Lutheran.

Whatever He Would Have Me Do.

Cecil was very busy over his Euclid. It was examination day, and Cecil stood a good chance for the prize. The forty boys were, for once, behaving like one. The Euclid examination was in progress. The boys were knitting their brows and racking their brains and spoiling their pencil points in the endeavor to work out the problems.

Cecil King and Hugh Jones had both been doing very well in Euclid during the term, and were about equal in their chance for the prize.

There were ten questions on the paper. Cecil answered the first five quite easily, and he saw that he would be able to do part of the last four. The sixth question ought to have been quite easy to him, but somehow he could not remember it one bit. He knew that if he could only see the figure he should recollect the demonstration at once, but neither figure nor proof could he call to mind.

He decided to leave that question for a time, and do what he could of the other four, but when he had finished them the sixth was as far off as ever.

Hugh Jones was sitting at some distance in front of him, and Cecil, happening to look that way, saw him take a fresh sheet of paper, and put the figure 6 in the top left-hand corner.

Suddenly a great temptation came to Cecil. He had only to shift his seat a very little and stretch his neck a bit, and he would be able to see the lines of the diagram which Hugh was at that minute drawing. One glance at it, and he would be able to answer the question, and probably get the prize.

Again the words came to his mind, "Whatever He would have me do." Cecil was ashamed even to have thought of doing such a mean thing. He hastily looked over what he had written, corrected it a point or two, and handed it in to the examiner with the sixth question unanswered.

And so, he lost the prize? Well, suppose he did? There are better prizes than earthly ones, and a victory over oneself is far nobler than all the Euclid in the world. But Hugh Jones wrote a completely wrong answer to that same sixth question, and as the rest of his paper was not so neat nor so accurate as Cecil's, the latter got the prize.—Zion's Watchman.

REASONS FOR THE VARIOUS SHAPES OF BIRDS' EGGS.—"Birds' eggs differ in shape as well as they do in color," said a well-known ornithologist. "For instance, the eggs of the owl family are almost spherical, and are thus easily moved by the parent bird in her desire to secure an equal amount of warmth to each during the time of hatching. As she nests in a hole, there is no fear whatever of any of her clutch rolling away and being smashed. On the other hand, the guillemot, which nests, or rather lays her eggs on flat, bare rocks in high, exposed latitudes, lays a single egg so elongated and curiously shaped that, when stirred by a violent gust of wind or the bird's sudden flight, it does not roll away, but simply spins around on its axis like a top. In the case of plovers, snipes and other birds that lay four large eggs the eggs narrow so rapidly toward the smaller end that four of them in a nest practically form a square, thus enabling the bird to cover them the more effectually.—Washington Evening Star.

ECCLESIASTES XI: 4.

Are the winds of adversity blowing?
Heed them not, but continue thy sowing;
Thy handful of seeds,
Called "love and good deeds"
May set a whole field all a-growing,
Are clouds of dark doubt o'er thee creeping?
Do thy sheaves seem scarce worthy of reaping?
Remember God's hand
Apportioned thy land;
Sow and leave the result to his keeping.

Edward Browne went from London, (after his business was finished there), to Cork, and Friends of Newcastle Monthly Meeting addressed a few lines to Friends of Cork by way of certificate of removal, of which the following is a copy. This was accompanied by a copy of his own paper of condemnation, and after deliberating on his case, Friends did not feel it incumbent on them to issue a testimony of disownment against him, for the judicious reasons which they state.

"To the Monthly Meeting of Friends at Cork, in Ireland:

"Sheweth, that whereas Edward Browne was an inhabitant amongst us for many years, and lived in good reputation with his neighbor and in unity with Friends, until of late time he launched forth in his dealings, adventures to sea and building houses beyond his ability, against which he was several times cautioned, which together with some considerable losses in trade reduced him to straights and failure of payments, whereby in the end he was declared a bankrupt, at which time he was at London and there stayed to attend the commissioners; after which as soon as was thought convenient we writ to him, setting forth the evil of his out running and the reproach thereby brought upon the profession of Truth, which called for an open condemnation, either from himself or us. So after some time we received one from himself, a copy whereof we have herewith sent you, which, together with what you may receive by personally conversing with him, which we have not had the opportunity of since he failed, hope may be to your satisfaction; as what he writ (we charitably hoping that it come from a sensibly penitent and sincere heart) has been in a good measure to us, for if the merciful Hand hath been graciously pleased to blot out his offenses, his church and people are thereby led to follow that great example, and therefore we in great tenderness and affection recommend him to your tender care and concern for and over him, that he may be encouraged under all his afflictions, and admonished to be faithful to that great and renewed visitation which hath prevailed with him thus to acknowledge his offenses, that so his last day may be his best days, is our very earnest desire and prayer for him; so, with a salutation of our dear love, we remain your friends and brethren at Sunderland the ninth of Twelfth Month, 1729, and signed in and on behalf of the same by" [thirteen members.]

"Cork, Fourth Month 18th, 1730.

Dear Sister, Barbara Smith.—A kind line n thee, amidst my calamities and misfor- s, would have been refreshing, as the re- ng beams of the sun to the drooping plants r a cloudy and wet season, though I have ed that favor and have been left to bear grievous afflictions alone. Yet having had a dear love for thee, which I still in, thou hast been often in my mind, and sweet and edifying conversation we have often enjoyed together particularly that ch passed betwixt us near our last parting ny house; as one part of thy dream or vision hadst concerning me is fulfilled in my er sufferings, so I hope the Lord in his own will also accomplish the other part by de- ring me out of all my troubles, and praised his name. Though I am unworthy, yet I his Divine goodness near to comfort and ain me through and over them all, or else ould have fainted ere this day under the cing anguish and heavy burthen thereof. I been as with Jonah at the bottom of the ng deep, where the weeds, as it were, oped about my neck. but the merciful Lord ook me not and preserved me alive; his lasting arm reached me and brought me gain and set my feet in the land of the g to magnify his ever glorious name.

I doubt not but thou hast heard of the ad- nal affliction I met with here at my arrival, ny father being taken off with an apoplectic few days before, and instead of meeting a kind reception from an affectionate er and a comfortable provision for my sub- ence which he had given me to expect, I nd a house filled with mourning and tears his death, which was so sudden that it gave ime for altering his will as he designed, so he had made about five years before, came orce, and at that time he supposed me to n a thriving way. He left his substance both and personal to his young son, Reneirz, a or, little more than ten years of age. I not particularize the distress this further mity brought me into, being in a strange ntry in such melancholy and necessitous umstances, not having so much money left o pay for my passage. Oh, how have I n tossed about, what anguish has filled my st since thy dear sister, my lovely Margery, snatched from me. She was indeed a pleas- virtuous consort, who if she had been ed might have been made instrumental to serve me from these dismal disasters, but st I grieve under these racking sorrows, is happy on the celestial shore, beyond the h of all disquiet. I am much grieved and urbed that any should lose by me, I can hon- y say, more than at my own great losses sufferings; I was in hopes my father would e put me in such a way that in a little time ight have made up what was deficient to creditors, but being disappointed of that makes my loss the heavier to bear. Yet if ever I am able or favored by Providence to be in a capacity, it is my firm resolution to make up what my effects fall short to them and theirs. Nothing in the world I desire more. I can truly say I designed no wrong to any, and I have this comfort, that my conscience does not accuse me of having ever wilfully injured any person, though I suffered much injustice and oppression.

"I look upon my failure to be rather permitted, and the effect of Divine displeasure for my unfaithfulness in what the Lord for some years required of me, for had not the Almighty, who has the hearts of all mankind in his hands, permitted the coal owner to deal so treacherously and cruelly by me, I might have succeeded very well, my business being productive; but since I would not give up to be a fool for Christ's sake I am now justly become one of the world's, and am a poor spectacle to angels and to men. I wish that others by taking warning by me may happily escape the harms and evils I have endured, by not letting their minds out after the glory and riches of the world, when they should have their hearts in deep humility retired to the heavenly gift in themselves, and through the ability thereof be doing the Lord's business. Oh, it is a very dangerous state and great infelicity for men to be doing their own things and neglecting the things of Jesus, who laid down his life and suffered, that he might redeem poor mortals from contemptible objects. Therefore, it's very just in Him, and I believe merciful, too, to sweep all those things away from me that so I might trust in nothing but the living God.

"There were divers testimonies delivered in a prophetic manner in our meeting at Sunderland, which seized my spirit with a sense of their belonging to me. Oh, how signal and remarkable have been the Lord's merciful dealings and visitations to me a poor creature, not worthy of the least of his mercies. This I shall notify, that John Turner, from Ireland, in Samuel Maude's parlor, I being there with some few friends, after meeting signified 'that the Lord would require of some there to bear a public testimony to his name and Truth, and that if obedience were not yielded thereto, severe judgment would be inflicted on them and that it would go near to cost them the natural life.' John Appleton, Josiah Fotheringham and Mary Hutchinson did all, at sundry times declare in a very particular manner, 'there was a person in that meeting whom the Lord called to come forth and promulgate his blessed Truth, and that if obedience was yielded a blessing should follow upon all his concerns, otherwise losses upon losses, disappointments upon disappointments, confusion and desolation should fall upon him, and all that he took in hand should be blasted,' and out of the meeting they gave me to understand their concern related to me and that I was the person. A letter which I received soon after from Mary Hutchinson, which I have now by me, is clear as to her part: and the summer before that deplorable winter wherein destruction came upon me like a whirlwind because I had not answered when the Lord called.

"Mungo Bewley, another Friend from Ireland, was at our meeting, and was much concerned there to declare, 'some great distress and calamity was impending and near to fall upon some there,' and after meeting, when a few Friends, amongst whom were Samuel Maude and myself, were sitting together, after some time of silence he intimated the concern he had in the meeting was renewed upon his spirit; that it belonged to one then in company. He said a great weight and unusual burthen loaded and oppressed him in sympathy with the very grievous sufferings and afflictions that approached some then present, but that he was comforted in feeling the mercy of God covering the judgment seat, and its being confirmed to him that the Lord would preserve alive through all and bring them at last to rejoice in his salvation and to triumph over all tribulations and temptations, through the arisings of his holy seed and eternal power into dominion. This I was very feelingly touched with, and deeply was it imprinted, and often did revolve over and over again in my mind, but still hoped it would not be my lot, but expected it might belong to some other, but now it's clear to me that I was the man; and feeling the Lord's mercy near I am made patiently to wait and quietly to hope for God's salvation as I have borne the chastisement predicted. To the Lord God be glory, honor and praise through all his dispensations, but to me shame and abasedness of self who am but dust and ashes before Him. How often has his word been as a flame of fire in my breast, and through the awe and dread thereof every joint been made to tremble; and though his message was on the tip of my tongue, yet was stifled in the birth through my too great modesty and delicacy, doubting I should not deliver it sufficiently methodical and elegant, but alas! this was my weakness and sin, for had I dwelt low and empty enough He would have been as an overflowing fountain, and had I kept close to an inward, waiting, depending frame of mind upon the Lord, He that brought to the birth would have given strength and courage to bring forth; but an aspiring mind, the cares of the world, poring on dead letters and cobweb learning, instead of reading and exercising myself in the book of life, choked the good seed that it brought not forth fruit to perfection; but I hope the good Husbandman is ploughing up the fallow ground and removing the briars, thorns and weeds out of the way, that so the fallow ground of my heart may be ameliorated, his blessed seed may spring up and bring forth fruit to his praise. I beseech Him to forgive my transgressions and grant me patience and resignation under his refining hand, and sanctify this bitter cup He has given me to drink of and that I may learn obedience by the things which I suffer; 'O gracious God, whatever I suffer here, spare me hereafter. O grant me reconciliation through the death of thy beloved Son and save me by his life and take me to thy Infinite mercy.'

"Dear sister, I salute thee in that endeared and indelible love, which no traverses nor mutations of time can ever extinguish, nor distance of sea or land divide, and remain thy very affectionate brother,

"Edward Browne."

After his return to his native land it appears that he did not continue many months in this state of probation. In a record book belonging to the Monthly Meeting of Cork is the following memorandum:

"Edward Browne, son of Joseph Browne, of Cork (who lived in the north of England) died in Cork at the house of Joseph Hoare, Eighth Month 27th, 1730."

"Arise, O Lord," said David, "deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword, from men which are in thy hand, from men of the world, which have their portion in this life" (Psalm xvii: 13, 14).

It seems to have been a person of this description who was thus permitted after Edward Browne's defection, to involve him in such deep distress; but had he in humility and watchfulness pursued the path of duty, which was so clearly opened to his view, is there not reason to believe that he would have witnessed preservation and had thereby verified the assurance, that, "when a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him" (Psalm xvi: 7).

And yet whilst in perusing the foregoing pages the mind of the reader may have been dipped into sympathy with Edward Browne on account of the deep distress into which his mind was plunged; it is consoling to believe that his afflictions, through the power of redeeming love became sanctified to Him; and that his immortal spirit was prepared to unite with those "which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Uses of Turpentine.

Spirits of turpentine will restore the brilliancy to patent leather. Boots and bags look almost new under its influence.

Applied to a burn where the skin is not broken, it gives quick relief.

It sends down the skin of a blister and prevents soreness.

Workmen's white overalls and artists' working aprons should be steeped in turpentine for twenty-four hours before washing to loosen and remove paint.

A little added to the steeping water (a tablespoonful to a gallon) will make linen beautifully white.

A flannel dipped in hot water and sprinkled with turpentine will relieve hoarseness. This application is often also ordered for the relief of lumbago and rheumatism. It generally relieves neuralgia in the face.

A few drops in boxes and cupboards will prevent moths.

Soak rags in it, and then place near the holes of mice. Renew the oil from time to time. It effectually drives them away.

Add a few drops to starch to prevent the iron sticking.

For a paint mark on cloth that will not wash, put turpentine on with a small brush. Begin on the outside of the stain and work to the middle, in order to prevent it spreading.

Turpentine mixed with beeswax makes a well known polish for floors. A cloth wrung out of turpentine brightens up an oil cloth.

Two parts of sweet oil and one of turpentine make a reliable furniture polish. It instantly removes finger marks.

But do not forget that turpentine is highly inflammable, and that it should never be exposed to a flame of gas or fire.—Ledger.

THE Heavenly record can be marvelously changed by God's love, if we will accept that love, but He will not force it upon us.

THE RIVER OF PEACE.

Ever so deep is that happy river,
Ever so sweet is its surge to thee;
Ever so dear the recollection
Of its heaven-expanded marge will be.

Thine eyes looked down the golden future
With grateful tears and with loving trust,
Believing the path of life would brighten
But thy dreams have flown, as sweet dreams must.

Never a wound of disappointment,
But has its balm of healing love,
Never a hope, untimely blighted,
But may bloom some day in the fields above.

In the love of trust and the trust of loving,
Then rest thy soul in calm content,
For never an aimless shaft of sorrow,
To a troubled heart is blindly sent.

Never a thrill of tender gladness,
Set to the rythm of love's deep law,
But should touch the chords of truest feeling,
And silence doubt with reverent awe.

Then let Him choose—thy fullest knowledge
Is a shadowy maze in his clear sight,
To whom the planets in regal splendor,
Are as tiny stars in a darksome night.

Ah, He doth choose with wise endeavor,
To lead thy steps in the paths of rest,
And only the heart that has his guiding,
Can be truly safe, or truly blest.

For "The Friend."

Coming to Christ.

"Heaven is so far and yet so near." "The word is very nigh unto thee, in the mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it," (Deut. xxx: 14) cries Moses to the Israelites in the wilderness; and Paul reiterates his words to the Gentiles in the wilderness of this world, to those who not yet having fully believed the promises of God, have not yet entered into that rest prepared for the children of God. "This word," says Paul, "is the word of faith which we preach, that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thy heart that God has raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Rom. x 8: 10. The word preached by Moses, which God required man to do, is the same word of faith, Paul says, which he preached, whose first fruit is a believing unto righteousness. The word is the law of the new and everlasting covenant which God has made with man in Christ, a covenant of peace and rest, with the enjoyment of all the promises, both present and future, which God joyfully fulfills to his believing children. It is the law written on the heart by the finger of God. Men may, through blindness, not see it, or through ignorance, like Belshazzar, be unable to interpret it. But they who are made wise unto salvation read clearly its prophetic warnings.

Many fail through want of faith to enter into this rest; they run well for a while, and turn back again into Egypt; they have felt redeeming power overcoming some indwelling sin, and yet from not continuing in the faith have admitted other sins to hold sway. These are they who have through impatience not suffered the work of God in the heart to go quietly on, but have taken it in hand themselves to do the work in their own way. Like the Israelites who refused to go up at God's command, when his presence and power would have accompanied them, afterwards said in their own will, "We will go up," though Moses told them, "Go not up, for the Lord is not among you, that ye be not smitten before your enemies." Num. xiv 40–43. The path of faith lies in the roadway of obedience to God's word. Christ's word "Come, follow me," comes with power to obey, and whoever neglects the invitations of his love, knows not when the tendering visitations of God's love and mercy to his soul may be renewed. For it is not true "man may come any time," for God calls in his own time and will, and his word comes with power. And the Israelites were doomed to wander in the wilderness for thirty and eight years, and finally to die, in the wilderness, for not obeying God's call, may it not be our lot also, to fail to enter into God's rest, if we disobey his call? True God is indeed long suffering and gracious. He does not deal with us after the deserts of our hard impenitent hearts, else would none live; but He is full of mercy and forgiveness, "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." Yet did he thus deal with Israel in natural things, to teach us his judgments in spiritual things. The unfaithful spies, whose feet had trodden the promised land, died by the plague, but God gave time to others to see their folly, to repent thereof, by making submission to his will, partaking of their daily allowance of manna miraculously bestowed, to acquiesce in the righteousness of God's ways and will, and encourage the rising generation to be more mindful of God's word.

The state and condition of every heart are not unknown to the Omniscient eye. Jesus knew that, "for a long time," the impotent man had waited and waited in vain at Bethesda's pool in hope of healing; but when the word came he was made whole. This teaches us to look unto the Lord from whom alone cometh help, and not unto men; and as men are weaned from self and every created thing, then do they earnestly seek the Lord, and they who seek do surely find. He is near to every one of us. His word searcheth every heart, and trieth every imagination of the thoughts. He maketh himself known to those who enquired not after Him, and his power to be felt by those who acknowledge Him not. If then the wouldst enter into the rest of God, cease from man, from the teachings of man, and from thy own thoughts, and watch carefully for the movings of God's Spirit which directs thy way, reproves sin, brings thee into true repentance, godly sorrow for sin, and which testifying of Jesus Christ, God's only begotten and well-beloved Son, points to Him as the Lamb of God that taketh away thy sin; as the way to reconciliation and peace with God; as thy life and thy light, thy rejoicing and thy crown. That walking in his presence, his light will be a swift witness against the evil which thou art to shun, whilst his power will shield thee from harm. He will as surely and as safely lead thee into all truth, as Joshua's angel who came as the "captain of God's host," led his people into the land of promise and of rest, and this the rest is a ceasing to do thy own works, even of righteousness, and following thy own will, and a coming to do God's will, and giving place to do his work in thee.

his rest does the Christian bask in nshine of earthly prosperity, and glory, his path one bestrewed with flowers, and om trials, and cares? Far from it, Christ who leads in the way, turned his back world and its honor and glory, and chose ay of the cross. The Christian is not t from the trials and cares, sorrows and inseparable from life in this wilderness

But he knows, that "all things work er for good for those who love the Lord;" ese are but light afflictions in comparithe glory to follow; that they are but hammer an l the chisel which the master fit his stones for each one's place in the g. Christ Jesus, who drank the cup of ng to the dregs, by his presence and symwith his brethren, sweetens every bitter ases every burden, and soothes all our s. Piercing through the darkness of by faith the Christian beholds the lights ven illumine this gateway to glory. The ian's sorrows may at times be deeper hose of other men, but his joys far exuch as flow from the fulfilment of earth's t and most cherished desires. Nor like easures of the world do they cease here; y presence is fulness of joy, at thy right re pleasures for evermore."

g and earnestly does the Lord by his stand and plead with his people, entreatem to "come, follow me." Happy are ho, hearing his voice, incline their ear, rn to and harken to his instructions; for rd is come to teach his people himself, s with them and among them, and crown vith grace and glory. "Lord, thou wilt peace for us; for thou also hast wrought works in us." Isa. xxvi. Therefore Ie, and He alone, be my song and my ll the day long.

acher of elocution in an American colr women told the following incident to riends the other day as a fact:

as listening lately to a class of young who were reading aloud, when one came expression, "the patience of Job." She nced the name as if spelt "jobb," and ausing, said:

on't understand this. Who was Job?"

ve you never read the book of Job?" I n amazement. "Does the name suggest g to you?"

thing whatever," she replied, "except lomehow associate it with printing. Was ublisher?"

r teachers who were present gave other es of the ignorance among American ıd boys of the Bible.

nce asked a graduating class of young college," said one, "why the Jews kept ay as the Sabbath, while Christians obSunday. Not one could tell me, and yet jority of them undoubtedly belonged to g-going families."

her teacher said: "Ignorance of the Bible confined to the girls and boys. I was at a lecture lately beside a young matron, r in fashionable society. The lecturer from the twenty-third Psalm, adding, e sweet singer of Israel tells us.'" neighbor looked puzzled a moment, and then, nodding cheerfully, whispered, 'He means Mendelssohn, of course.'"

It is a mournful fact that while the practical truths of Christianity are now taught in Christian homes, the Bible is not read or committed to memory by the children as it was in past generations.—Episcopal Recorder.

THE LARGEST FLOWER IN THE WORLD.—In the farthest southeastern island of the Philippine group, Mindanao, upon one of its mountains, Parag, in the neighborhood of the highest peak in the island, the volcano Apo, a party of explorers found, at the height of two thousand five hundred feet above the sea level, a colossal flower.

The discoverer, Dr. Alexander Schadenberg, could scarcely believe his eyes when he saw, amid the low-growing bushes, the immense buds of this flower, like gigantic brown cabbage heads. But he was still more astonished when he found a specimen in full bloom, a five-petaled flower, nearly a yard in diameter—as large as a carriage wheel, in fact. This enormous blossom was borne on a sort of vine creeping on the ground. It was known by the native who accompanied Dr. Schadenberg, who called it Bo-o.

The party had no scale by which the weight of the flower could be ascertained, but they improvised a swinging scale, using their boxes and specimens as weights. Weighing these when opportunity served, it was found that a single flower weighed over twenty-two pounds.

It was impossible to transport the fresh flower, so the travellers photographed it and dried a number of its leaves by the heat of a fire. Dr. Schadenberg then sent the photographs and dried specimens to the Royal Botanical Gardens at Breslau, where the learned director immediately recognized it as a species of rafflesia, a plant formerly discovered in Sumatra, and named after the English governor, Sir Stamford Raffles. The new flower was accordingly named Rafflesia Schadenbergia.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

It is in my heart to leave behind me a testimony to the Truth.

In my youth, when dead in trespasses and sins and walking according to the course of this world, although in my infancy educated in an esteem of those precious testimonies borne by George Fox and his fellow-laborers to plainness of dress and address, I continued them in my heart, and departed from them in practice.

When I was awakened to a sense of my lost and miserable estate without a Saviour, I embraced them with all acceptation in their strictest forms, and have not since deviated from them, either in sentiment or practice, not for an hour. They are of God, and will be established in the earth when "the crown of pride" shall be cast down and the glory of all flesh abased. Nevertheless, let none who, by the influence of education or any other means, invariably adhere to them, glory in or value themselves upon a bare exterior conformity to these truths, while the inner man of their heart is full of pride, self-preference and ravening after the unrighteous Mammon.—From the Diary of Samuel Scott.

I LOVE the Lord, because He hath heard my voice and my supplications.

Incident in the Life of James Green.

Reading in [THE FRIEND] some accounts of James Green reminds me of an incident related concerning him (I believe) to the effect that being in Scotland on a religious visit, and about ready to return home, he inquired of the Scotch friend who was with him, if they would reach the seaport to which they were going, in time to take passage for Ireland that Seventh-day. The reply was, "No, and thou will have to stay and attend our meeting to-morrow, when thou mayest have some service."

"Well, if I do attend it will be a meeting to make the devil howl." After some silence he resumed, "I expect thou would like to know what I mean by that remark." The friend replied, "I certainly would." And then he went on to say that between the place where he lived and the meeting-house which he attended, there resided a man who was a perfect outlaw and a desperate character; that as he passed the house one First-day on his way to meeting, he felt an impulse to stop and ask him to go with him, but the idea of asking such a thing from one of his character seemed so strange that he put the impression by and went uneasily on, until at length he concluded that for his own relief he would go back and ask. Knocking at the door a rough voice said, "Come in," and again, "What do you want?" So he told how he had felt impressed to ask him to go to meeting with him. Roughly "No," he would not go; meeting was no place for him and so forth. "Well, I felt it my duty to stop and ask thee, and I think it will be well for thee to go." "No, he would not go; besides, you see how things are, and I could not get ready in time." "Well, wilt thou go with me next First-day if I stop for thee?" After some pause, "Yes, I will." Next week our friend started early to obviate excuse for want of time, and was received as before with a rough "What do you want?" "I called according to my promise to take thee to meeting with me." With a contemptuous expression, "I won't go to meeting with you." "But thou promised to go if I called for thee." "Oh! I only said that to get rid of you; I did not intend to go at all." "I have known some men, and pretty rough ones, too, who, if they made a promise, would stick to it, and I really think it would be well for thee to do so." What others did was nothing to him. Nor was a meeting any place for him to go. And yet after some more parley, to James' surprise, he got ready and went. Now, this all seemed very remarkable to our friend, and he was very desirous that there might be something of a reaching tendency offered in the meeting, and as he had been an instrument in the case, he naturally looked for it to come through him, but he said the more he tried for it the more he could not find anything to say. There were two or three other recorded ministers belonging to that meeting, and such a thing as a silent meeting was seldom held there, but there was one that day. No word spoken from beginning to end. And so James felt sadly disappointed, and with all somewhat ashamed to meet his man, and so kept out of his way. At length, seeing him walking down the road in an apparently sober mood, he ventured to step up to him and ask how he liked their meeting. "That silence of yours was enough to make the devil howl. It seemed to me as if every wicked thing I had ever done came up while I sat there." Said he, "I've heard people say there is no hell, but I know better now, for I've been in it for two hours. You Quakers ought to be good people, if you can go twice a week and sit there as I did to-day, and not become good people, you are made of different stuff from what I take you to be." In the result James said this man continued to attend their meetings and became a reformed character. James, of course, meant no more in his remark than that the meeting would be a silent one, which the friend said did not prove to be the case, as something was offered.

This seems to me to be such a remarkable instance of what might result from a rightly gathered silent assembly that I thought it worth preserving. I had this account from a worthy minister residing in Scotland.

For "The Friend."

A Sample of the Past.

Some extracts from the memoirs of Catharine Seely, of Darien, Connecticut, (who was born Sixth Month 2d, 1799, and died Tenth Month 27th, 1838.) Commencing, at the time of her requesting to become a member of the Society of Friends, about the eighteenth year of her age, thus :

Eleventh Month 6th, 1817. — "I have at length decided upon requesting to become a member of the Society of Friends. A consideration of my unworthiness has, I think, prevented me from attempting anything of this kind for more than two years ; though at times it has been so strongly impressed upon my mind as to cause me to think it would be my duty to attend to it immediately. I felt a fear of being too hasty, and of professing more than I possessed, and thought my deficiencies so great that if I mentioned it to Friends I feared they would think it improper. But in this I found myself mistaken, for some with whom I conversed, encouraged me to go forward, if I think it my duty—not otherwise. The encouragement I likewise received from my affectionate parent, (or father, her mother being deceased) gave me reason to believe that he saw no inconsistency in my conduct, but he never urged or advised me, only to do as I thought best. And now, I trust, I have gone forward in this solemn duty of offering myself to the church in the love and fear of the Lord. Oh, may I, through the help of his Divine power, lead a serious, consistent life, that I may be acceptable in his sight and adorn my profession.

23d.—"I this day received a visit from the committee, appointed by Purchase Monthly Meeting, to confer with me respecting my request to be received into membership. It was a solemn interview, and one Friend remarked : 'To be obedient, is better than sacrifice, and to harken to the voice of the Lord, is better than the fat of rams.' This was the more impressive, as it had previously been repeated to me at the close of a meeting in which I experienced a deep sense of the Lord's presence. Every word of the preaching was so well adapted to my case, that, had I not known it was impossible, I would have thought some outward information of the state of my mind must have been communicated, but I knew that my exercises were known only to God, as well as the condition of my heart, and the waverings of my mind, to Him alone."

Twelfth Month 28th.—"Received a visit from the committee appointed to inform me of my reception into membership, which was done by dear E. Griffen in a solemn manner. May I never forget her seasonable and weighty admonitions and encouragement! Surely praises ought to abound, and my heart melt with gratitude towards my Heavenly Benefactor for protecting me from the vanities and snares of this sinful world, and not permitting me to attend what some call innocent, but what I call sinful, recreation. Many of my acquaintance, and some out of our own family, are this night engaged, (in such), while I spend it mostly in retirement. I pity them, and my heart is turned to God in prayer on their behalf. They call that innocent amusement, which they would not wish to spend their last moments in. Oh! that God would open their eyes, or that they would allow their understandings to be opened, and their sins to be set in order before them, that they may be aroused, and lay hold on eternal life, while it is to be obtained ; for the Lord hath said : 'My Spirit shall not always strive with man.' After a short life of works, we shall enter into an endless one of rewards, and happy will it be for us, if, when we arrive at the judgment bar of God, we shall be found worthy to receive the answer, 'well done, good and faithful servant ; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' But, on the contrary, how awful will it be if our time has not been given to serve the Lord, but surrender to the service of Satan !"

First Month 8th, 1818.—"I attended Purchase Monthly Meeting for the first time, and heard my admission into membership read, with the records of the church, which I believe to be a church of Christ. Although many have departed from the true, living faith which they profess, and have thereby brought reproach on the Society, yet there is a seed which is pure, and these know the principles remain to be the same, as they are sound and unchangeable, being founded by and upon the rock of ages, Jesus Christ. My mind was not filled with so great a degree of sweet enjoyment as has sometimes been my happy lot, yet it was humbled under a sense of my unworthiness to enjoy those privileges I had then commenced partaking.

"Methought my duties were now increased, and, if possible, my weakness and inability also for performing them. My duty is increased in two respects ; first, I have joined myself to a Society with whom I have expressed full unity, therefore my future conduct must correspond, or I shall bring reproach upon the cause ; secondly, I now profess to be on the Lord's side, who said, 'He that is not for me is against me ; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad.' Who that is not a member of his spiritual, would wish to be a member of his outward church, and who indeed can be a true member of the outward, unless he be a member of the spiritual ?

"More is expected of me now by the world than before, which expectation I must earnestly desire, that God will grant me strength to answer.

Fourth Month 3d.—"Oh, sweet retirement! thou art my joyful companion ; thou art the channel through which comfort is conveyed to my soul from the fountain, Christ Jesus have enjoyed a good portion of this retiren to-day ; even when busily employed in dome concerns my soul exclaimed within me, ' others do as they may, as for me and my h we will serve the Lord.' The name of a Ch tian implies a great attainment—greater my feelings will allow me to claim ; and y cannot consider myself a stranger to God, I do feel a want to glorify his name, whi once felt not, and a love for his children (t who bear the mark of the lamb in their f heads) which I once knew not ; in truth, I see a beauty in holiness, which I could not cern through the thick veil of nature. this knowledge and love of Christ, I enjoy real happiness than in all the world besi but, instead of exalting me, I am more more humbled, as I live in the exercise of an allusion to a season of strippedness erty, she then continues: "Through escendings of our Heavenly Shepherd, became impressed early in our meet-morning with solemnity, and desires were renewedly raised for our spiritual advancement in the straight and narrow way which leads to life and peace. The expression of it seemed required, and also to supplicate the Father of mercies, that He would be pleased to extend the crook of His love even to those who had strayed from his house, and that He would make them sensible, that in it there is bread enough and to spare. My mind now enjoys a peaceful quiet, for which I desire to be renewedly thankful to Him, who opens when none can shut, and shuts when none can open."

"I was favored to attend our Quarterly Meeting at Concord, though in much feebleness. In the select meeting my mind was impressed with the need we have of more inwardness, more weightiness and more self-abasement. In the meeting for discipline next day, I was concerned to endeavor to impress the minds of the beloved youth with the beauty of holiness and the excellency there is in a possession of the unchangeable Truth. Fervent were my desires that they might early embrace the offers of Heavenly love, and thereby become as a city set on a hill, which cannot be hid; that others seeing their good works may glorify our Father, which is in Heaven."

At the age of eighty-eight she writes: "In our meeting to-day poverty and heaviness was the clothing of my spirit for a considerable time, and in striving to obtain a little of that wisdom which is profitable to direct aright, my mind was renewedly and solemnly impressed with the awfulness of the standing of those who feel called upon publicly to proclaim the name of the Lord, while in themselves, without Christ Jesus, they are nothing; and while I was exercised in desires to stand acquitted in the Divine Sight, the following passage of Holy Writ revived: 'I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my beloved until he please,' which renewedly gave me to see the necessity of patiently waiting, until the evidence of Divine requiring is clear."

On hearing of a Friend being exercised, in the Select Yearly Meeting, on the subject of silent, reverential waiting and recommending it as one of our peculiar privileges, she said: "It did me good to hear it; oh, this is what we want as a society, even silent waiting before the Most High. This wordy spirit which is among us, I don't know what it will come to, and yet I would not check the lisping of a babe in Christ Jesus. A few words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

In reading an article in the number for First Month 13th, "On the Recognition of Gifts," the thought arose, "May there not be a possibility in regard to both classes mentioned of being too sure? Are not Divine intimations sometimes very gentle and yet no less real?" Paul said, "I was with you in weakness and in fear, and in much trembling." Most truly, "Duty comes not from others' recognition," and as the article says, "He that follows Christ shall not walk in darkness, either as to his own or others' gifts." So while every response to the Divine call must be as to the Lord, and not unto man, with much humility and watchfulness, we cannot doubt that these conditions will be equally shared by such as are qualified to judge. Thus the "timid lisper" will be preserved from being burdensome, and others of perhaps more experience, not in danger of hurting the "oil and the wine."

AN INTERESTED FRIEND.

Items Concerning the Society.

The manager of the North Carolina Friend, in the number for Second Month 25th, announces: "This issue will conclude the publication of the North Carolina Friend." This step seemed compelled "for want of support among the Friends" in that State. The editor, however, adds an appeal for reinforcement of means to re-establish or continue the paper.

The last number mentions an expression made in a recent Quarterly Meeting, that "Some people were like the bell-sheep—if they couldn't wear the bell they would be no sheep at all." Does this refer to such as would not be interested in their meeting except as it confers appointments upon them?

The same Quarterly Meeting acknowledged as entrusted to a member "a gift of exhortation;" "and the meeting grants him liberty to exercise his gift as he may see opportunity."

In the same number appears a letter from Oregon, in which the writer acknowledges his deep interest in establishing young Friends in the doctrine of our religious profession. "This is," he says, "a most neglected work in most of our Yearly Meetings." A committee of North Carolina Yearly Meeting has been under appointment to promote a more definite acquaintance with the doctrines of Friends.

A strong letter is reprinted from a deceased Canada member, who, having tried another denomination for a time, returned to his former membership, and was desirous to confirm the language: "The Society of Friends has no sacrament but the baptism of the Holy Ghost, and a participation by faith in the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—In the United States Senate on the 15th inst. the substitute for the House Currency bill was passed by a vote of 46 to 29. Prior to the final passage of the billi amendments were considered under the ten minute rule. Only two of these were adopted, viz: One offered by the Finance Committee, keeping the door open to international bimetallism, and one by Nelson, of Minnesota, providing for national banks with $25,000 capital in towns of not more than 4000 inhabitants. The votes on the various amendments were practically along party lines. Chandler, Republican, of New Hampshire, voted for the bimetallic amendment, but against the bill. Caffery, Democrat, of Louisiana, and Lindsay, Democrat, of Kentucky, voted against the committee amendment, but for the bill.

The Currency bill is now in conference, the House having refused to concur in the Senate substitute.

President McKinley, in his late Message, said that since the cession of Puerto Rico had been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty. She has lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in the American market. He advised that "the markets of the United States should be opened up to her products. Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico, and give her products free access to our markets."

The Ways and Means Committee of the House has reported a bill imposing a tariff of 25 per cent. of the schedules of the existing tariff. The American tobacco growers are up in arms at this. They demand that a prohibitory duty be adopted, and intimate that otherwise it would be better to let Puerto Rico go. The Republican press is not united on this subject. The New York Tribune supports the view taken by the Ways and Means Committee, but other influential journals hold to the contrary. The Millwaukee Sentinel declares: "If Congress imposes this 25 per cent. duty, if it denies free trade with the United States to Puerto Rico, it will be disregarding the advice of the President and the Secretary of War, and will be doing a grave injury to Puerto Rico. And the motive of Congress will generally be thought not so much a desire to get important constitutional questions before the Supreme Court as fear of competition with Puerto Rico. Such a policy is worthy of Spain. Unless the United States treats the Puerto Ricans as well as citizens of the United States are treated, it ought not to hold a single colony or dependency."

Judge Taft, in the United States Circuit Court, on the 14th inst., decided that the Court had no jurisdiction in the Kentucky election cases and refused the injunctions asked for by the Republicans. He said, however, that after the cases had been heard in the State Courts an appeal could be taken to the United States Supreme Court.

An injunction by which the Democrats seek to oust Taylor from possession of the Kentucky Governorship was filed at Frankfort.

A joint resolution was adopted by the Democratic Legislature at Louisville, adjourning the body to meet at Frankfort on Second Month 19th.

The consumption of tea in the United States was estimated at 80,000,000 pounds in 1899; Great Britain and Ireland, 184,500,000 pounds; Russia, 37,550,000 pounds, and Canada, 22,464,000 pounds. In coffee, the past year, it is estimated that the consumption in the United States was 712,224,000 pounds.

The world is calling for American manufactures at the rate of over $1,000,000 a day.

The United States steamer Nero, during its recent survey for a trans-Pacific cable, broke the record for deep sea soundings. One sounding near Guam Island marked 5263 fathoms, only a trifle short of six statute miles.

At the annual meeting of the Paper and Pulp Association, Second Month 15th, an advance in the price of paper was announced. The greater cost of labor and the scarcity of sprnce pulp in the United States were the reasons stated. The province of Ontario recently decided to prohibit the exportation of spruce pulp to the United States with a view to retaining the industry in Canada as far as possible.

Property of the estimated value of from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000 will have to be acquired by New York City to provide an approach to the proposed Peck Slip bridge across the East River.

In view of the injurious effects of the cigarette habit it is gratifying to learn that in the Second and Third Internal Revenue Districts of New York City the output of paper cigarettes last month was 43,405,970 less than in First Mo., 1899. Yet the use of tobacco in other forms increased. There was a gain of 12,917,586 in the production of cigars, and of 117,510 in the production of all tobacco cigarettes.

There were four new cases of plague reported at Honolulu on Second Month 9th; three deaths since Second Month 6th.

James Dedrick, a Californian, who has just returned from China, is in Bucyrus, Ohio, arranging for the purchase of a number of ten-ton steel wagons and traction engines to draw them. He will establish a service across the desert in China, and will enter active competition for the carrying trade, which is now done by camels. He says the camels can carry only about 600 pounds each and make only twenty miles a day, while his wagons will carry ten tons each and can make sixty miles. He has been over the ground thoroughly, and he expects to have fifty engines and three thousand wagons actively engaged within a year. The first consignment will be shipped Third Mo. 15th.

A cold wave is doing considerable damage in the coast country of Texas to truck farming and fruit. Strawberry farmers have suffered the greatest.

The thermometer registered 25 degrees at Orlando, Fla., on Seventh-day night last. Practically all tender vegetables are destroyed. The strawberry crop has suffered somewhat. The orange, peach and pineapple output will be shortened. There was freezing temperature at Tampa.

Thousands of fires were kept burning all First-day and Second-day nights in groves all over Florida in efforts to save the trees. The trees, as a rule, were in good condition to withstand a freeze, and this fact will prevent serious damage, but the effect of the cold cannot be ascertained till warm weather comes.

There were 503 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 24 less than the previous week and 34 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 262 were males and 241 females: 83 died of pneumonia; 50 of consumption; 47 of heart diseases; 25 of diphtheria; 22 of apoplexy; 19 of convulsions; 17 of nephritis; 14 of typhoid fever; 14 of cancer; 14 of bronchitis; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of uræmia; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of inanition; 11 of marasmus; 10 of peritonitis; 9 of debility, and 8 from casualties.

COTTON was quoted on a basis of 9½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter, super., $2.30 a $2.50; Pennsylvania roller, straight, $3.30 a $3.45; Western winter, straight, $3.45 a $3.60; spring, straight, $3.35 a $3.65; city mills, straight, $3.35 a $3.50. RYE FLOUR, $3.15 a $3.50 per barrel as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 73 a 74c.
No. 2 mixed corn, 39½ a 39⅝c.
No. 2 white oats, clipped, 31½ a 31⅝c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5⅝c.; good, 5¼ a 5⅜; medium, 5 a 5⅛; common, 4⅝ a 4¾c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5¼ a 6c.; good, 4⅝ a 5¼c.; medium, 3⅝ a 4¼c.; common, 3 a 3½c.; lambs, 5½ a 7¼c.

HOGS.—6¾ a 7¼c. for Western, and if the cold weather continues, higher prices are looked for.

FOREIGN.—The British House of Commons has adopted the Government's military scheme by a vote of 239 against 34.

The long siege of Kimberly has been raised by Lord Roberts. The General advanced on the 16th instant and the Boer's dispersed, and Cronje's army disappeared. The British seized Jacobsdal—the burghers shelled as they evacuated the place. There is great rejoicing in London.

Merchandise imports into France during 1899 decreased $51,000,000; exports increased $79,640,000.

Six large diamond grinderies at Hanau have shut down work in consequence of the war in South Africa, and many workmen lose employment.

The average number of horses killed in Spanish bull fights every year exceeds 5,000, while from 1,000 to 1,200 bulls are sacrificed.

The grippe is still gaining ground in Berlin. The physicians assert that there art more than 80,000 persons suffering from the malady, although relatively few cases prove fatal. Ambassador White is still ill.

The coal famine in the Saxon district has become more intense. At Leipsic the price has nearly doubled recently. Many factories, lacking coal, have been forced to close.

In consequence of Russian usurpations there is a great exodus of the people of Finland.

A Manila despatch says that out of a total of 51 cases of suspected plague reported, 42 proved genuine and 32 deaths resulted, half of them being Chinamen. There were 12 cases during the week, mostly within the walled city.

Brazil has declared Argentine and Portuguese ports to be free of the bubonic plague.

The Brazilian Government has received news that Galvez, President of the new Republic of Acre, had captured all the Bolivian troops sent to put down the rebel government. He also captured the Commission sent to take charge of the government, and eight or ten vessels that were trading on the upper Amazon. Telegrams received on the 13th and 14th state that Galvez had armed two swift steamers captured on the upper Amazon as cruisers, and is resolved to defend his new government against the Bolivians. Some, however, seem to think that the Brazilian State of Amazona is backing him.

A despatch of Second Month 13th, from St. John's, N. F., says: "The last American herring vessel has left Placentia Bay, having abandoned the fishery in consequence of the mild weather. About forty vessels have failed to secure cargoes, thus involving a shortage of about 50,000 barrels of herring. This result, which is the worst known in ten years, will largely cripple the American dealers concerned in the industry. Moreover, the coast fishermen will lose nearly $100,000. Very few vessels remain at Bay of Islands. The fishery there is also virtually over."

DIED, at his home in Moorestown, N. J., on the t of Eleventh Month, 1899, DAVID COMFORT, an el Chester Monthly Meeting, in the eighty-first year age. From boyhood he had accepted the inexpr gift of the Holy Spirit, enlightening his understa and leading him into the way of Life. He was a meek and quiet spirit, sweet and loving in the ci his acquaintance, exercising a valuable influence the families of his neighborhood, both of Friend others. Few have been more deeply attached simple, truthful, heart-searching doctrines of Chris to the rules of our Discipline, resulting from the teaching. He has said that in early manhood many best hours had been known when he was followi daily occupation alone, on his farm. He was rema skilful as a gardener as long as his bodily strength loved the handiwork of the Creator as displayed in and flower, and enjoyed sharing the product of hi with others. He became an invalid about eighteen m before his death, and at times endured discomfo suffering, but was preserved in exemplary pa though much confined at home, and sometimes bed. Though thus separated from his friends at meetings, his spirit joined with theirs in religious cise, at such times. Having lived a life of uprig and dedication, he was made ready to depart, and h his Divine Master, and having given proof of true pleship, from love to his brethren, we cannot doub his spirit has joined the just of all generations.

The Profligate Press.

e extreme of unscrupulous sensationalism nich "yellow journalism" seems of late aching, encouraged by the multitudinous nage—"like priest, like people"—that l have it so, has become the occasion of ing some more healthful minds to seek a er movement in the interest of a purer, lesome, and a truthful newspaper literae were not about to include as a part of s movement, though perhaps it uncon-sly is,—the approaching experiment of es M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," ing it to be a passing curiosity, rather a true experiment in demonstrating the i of Christianity on the daily press. Most r readers are doubtless aware that the rs of the Topeka Daily Capital have de- to place for one week its plant and the editorial and business control of the p in the hands of that writer, "that he exemplify his idea as to what a Christian l newspaper ought to be." For six days, mencing with Third Month 13th, "Dr. e on will be absolute director of *The Capi-*unhampered he will 'dictate its policy, its news columns, control its advertising.' i expected that the experiment may have aching influence upon the press."

The apparition of such daily paper, however rtianly conducted, will itself be a sensa-ns a six days' wonder, rather than a valid periment; which, to be normal, should run a e of years "through evil report and good rt, as deceivers and yet true, as chastened not killed," before it can make full proof s ministry. But still the attempt has its lt. The very prospect of it has doubtless da righteous effect in causing a nation what to pause and consider the mental noral blight which a libertine press, cater-o vitiated tastes by vitiating them, ministers to the character of the nation. Accordingly the step which the Topeka Capital is taking, though but a single one, yet in the wide echo which its sound awakens, shows that the key-note of a far-reaching protest has been touched. "I am anxious," says C. M. Sheldon, "to prove to the world that a daily newspaper can be run on Christian lines, and succeed without catering to the morbid curiosity of the baser instincts. I propose to inspect all matter that goes into the paper during the week, and subject it to the general test, 'What would Jesus do?'"

Rightly to answer such a question, inferences from an historical retrospect of what Jesus did "in the days of his flesh" will not suffice. It requires in the devout seeker the mind of Christ, the witness of his Spirit to apply the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus to the incidents of the day as they arise. All depends on what state and anointing imbues the mind and heart that stands before the people as the practical interpreter of Jesus. But we are glad to see that editor's mind and concern turned in such a direction, and hope that over and above the human imperfection his faithfulness will be owned as a testimony for good.

Sheldon's sheet, so briefly tossed into the breeze, may serve as a straw in the wind which "bloweth where it listeth" to prove its direction. It appears as a motion in a movement which has been exercising thoughtful minds in influential quarters eastward also. But it is likewise interesting to note how long ago that same wind was whispering his still, small voice in the ears of one of our own religious Society. Contemporary with the lifetime hitherto of our present periodical, THE FRIEND,—now exceeding threescore and ten years,—there has stood on paper the following writing of Jonathan Dymond, in his valuable treatise on Christian Morality, describing from a standpoint which Friends would continue to own to-day, the true function and service of a newspaper:—

> In this country the periodical press is a powerful engine for evil or for good. The influence of the contents of one number of a newspaper may be small, but it is perpetually recurring. The editor of a journal of which no more than a thousand copies are circulated in a week, and each of which is read by half a dozen persons, undertakes in a year a part of the moral guidance of thirty thousand individuals. Of some daily papers the number of readers is so great, that in the course of twelve months they may influence the opinions and the conduct of six or eight millions of men. To say nothing, therefore, of editors who intentionally mislead and vitiate the public, and remembering with what carelessness respecting the moral tendency of articles a newspaper is filled, it may safely be concluded that some creditable editors do harm in the world to an extent in comparison with which robberies and treasons are as nothing.

It is not easy to imagine the sum of advantages which would result if the periodical press not only excluded that which does harm, but preferred that which does good. Not that grave moralities, not, especially, that religious disquisitions are to be desired; but that every reader should see and feel that the editor maintained an allegiance to virtue and to truth. There is hardly any class of topics in which this allegiance may not be manifested, and manifested without any incongruous associations. You may relate the common occurrences of the day in such a manner as to do either good or evil. The trial of a thief, the particulars of a conflagration, the death of a statesman, the criticism of a debate, and a hundred other matters, may be recorded so as to exercise a moral influence over the reader for the better or the worse. That the influence is frequently for the worse needs no proof; and it is so much the less defensible because it may be changed to the contrary without a word, directly, respecting morals or religion.

However, newspapers do much more good than harm, especially in politics. They are in this country one of the most vigorous and beneficial instruments of political advantage. They effect incalculable benefit both in checking the statesman who would abuse power, and in so influencing the public opinion as to prepare it for, and therefore to render necessary, an amelioration of political and civil institutions. The great desideratum is enlargement of views and purity of principle. We want in editorial labors less of partisanship, less of petty squabbles about the worthless discussions of the day; we want more of the philosophy of politics, more of that grasping which can send a reader's reflections from facts to principles. The disjointed fragments of political intelligence ought to be connected by a sort of enlightened running commentary. There is talent enough embarked in some of these; but the talent too commonly expends itself upon subjects and in speculations which are of little interest beyond the present week.

Substantially on these lines, as we are verbally informed, certain wealthy parties of high character in the city of New York are contemplating to combine in endowing a daily newspaper,—to make its financial foundation so strong that it can even dispense with advertisements, and be at the mercy of no perverted tastes in subscribers for support; a paper consistent with the progress of a truly Christian civilization. Such a paper, conducted not for gain but for the righteousness which exalts a nation, and thoroughly to be relied on in all departments of information, must ultimately meet a wide response, and serve to elevate the standard of other journals, as these in their downward turn are influencing a degeneracy even of the magazine literature. Other highly conscientious dailies heretofore attempted, being dependent on their subscription lists for maintenance, have had to retire from the field.

Cannot an application of these considerations be made to the case of this periodical, THE FRIEND? Its management has thus far preferred to keep clear of advertisements as means of making its price lower. It would, if it could, stand independent of its subscription list in its mission for the fundamental principles of our religious Society, and for its supply of improving reading for the families of Friends. Substantially endowed, it could be in an improved position in its own proper line to serve the church, comparable to that of an endowed New York daily in its service for the public good.

AN ENSAMPLE TO THE FLOCK.

In considering the career of our late valued friend William Kite, especially that portion of his life so usefully spent as Librarian of the Friends' Free Library at Germantown, it has occurred to me that nowhere did he more effectually preach than among the many youthful patrons of that Institution. And even now, when we no more see him moving around amongst us, does the example he has left us call loudly, especially to the young, for more dedication. If the young people would dedicate themselves and their talents to the Master, judges would truly be raised up at the first and counsellors as at the beginning; and while all are not called to minister in the great congregation, there is an immense field to be occupied by dedicated workers. Many now-a-days, like Ahimaaz of old, are ready, aye anxious to carry tidings, but because they have no message given them can bring only an empty report of a tumult, although like Ahimaaz, they may be reputed good. Dear young people, the Master has need of you, and if you are willing to dedicate your all to Him, waiting for Him to fit and fashion you according to his will, you will, if faithful, become instruments in his hand for the promotion of truth and righteousness. Whether it be the five talents of the trained intellect or whether it be only the one talent of the patient and obscure sufferer, if these be dedicated, consecrated, made fit for the Master's use, He will bring forth the increase. The church and the world are in need of workers—not working in their own way, or in their own time, or along lines of their own choosing—but dedicated workers willing to wait, as the disciples were bidden, until endued with power from on high, and with such there will be a more ample realization of the ancient prophecy "that my word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish that whereunto I sent it," and it can be truly said of such as these, as it could of our late valued, aged Friend, that the world was better because of their example.

The Doukhobor Exiles in Siberia.

The London Friend publishes the following: Friends who have been interested in the emigration of the Doukhobors to Canada, will like to know that an effort has been made to obtain the release of those who were exiled to Siberia —about 110 in number—before the emigration was permitted. A memorial to the Tsar, praying for their liberation, was adopted by the Meeting for Sufferings, and was taken to St. Petersburg by two Friends who hoped to make a personal presentation of it. They were unable to obtain access to the Emperor, but they saw some of the ministers, to whom they were referred. Though no intimation was given that the prayer of the memorial would be acceded to, the deputation entertains the hope that their efforts will not have been altogether in vain, and that the exiles may yet be permitted to join their friends in Canada.

Angelo Heilprin, in the Popular Science Monthly, writes of flowers and vegetables in the Klondike region as follows:—"The earlier conceptions of the extreme severity of the climate of the Yukon Valley forbade the hope of agricultural possibilities, but a more intimate knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the Summer time—a season of four to five months duration, with daylight and day heat protracted far into the normal hours of night —and a comparison of those conditions with somewhat similar conditions have given a hope not alone of a possibility, but of a probability, and there are few to-day who doubt that agriculture may not be practised with at least a legitimate amount of success in many parts of the Yukon basin. . . . Cabbages, turnips, peas, radishes, lettuce and beans are now raised to perfection in favored spots. . . . and a good promise is also held out for the potato. . . . About two miles from Dawson, oats and barley sown (Fourth Month) 26th and (Fifth Month) 22nd respectively, 1899, were grown to beautiful heads and harvested in the middle of (Eighth Month). Radishes sown on (Fourth Month) 24th, were collected on (Fifth Month) 20th, and string beans, whose seed was scattered on (Fifth Month) 26th, were collected on (Eighth Month) 1st. Other successful crops were those of beets, onions and spinach.

"The exquisite beauty of the flower garden in this spot rivets the attention of all passers by, and few there are who do not for a moment lay aside their packs to enjoy the feast of color that is presented to them. Poppies of the size and brilliance of those which adorn the fields about Naples, chrysanthemums, gorgeous dahlias, pansies, the corn flower, mignonette, and centaurea are part of the outside bloom, to which Nature "beyond the fence" has fittingly added the wild rose, anemone, fire-weed and forget-me-not. Such is the aspect of the region which to-day illumines the far North, and carries with itself a hopeful promise to many and the certainty of di pointment to many more." J. C.

Information Concerning the Doukhobort

We have received through correspond the following statement concerning the D hobortsi. The Winter in Assiniboia has for the most part unusually open, the letter however from the Immigration Age Yorkton reports a period of ten days with mercury from 25 to 30 degrees below zero, adding "the Doukhobortsi do not find it as as in Russia." This corroborates the stater of Ivan Marchukoff, who might be called Patriarch of the Doukbortsi in America, v he said the climate of Canada did not differ much from that in the Trans-Caucasus where they came.

J. S. Crerar having been requested to some information concerning an account ceived of the death from exposure in night, of one, who with his companion wa fused food and shelter by a Rancher, gives result of an official investigation in his repl follows:—"Regarding the account of two D hobors having perished with cold and hun only one succumbed, he being an old ma sixty-three years, who left his village with other young man to look for some timber intending to be long away expecting to re by noon. They got lost on the prairie and dered all day and late in the evening came Rancher who refused them shelter, I am s to say, and turned them off in the dark; wandered all night and not having any foo old man perished from cold and hunger, young man had to leave him out on the pr and try to find home; at last he came in s of their own village completely done out ported the matter and the rest of them to out and with some English settlers found old man cold in death. As soon as the ma was made known to me I put the matter in Police hands and after investigating the a found out who this inhuman man was repo to be, but the Doukhobors would not he any proceedings being taken against the they said they would pray for him and m God would open his heart and he would be s for what he had done. I sent the Docto to see the young man as it was reported he in bad shape, he however seemed to be get over it." Agent Crerar also reported th rival of two carloads of various articles fro women of Toronto and Montreal, probably in ated by M. Fitz-Gibbons who visited the D hobortsi last summer and is a niece of one o late Premiers. The articles which she has lished are very stirring and show her t enthusiastic in her work for their relief. plies have also been forwarded from o quarters but with all hardly sufficient for needs. They are not exempt from the hards incident to the settlement of a new count

We would not accept their laws and for that they beat us and took our cattle, and our goods away and through that we are in need."

In another letter the writer says:—"Again we have a petition to you, some of us have a little flour but there are some of us who have nothing at all. I will give you their names. . . . . We have not even got our daily bread, we feel bad to ask from other people, but our great need compels us to stretch out our hand. So we turn to you with tears, if you have any means to help us, do it as quick as possible for which we will continually bless you. This terrible persecution has made us so poor."

Prior to the receipt of these calls the Commissioner of Immigration had been authorized to expend one thousand dollars for food which he informed us of his intentions to send into the district from which these appeals came. Letters have been written to the authors of the above extracts, to inform them of the appropriation and requesting them to state whether their needs have been supplied, as an additional effort and precaution in meeting the emergency; whilst it was supposed that official information of distress would be centred with the heads of the Immigration Department through agents and in the office of the Controller of the Mounted Police of the North West territory whose duty it is to patrol their district and report the condition of the people.

The Deputy Minister has been informed of the cry of distress from Saskatchewan in Prince Albert district and the suggestion made that telegraphical instruction be given that immediate relief be obtained from the nearest point of supply and he could draw on the Treasurer of the Committee for Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia for one thousand dollars which was to be considered as an addition to all other trusts. Authority has been given for the purchase of wool to the amount of twelve hundred dollars, which with what has been previously granted from the funds of our Committee and from other sources will give material for clothing to be worked up on their spinning wheels and looms that have been delivered or supposed to be on the way. These with what they brought from Russia make about two hundred and fifty spinning wheels for them. One thousand dollars was appropriated for seed potatoes and five hundred dollars for garden seeds, leaving the field seeds to be provided otherwise.

As notice has been somewhat widely spread of the need of grain for seed, it is hoped that a response will be given thereto from sympathizers in Canada and elsewhere. The Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings have been earnest in their endeavors not only in soliciting contributions, but in making judicious expenditure of the funds entrusted to them, giving preference to the nearest markets without sacrificing economy, and in avoiding as much as practicable all delay and cost of extra freighting. But with the great extent of railroad travel and the distance of the settlements from railroad stations, together with the necessary correspondence with the proper parties, the work of distribution of supplies requires watchfulness, patience and perseverance. Most of the correspondence must necessarily be conducted with those to whom supplies are consigned and who have the oversight of their being forwarded and distributed.

Addresses have been prepared at different times in response to those drawn up by representatives of the Doukhobortsi addressed to Philadelphia Friends, in addition to the interpreters who travelled with the parties that visited among the villages. There are in different locations interested individuals through whom much information has been furnished and in whose hands some funds have been placed to be used at their discretion for the sick and distressed. One lives in Winnipeg, who took quite an interest in teaching the children of those who were detained on their first arrival at that city, and she has since kept a watchful eye over the Doukhobortsi who are in the hospital there and does much to comfort their relatives who feel that they must remain near their sick ones. She also keeps up what correspondence she can with individuals in the villages, and through her came the extracts previously noted, "detained on account of being unable to find one who could translate them," but quoting from her letter, "I have now found an English woman, educated in Russia, who for a small compensation would translate all future letters. After stating that the immigration agent had sent them some flour, she adds: "I am preparing an article for the German paper to be published to the Mennonites, calling attention to the Prince Albert colonists. I think they will help if they know their condition, they are fellow co-religionists in many things. The people of San Francisco (my former home) are gathering supplies. It is intended to send a car load of dried fruit. One child died last week of the measles. This is the family who lives near the river. I did all I could for them but we could not save the child. I also spent some money for liniment for Simeon Bornecoff, who was hurt at his work on the railroad. That little fund you sent me has done great good in a small way many times."

Another correspondent near Good Spirit Lake and three villages of the Doukhobortsi has performed good service visiting among them, ministering to their necessities and writing particularly about those most afflicted, and of the distribution of what had been placed at the disposal of herself and husband. A family residing in another section with several villages within the range of a few miles, was much beloved because of their hospitality and free gift of milk to many a little Doukhobor that had come miles to get it. The members of that family have indeed been a blessing to the new settlers and are suitable parties to be entrusted with funds for relief in their visits to the villages.

Wm. F. McCreary, Commissioner of Immigration, writes under date of Second Month 7th, 1900: "You will readily understand there is considerable delay in obtaining correspondence. All goods, however, that have been forwarded have been immediately sent to the front and are distributed with the utmost dispatch possible, and I may state that the goods that have been supplied have been the means of affording great relief." A report forwarded through W. F. McCreary from the agent at Yorkton, states that "the women of Toronto and Montreal had sent fifteen pieces of heavy flannel and eighty-eight yards of Duffle. Three bales arrived from England, comprising flannelette, tweed, men's and women's underwear and hosiery for both, all new goods and of the finest quality. I propose the widows and orphans in these villages will get the first share of them."

A letter received from Arthur St. John under date of Second Month 17th, says, "that the people in the villages, judging from a little he has seen in the Yorkton District (he having been on railway work most of the winter) are doing fairly well. They have at present bread and a few potatoes and perhaps a little barley left and some oil, which (the oil) is very good and much liked."

This was cotton seed oil sent out as a substitute for butter, first suggested by Peter Janson, who told us that it was used in Russia as an article of food.

A. St. J. also writes that a letter received from Prince Hillkoff states his intention to settle in Canada.

Information received to-day by telegraph is to the import that provisions and wool have been purchased to the amount of two thousand dollars, and that the stricken district of Saskatchewan is being relieved.

JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

PHILADELPHIA, Second Month 24th, 1900.

Drink is England's Industrial Rival.

The question arises, Why is America securing orders that should remain in this country? To this a remarkable answer has just been given, and so backed up by facts that no one can deny its truth.

In brief, the explanation is that American workers are the most formidable rivals because they spend their money on nourishing themselves and making themselves efficient workmen, while English workers spend far more of their wages on drink than they can afford, and not only more than they can afford, but more than is good for them. Thus they become inefficient. And the battle is to the strong.

This answer is made in a book just issued called "The Temperance Problem and Social Reform" (Hodder & Stoughton), which promises to be the classic on that great question. The matter is just now of double importance, first in connection with industrial competition and second, in reference to the recently published report of the Licensing Commission.

The enormous difference between the consumption of drink in England and the United States is shown by one general statement. The consumption of absolute alcohol per head in the United States "is not much more than one-half (fifty-seven per cent.) of the consumption per head in the United Kingdom."

If England could reduce the national consumption of alcoholic liquors to the measure of the American consumption per head, her drink bill would at once be reduced by more than £57,000,000. This sum is equal to more than one-half of the national revenue, and would be sufficient to provide £26,000,000 for old age pensioners and also secure the entire extinction of the national debt in less than twenty-two years.

Benjamin Kidd says the competing nations of to-day have "little advantage one over the other." "The question of efficiency—mental and physical"—therefore, say the writers of this book, "has become one of paramount importance." The writers give a series of most wonderful figures, showing exactly what English workers do spend on drink.

Their drink bill for 1898 was £154,480,934. With a population of 40,000,000 this represents an average per head of three pounds sixteen shillings ten and one-half pence. But as there are at least 17,000,000 people who do not drink, the bill must be divided among the 23,000,000 people who do. The yearly average, then, comes to six pounds, thirteen shillings eleven pence per person. As the working classes represent seventy-five per cent. of the population, it is reckoned that they spend £100,000,000 of the £154,480,934 spent a year on drink. In 1898, therefore, the average working class family expended sixteen pounds thirteen shillings fourpence a year on drink, which makes six shillings five pence a week. This is far below the maximum of some. Out of 9,613 selected men 1,549 admitted that they spent from five shillings to ten shillings, 535 spent ten shillings and under fifteen shillings, and 167 actually spent over fifteen shillings a week. —Correspondence to New York Commercial.

Father, help thy little child;
Make me truthful, good, and mild,
Kind, obedient, modest, meek,
Mindful of the words I speak.
What is right may I pursue,
What is wrong refuse to do,
What is evil seek to shun;
This I ask through Christ thy Son.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

In Genesis the world was made by God's creative hand;
In Exodus the Hebrews marched to gain the Promised Land;
Leviticus contains the law, holy and just and good.
Numbers records the tribes enrolled—all sons of Abraham's blood.
Moses, in Deuteronomy, records God's mighty deeds.
Brave Joshua into Canaan's land the host of Israel leads.
In Judges their rebellion oft provokes the Lord to smite,
But Ruth records the faith of one well pleasing in his sight.
In First and Second Samuel of Jesse's son we read.
Ten Tribes in First and Second Kings revolted from his seed,
The first and Second Chronicles, see Judah captive made;
But Ezra leads a remnant back by princely Cyrus' aid.
The city walls of Zion Nehemiah builds again
While Esther saves her people from the plots of wicked men.
In Job we read how faith will live beneath affliction's rod,
And David's Psalms are precious songs to every child of God.
The Proverbs like a goodly string of choicest pearls appear.
Ecclesiastes teaches man how vain are all things here.
The mystic song of Solomon exalts sweet Sharon's Rose;
Whilst Christ the Saviour and the King the "rapt Isaiah" shows.
The warning Jeremiah—Apostate Israel scorns;
His plaintive Lamentations their awful downfall mourns,
Ezekiel tells in wondrous words of dazzling mysteries;
While Kings and Empires yet to come, Daniel in vision sees.
Of judgment and of mercy, Hosea loves to tell:
Joel described the blessed days when God with man shall dwell.
Among Tekoa's herdsmen, Amos received his call;
While Obadiah prophecies of Edom's final fall.
Jonah enshrines a wondrous type of Christ our risen Lord,
Micah pronounces Judah lost—lost, but again stored.
Nahum declares on Nineveh just judgment sha poured,
A view of Chaldea's coming doom Habakkuk's ions give;
Next Zephaniah warns the Jews to turn, re and live.
Haggai wrote to those who saw the temple again,
And Zechariah prophesied of Christ's triump reign,
Malachi was the last who touched the high phetic chord;
Its final notes sublimely show the coming o Lord.

Extract of a letter to a friend, Fourth Mo. 8th, 1820.—"My Much Esteemed Friend: "I think I need not apologize for not answering before, the letter which I was gratified in receiving from thee last spring, as I expect thou art already acquainted with the cause. Almost a year has elapsed and the greater part of that time I have spent in the most exquisite pain and distress. Yes, dear S., my Heavenly Father has laid his chastening hand upon me in a peculiar manner. When health and prosperity smile upon us, we can fill our storehouses with corn, wine and oil: gain honor and promotion; our possessions may become enlarged and our names exalted; but what will all this avail us, unless we experience a redemption from the pollutions of the world, and feel an evidence within us, that Christ is our friend, and that we have an interest in Him? I make these assertions from long and full experience; for I think I have been brought to a situation that would enable me to judge what kind of principles will stand the strong winds of adversity, and to discern the difference between real and imaginary comforts. Oh, may I never forget to render due thankfulness; may my heart ever burn with gratitude and praise to that Omnipotent Being, in whose hands are life and death, that He, through condescending but unmerited mercy, not only spared my life, but favored me with his life-giving presence, and the light of his countenance, and led me beside the still waters. C. SEELY."

The following letter the writer has thought good also to give a place in these extracts.

"Esteemed Friend.—Being favored with an opportunity for answering thy letter, I cordially embrace it, though not without being truly sensible of my inadequacy, but I trust thy candor will excuse all its deficiencies. May this through the blessing of the Most High, be permitted to find you all in the enjoyment of health, walking in the path of peace and righteousness, guided by the light of his countenance, and resting on Him as your unchangeable Friend, your Alpha and Omega. For four or five months, I was so low and helpless, I could not raise my head from my pillow, nor speak above a whisper. No expectation was entertained of my recovery, by myself, or my friends, or physician; but I was spared while many of our neighbors were taken. Oh, may I never be unmindful of, nor ungrateful for, the unmerited mercy of God, not only in restoring me to a comfortable degree of health, but enabling me to say, it is good for me to be afflicted, and not my will but thine be done. Health is justly styled the greatest blessing we can possess, for when it is withdrawn, it truly takes away the relish of every temporal enjoyment. Yes, when we are brought to a sick bed, and our body racked with pain, and our minds enveloped in doubt and anxiety, with no prospect before us but a sudden exit from time to eternity, every transitory pleasure, every vain amusement and trifling toy, loses their power to please and no longer interests us. Nothing will then afford any durable happiness but the true and substantial religion of Jesus. That will illuminate, animate and support under all, as amid tempestuous seas and raging billows. How necessary then that we be found on the watch-tower, that when trials or afflictions come, we be prepared to meet them, and that when the bridegroom comes we be found waiting. Those who love the Lamb and his cause, and are interested in the welfare of Zion, and the enlargement of her borders, and have tasted the sweetness of celestial treasure, will agree that one hour of this enjoyment is more desirable than a whole life spent in the pursuit of worldly pleasures. C. S."

"Will a life in love with pleasing variety, of novelty and wonder, accomplish the real business of our lives, which is to prepare for a never ending eternity?" is the substance of a query dated "—— —— 1824," prefixed to the following, "Even at this moment, while my heart feels too little of the love of God, I can look around upon the delightful scenery of my beloved home with a degree of indifference; but feeble nature yields too easily to the enticing enjoyments of ease and comfort. I think I have endeavored during an absence from home of eighteen months, to keep my affections aloof from the world and its varied snares, for I was aware that my situation required greater watchfulness, in proportion to my greater exposure. It seems as if I needed an unusual degree of chastisement to humble me, so I am not disposed to think any sufferings that have been inflicted are unnecessary, but receive them at the Divine hand with the confidential belief that they are wisely ordered, and if improved will perhaps be more beneficial to me, than what are called temporal blessings.

"I can truly say I have never felt greater peace, quietude or joy and resignation, than on a sick and painful bed; but so far from viewing it as attainable by my own strength, I consider it a rich gift, a choice blessing from the Father of mercies, in answer to my earnest petitions, teaching me that although blessings may be in store for us, they will not be dispensed unsought; for thus the command was given, 'Ask and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' The Father in mercy prompts this desire in the heart, but if we give no heed to the secret impulse, it will leave us in a state of poverty."

From a letter dated Second Month, 1826,—"If we faithfully serve our Heavenly Father, we have the strongest assurance of Divine direction and consolation here, exclusive of that reward in the world to come, prepared for the righteous. The way is open to all, and we are invited but not compelled to choose the right path. Many are the inducements to turn aside, yet the further we advance in the straight and narrow way, the clearer our prospect of duty will become, and these mountains of opposition, which appeared to obstruct our progress, will, by faithfulness sink beneath our feet Great sacrifices are seldom required. Every temptation that is resisted is a sacrifice and we feel a measure of the same satisfaction in attending to small duties, when they are required, as we do in fulfilling greater ones; I know how natural it is to procrastinate while in health, and even when deprived of it, as long as a faint gleam of hope flatters us with the idea of recovery; but when there is a prospect of sudden dissolution, the question arises, is our peace made between God and our souls? And then would we give all we possess on earth for this assurance. It is dangerous to put off the work of the whole life to the uncertain and awful crisis of a sick bed; for if our life is not taken suddenly, our reason may be. A peaceful mind in sickness is worth every sacrifice we can make, and as far exceeds every other joy, as remorse of conscience exceeds every other sorrow."

The following is taken from a letter to her brother and sisters, Fifth Month 25th, 1835, a little over three years prior to her decease:

"Dear Brother and Sisters.—I am very ill, and know not how, or when it will terminate, but each day I have turns, in which my distress often seems too great for nature to survive; and if I should go in one of them, it would not be strange. I hope your minds are prepared for the event, and I should sometimes send for you, had I not so often been brought to the brink of the grave, and raised again, that I fear to give unnecessary alarm or trouble. I have felt as if I could give you all into the hands of our Heavenly Father, whose you are, and see you no more in this world, were it not for your feelings. I know it would afford you satisfaction to see me at, or near the close, and I have wished that you might be with me then; but the time is so uncertain, but I am able (enabled) to feel resigned to this uncertainty, if my dear dear Deborah (a closely attached cousin) may be with me. She has relieved you all from the immediate care and charge and from a very great deal of anxiety about me, when absent. You do not, you cannot know how much she has done for the relief of both my mind and body under my complicated afflictions, which, though painful to endure, I doubt not have been permitted for my good, for hers, and for yours, and for others also. But with all, mercy and Divine support has been mingled, for which let us return thanks to the Supreme Ruler of events. May He reward her, and every one of you, for your kindness to me, and finally bring us all home to himself, in his everlasting kingdom. I am distressed in body, but mostly quiet in mind, and firmly believe that if it pleases my Heavenly father to take me from you, it will be to everlasting rest to remain in his presence forever, which is far more desirable than life or health. My strength fails to write, or I would gladly say much, to beg you all to turn your whole hearts from this world to Christ, who is able and willing to receive every one who will accept his offers of mercy and follow Him. Do not I entreat you, let earth, self nor the adversary deter you from resigning yourselves wholly to the Lord, and serving Him while you live.

"In love, C. S."

She quietly and peacefully expired on the twenty-seventh of Tenth Month, 1838, aged thirty-nine years.

For "The Friend"

WHEN WAR SHALL END.

I thought, as I read all those pieces,
Concerning the war in the land,
Of the horror and bloodshed attending,
And the risk of the men in command.

I thought of the grief at the parting,
From husband, or brother, or friend;
And the long, weary days and nights, watching,
And perhaps death comes at the end.

But other thoughts, also, came to me,
And stirred my soul into life;
For we know within every one's bosom
There's by nature a spirit of strife.

If we cherish and foster that spirit
It will surely spring into life,
And fill our minds with forebodings
With which our being is rife.

'Tis men that make up the nations
That people this beautiful earth;
How much, then, are we each one responsible
For war, devastation and dearth?

Let us think of these things in our closet,
At morning, at noon, or at night,
And pray to "the Father in secret"
To give us more, and more light.

May we ask for his arm round about us,
And be filled with the spirit of love;
Then the nations, as well as the people,
Will be as the meek, harmless dove.

On Priestliness.

Christianity, true and pure, is, as we believe, the highest manifestation of the religious faculty that the human race has yet witnessed. And because it is the highest it is in a certain sense the simplest. It brings the spirit of man, by the mighty drawing power of the Crucified Saviour, into the presence of his Maker and his Judge. It sets up his one tribunal in the believer's heart, and there, by condemnation, by the arrest of sentence, by most merciful forgiveness, it vindicates the law and makes it honorable; it transforms the life of man, it moulds and remodels conduct, it produces a real imitation of Christ; if it might but work unchecked it would transfigure and glorify the world, and would almost turn the wonderful prophetic pictures of Isaiah into reality.

But just because Christianity is so high and so pure, the soul of man has ever and anon shrunk away from its penetrating glance. Like the children of Israel at the foot of Sinai, the second and third generation of Christians, and most of the succeeding generations in their turn, have looked around for some one to whom they could say, "Speak thou with us and we will hear; but let not God speak with us lest we die." When the worshipper is in this mood of mind then comes the priest's opportunity. First a man here and there, then an order of men, then a mighty hierarchy arises which says only too eagerly, "We will answer for your sins, we will tell you how to purge your consciences, we will be to you instead of God." . . .

I would invite timid souls who are over-awed by the pretentions of the priest, whether Anglican, Greek, or Roman, to take a broad and far-reaching view of this question. It is easy, if one limits one's scrutiny to one small and narrow issue, to bewilder one's self as to the true intent and meaning of God's revelation of himself in the face of Jesus Christ. The man who is perpetually pondering the text, "Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build Church; may get into as dazed and helpl condition as the man who is always study "unfulfilled prophecy," and who dare har save his seed lest the end of the world sho come before next year's harvest. . . .

Whether we call the process developme or progressive revelation, or the education the world, everyone who has not fallen into gulf of pessimism believes that there has b through the ages some upward tendency of human race; and he who believes in God lieves that this process has been made haud numine by the help of the Divine and Teachi Spirit.

Ponder over the evidence of this process the Hebrew Scripture. See how the concept of the spiritual nature of the Most High gro and strengthens, how the merely national expands into the All-father, who says, "Bles be Egypt, my people, and Assyria, the work my hands, and Israel, mine inheritance." how Israel is led up through all the cumberso sacrifices of the law to the great discove "He hath showed thee, oh man, what is go and what doth Jehovah require of thee but do justly and to love mercy and to walk hum with thy God?" And then ask thyself, "I likely that all this long and glorious upwa progress from the material to the spiritual, fr the ceremonial to the moral, from that wh dazzles the senses to that which touches heart and moulds the character, was meant end in the genuflections and posturings, dressings and undressings, the swinging of c sers and tinkling of bells, which make up sacrifice of the mass?" Very beautiful sor times it may as a piece of religious ope though perhaps the worship of the Virgin g dess in the Parthenon of Athens would have m completely satisfied the artistic instinct. .

Far be it from us to deny that many do t worship Him—reaching through the enwr pings of ceremony to the eternal and spirit substance,—but we say that our spirits are helped but hindered by all the posturings of priest. We do not believe all this religi pageantry to be in accordance with the mind Christ, and we are determined to stand fast the liberty wherewith Christ has made us fr —Thomas Hodgkin.

Our Position.

The Holy Spirit is our Bond of Union, a the Holy Scriptures are our articles.

Christ once in the flesh and always in Spi are fundamentals with us. We require no s scription to articles of human invention.

As to differences of opinion amongst whilst professors of the same faith differ years and opportunity, in education and assoc ates, in faithfulness or unfaithfulness to th principles, there must be different opini and practices. When the believers in primitive age of Christianity grew numero it was the case amongst them and in all soc ties ever since.

What we assert is that the one Holy Spi leads all that faithfully follow it into samen of doctrine and unity of love; and that who profess to be followers of Christ, ou to be led by his Spirit; but that all, either our own Society, or any other are so led, are far from asserting or believing.

est Concerning Cigarettes and Theatres.

following letter to the mayor of Phila- , and the churches therein has been ed by a committee of the Social Purity de, and is offered by a Friend active in paration, as in harmony with expressed ns of our Meeting for Sufferings on the s treated of :

e was a law enacted by the Legislature of vania in 1899, which provided that "if any lor persons shall sell cigarettes to any per- persons under the age of sixteen years, he or offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, n conviction thereof shall be sentenced to e of not more than three hundred dollars." ny one known of this law being enforced!

There is, indeed, one case upon the records of the magistrates' courts, occurring soon after the law was passed, in which the prosecutor, a policeman, testified on behalf of his son that the lad was "Nearly crazy from the use of cigarettes, and was unable to study, or to do anything at all after smoking them." Teachers of public schools, and mothers in large numbers, have asked for relief. Now and then the death of a boy, due to over-indulgence in the weed, occurring, the community has ghastly notice that the baneful traffic, and the immunity of its pursuit is still a fact. The boys implicated will not, of their own motion, tell of whom the purchases were made, while the teachers and mothers shun the publicity of a prosecution. Yet there is plenty of ocular evidence, upon the streets, as to the law's transgression; there can be no great difficulty on the part of the executive authorities in indicating it, and hence we appeal to the Mayor to see that this is done.

The same support of law, and fulfillment of the quoted pledge may still more be asked for in the matter of licensed theatres. The testimony, not of opponents of the play-house, but of its advocates and upholders, goes to show, that a large number of the performances in this, as in other cities generally, are low, scandalous, and in palpable violation of the law. "Never before," to quote The Dial, "have we had so large a proportion of trivial, empty and vulgar productions among the entertainments offered our public. Decency has never before been defiled, in so wanton and cruel a fashion." "The present state of the English and American drama," says the Chicago Tribune, "may well provoke the question, whether dramatic literature has not reached that condition of degeneracy which call for the interposition of a public censor to save the theatre-goers from being inundated by an ocean of shame. . . . . No manager should be allowed to produce plays the motive of which is indescribably vile, and the purpose of which is to pander to depraved tastes, by the display of indecency, in language, scene and action." But just such vileness was given publicity, in a Philadelphia theatre, the license of which was three years ago revoked—quickly to be restored, upon promise of amendment, a promise that was almost immediately violated, the posters of the place (many of which have been appealed against for their indecency), glaringly advertising the vice to be presented. The testimony for the license revocation, specially mentioned as "the most noticeable feature of the place, next to the performance," "the presence of a large number of boys, of all ages, in the galleries."

Now, will not the Mayor, under his pledge to guard "every interest of the people with a zealous care," endeavor, in the exercise of his prerogative of license revocation, to help safeguard the moral interests of these young people, as well as those their elders who are found in the same perilous paths!

No less, however, do we appeal to the churches, of whatever name, that if they would protect their membership from those things that defile (whereby the name of God is blasphemed, and his grace set at naught), they need faithfully—more so perhaps than in the recent past—to use the language of warning and restraint, lest the lambs of the flock go altogether astray.

Items Concerning the Society.

Henry T. Outland having a minute from Rich Square Monthly and Eastern Quarterly Meeting, North Carolina, attended Burlington Quarterly Meeting on the 27th and meetings in Rancocas and Columbus since.

Information is received that Eliza H. Varney, of Canada, who on her return from the Doukhobor settlements obtained a minute for further religious service in California, is now in that country in the prosecution of it.

William Evans having gone to Ohio in the interests of the Doukhobors, has given descriptions of what he observed among them to companies gathered in Barnesville School, Salem, and the neighborhood of Harrisville and Colerain, and probably other places also.

The British Friend notes the recently published statistics of the membership in American ("Orthodox") Yearly Meetings for 1899, as follows:

They show "a membership of 93,253, as against 93,699 in 1898, a net loss of 446. This loss is greatest in Iowa, where it is 409. Ohio shows the largest gain, 264. A loss of membership naturally gives rise to some thought, and this is not set at rest when it is found that the main source of the loss is to be found in disownment and erasure of names, which amount to over 2,300 in the Yearly Meetings collectively. To a certain extent, as we believe in Iowa, this may be due to the adoption of stricter rules and a 'weeding-out' process. But whatever allowance we may make on this head, it still appears that, as The American Friend says, many must have been 'hurried into membership during a wave of revival enthusiasm, and, when the tide settled back, they proved to be only like driftwood.' Here again there may be a valuable caution for ourselves. The article we have just quoted goes on: 'Our own feeling is that the serious shortcoming is inability in the work of shepherding the flock. What should we say to a school or college which had to expel such a proportion of its students as this? . . What is the function of a church, if not to edify and spiritualize its members? It cannot be a mission to receive recruits at one door, and turn them out as imperfect, or failures, at the other door. . . This problem demands our profound attention and study for the future.'"

Notes from Others.

Father Zurcher, a Buffalo priest, who for some time since attacked certain monks who make and sell beer, and also priests who ask money for masses for particular souls in purgatory on All Saints Day, has been suspended for "notorious disobedience" in not making satisfactory apologies for his utterances.

A church in Detroit, Michigan, having suffered serious rupture by receiving into membership numbers without sufficient regard to their unity with its special doctrines, is reorganizing under wisdom bought by experience. It is said that the protesting members "intend this time to be in no haste to add to their numbers; preferring a few who are fully in accord with their principles rather than a multitude who thoughtlessly give in their adherence without knowing what they do."

The Presbyterian Presbytery of New York, decided by a vote of seventy-seven to thirty-nine not to try Dr. McGiffert on the charges of heresy tabled by Dr. Birch. The refusal to proceed to trial was based on the fact that the Presbytery at their meeting in Twelfth Month had decided not to try Dr. McGiffert, but to disavow his teachings. This the Presbytery deemed sufficient, and hence the vote not to go on with the trial.

The hired-man theory of the ministry has done, and is still doing, injury to the church. It is neither Scriptural nor Christian. It fosters and promotes commercialism in both pulpit and pew. It tends to destroy spirituality. It robs pastor and people of the sweetest and most enduring fellowships and activities. It destroys that fine and noble sentiment, that high respect, that generous support, that kindly sympathy and endurance, and that spiritual significance which belong to a right conception and embodiment of a Bible pastorate.—Presbyterian.

An American, so the story goes, was once questioning a Chinaman as to the reason for many of their customs, which seem absurd to us. At length, after long endurance, the Chinaman replied: "And now, my dear sir, I would like to ask you a question that has puzzled me greatly. Will you kindly tell me why Americans and Europeans wear two useless buttons on the back of their coats?" Unable to answer, the American raised the question at home. Investigators set to work—and what do you think they discovered? Long ago when every gentleman wore a sword and had to hang it from a belt, these two buttons held the belt to the coat. Years past, men became more civilized and left the sword to soldiers' use, the belt went out of fashion (for men are as particular about fashion as women are), but the two buttons were left to this very day.—Presbyterian.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES.—A second conference of the House Republicans upon the Puerto Rican Tariff bill was held in Washington on the night of the Twenty-sixth of Second Month, and resulted in an agreement to modify the measure so that the duty should be 15 per cent. of the present tariff rates, and that the operation of the bill should be limited to two years. Moreover, a declaration is to be attached to the bill that it is a relief measure intended only to meet the present emergency.

Upon representations of the Spanish Government to the effect that some of the islands south of the Philippine archipelago, which had been taken possession of by United States gun-boats, were really the property of Spain, the authorities of the State Department have examined the charts and concluded to direct the withdrawal of our claims to the islands of Caygayen, Sulu and Cibutu, both of which lie without the boundary lines laid down by the treaty of Paris.

While five years ago the cotton mills in the South consumed but 720,000 bales of cotton, their consumption amounts now to nearly 1,500,000 bales in the 550 mills, with 4,952,092 spindles and 104,446 looms. The number of mills has increased 206, that of spindles and looms 640 per cent.

Assistant Secretary Allen, of the Navy Department, received a report on the 15th ult., from Commander B. F. Tilley, commanding the United States steamship Aberanda, showing the prosperous and advanced moral conditions of the inhabitants of Tutuila and Manua, two of the islands of the Samoan group recently acquired by the United States by treaty arrangement with Great Britain and Germany. The report is dated at Pago Pago, Samoa, First Month 7th, 1900, and says: "So far as I can learn, every inhabitant of Tutuila is delighted at the prospect of the United States assuming the government of the island. I am also informed that this prospect is also pleasing to the inhabitants of Manua. Everything is perfectly quiet and orderly in this island, and, so far as I can learn, in all the islands. A large number of natives are to-day holding religious meetings at Pago Pago, for the purpose of raising funds to establish a school for native girls, near Leone, Tutuila. Rev. E. Cooper, who is in charge of the work of the London Missionary Society in the islands of Tutuila and Manua, informed me to-day that over $7000 had already been contributed for this purpose by the natives of these two islands. This is more than $1 per capita for the entire population, and is an indication of the interest which the natives take in religious matters. Mr. Cooper assures me that the natives of Manua are of most excellent character and all Christians. The health of the entire ship's company is excellent."

The steamship Indrani returned to Brooklyn on Second Month 20th from Baltimore, where she had gone to load a couple of thousand tons of steel rails. Here she will finish an immense cargo for Singapore, Shanghai, Kobe, Yokohama and Vladivostock. It consists largely of iron manufactures, nails, bolts, machinery, parts of machinery, boilers and pumps. There is also a large quantity of flannels and domestics and fifteen tons of Florida water. Kobe takes 3400 tons of bridge girders and 2300 tons of the same manufactures go to Yokohama.

The steamer Coptic brought to a local smelting company in California 1840 sacks of ore concentrates from the mines of an American syndicate in Korea, and is the second similar consignment within a few months.

Southern California shipped last year 875 carloads of dried fruits and raisins, worth $1,640,000.

State Entomologist Scott, of Georgia, who returned from the southern part of the State after a careful examination of the orchards in that section, has given out the statement that the freezing weather of the past week has had the effect of checking the unnatural advance of the fruit trees caused by the recent warm weather, and the prospects now are that the crop will be the largest in recent years.

At a dinner at a New York club, on the 25th ult., to Raoul Pictet, the Swiss scientist, oxygen was produced from air by a secret process used for the first time in this country. For the experiment a simple apparatus consisting mainly of copper tubes was used. Air was taken in at one end at the other oxygen was shown by the production of a calcium light from the ignition of the gas. Liquid air was employed in the process. Raoul Pictet asserts that with five hundred horse power plant he can produce daily 500,000 cubic feet of oxygen, 1,000,000 cubic feet of nitrogen and 1000 cubic feet of carbonic acid gas. The last named product will, it is said, pay for the cost of the entire production, and the oxygen and nitrogen will represent the net profits. As two thousand cubic feet of oxygen is estimated to be equal in heating power to a ton of coal the process is considered to be of great value from a commercial standpoint.

There were 445 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 58 less than the previous week and 194 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 233 were males and 212 females: 71 died of pneumonia; 42 of consumption; 38 of heart diseases; 19 of diphtheria; 18 of old age; 18 of inanition; 15 of typhoid fever; 15 of convulsions; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of measles; 12 of marasmus; 11 of cancer, and 9 of bronchitis.

FOREIGN.—The British forces under Lords Kitchener and Roberts, are pressing Cronje's army closely in the Free State fight, and despatches indicate that the Boer's situation is hopeless. Lord Roberts refused to grant Cronje an armistice of twenty-four hours, and the latter, after refusing to surrender, said he would fight to the death; but his men are said to be anxious to surrender, and the Boers are reported to be at the mercy of the British forces. From later advices we learn that General Cronje surrendered unconditionally to Lord Roberts at day-break, on the morning of Second Month 27th.

General Buller continues his advance through Natal Colony towards Ladysmith, the Boers fiercely contesting his movements. His casualties include many officers and men since Second Month 20th.

British possessions in Africa imported from the United States in Twelfth Month $287,801 more merchandise than in 1898, an increase of 20 per cent. For the full calendar year the increase was $1,662,448, or 12 per cent.

The ages of four generations of the British royal family in the direct line of succession are: Queen, 80; Prince of Wales, 57; Duke of York, 34; Prince Edward of York, 5.

Estimates of De Witte, Russian Finance Minister, indicate that the amount of gold in Russia's interior circulation at the close of 1899 was $319,700,000, against $222,500,000 at the close of 1898.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says:

"General Krapotkin, Russian Minister for War, who is a strong Boer sympathizer, is responsible for all the recent movements of Russian troops in the Kushk district. He obtained the approval of the Military Council for a plan to seize Herat, and he thereupon submitted it to the Czar, suggesting that it would be a good time, while England's hands were tied in South Africa, to execute the plan, which he said could be done without a hitch.

"To his surprise the Czar declined to give any countenance to any movement in favor of utilizing Great Britain's difficulties. His Majesty said: 'It is my intention to maintain the strictest neutrality throughout the war, notwithstanding the display of popular sympathies toward the Boers.'

"This is tantamount to a victory for the Russian Foreign Office. Count Muravieff was strongly opposed to the scheme of General Krapotkin, whose position is regarded as considerably shaken."

A Thing Not Done in a Corner.

the Friends' ideal of an assembly rightly ered in Divine worship, the head of the ing is all over the meeting—not limited e corner of it, or to any chief seat in the gogue. He whose right it is to be Head e corner is just as rightly Head over all and over all things to his church and e. Were He rightly observed all over the ing as director of its inward and accord- of its open worship, there would be small of human overseer or chronometer. But pportion as individuals who may be present ut from under his single headship, there e a need of officers as a safeguard against anarchy of ranters." By reason of human nity, certain helps and governments are ely ordained for the church. "For God is he author of confusion but of peace, as in e churches of the saints."

t much more blessed were that harmony ing worship where the worshippers' times n the hands of Him to whom their eye is e. These "shall see eye to eye" at every season "when the Lord comes to build up Zion." And this is the ideal that ought to be kept steadily before us to realize—that the headship of the meeting is placed in the Head of the church himself, and He divideth unto every one severally as He will.

We have heard of rightly concerned Friends, who occupied other seats in the meeting, indicating their clear sense of the time for closing it, to which he who sat in the head seat seemed insensible. And such act of faithfulness was a true relief. Formerly, in some country meetings, this is said to have been the custom, that one or another throughout the meeting, as he individually felt it, would express his judgment that the service of the meeting was ended. Gifts in eldership we know are at times exercised unto edifying by elders not yet recognized. If gifts in other ministry were not, how should they ever become recognized?

The principle that no member is exempt from his or her direct responsibility to the Head of the Church must be kept alive by obedience, if there is to be a healthy church. And sometimes, lest meetings settle into a hard and fast ecclesiasticism, the true Head may call forth a fresh agent of his will in an unexpected quarter. But this will not be out of right order, if it is his order. "For the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." So that officers and subjects are both prophets, there is no ground of fear. And if officers should not be thus anointed, yet right order often requires, that they "who sit in Moses' seat" should be deferred to as representatives of order.

Our concern is not that constituted authorities should receive less deference, but that the true Master of assemblies receive more; so that all things, however unexpected, that the true life puts forth may be owned as seasonable. To this end all our system of under-shepherds is appointed, that the chief Shepherd may be head over all things; that the eye of the worshippers may be single to him and him alone; that the ministration of all acts of service may be exclusively from him, through any in any locality upon whom they are laid; that there may be no looking to chief seats or galleries for the exercises or conduct of the meeting instead of the master Himself; that each one on any seat may feel and cherish his single and vital responsibility for himself and for the meeting, as if the question "what shall this man do?" were impossible; that any officer should rejoice to be superseded in any function so that Christ may be all in all; that they whether hearing, or doing, or speaking the truth in love "may grow up into Him in all things who is the head, even Christ, from whom all the body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the due measure of each several part, maketh the increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love."—Eph. iv: 16.

Parkhurst on War.

C. H. Parkhurst, the well-known clergyman of New York City, is one of the men in the pulpit who not only sees no good in war, but is not afraid to raise his voice against the crime of war and the unchristian attitude which many men take who claim to be ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. In a recent sermon he said:

"When all those matters (economics, etc.,) are put one side and we come on to ground that is distinctly my province as a representative of Jesus Christ, then I do not yield to you; and I am going to say to you, without any 'buts' or 'wheresoevers,' that to promote civilization by the use of swords and artillery is false to the word, example and life of Jesus Christ and of all his apostles, and alien to the entire genius of Christianity. If you say to that, that there are places in the world where Christianity has sprung up as an aftergrowth of military conquest, undoubtedly; but that does not alter anything so far as relates to the point I have just made. It does not relieve filthy soil that flowers grow out of it. God is all the time doing that thing. . . . Thousands of ministers have practically been confessing to the world these last twelve months that Christ's way of saving the world will not work. . . . I should be sorry to have to conclude that the Gospel is inadequate without gun powder to support it, and when I do conclude that, I shall stop preaching out of self-respect; at least I shall stop calling myself a preacher of the Gospel. . . . I have simply dropped all questions of gold and diamonds and commercial perquisites, of which I know little, and have stated to you the mind of Jesus Christ, of which I do know something. Now you can ignore that mind and promote civilization by killing—which may be the best way—or you can adopt that mind and promote civilization by making alive, which is the only Gospel way."

ALL temptation has for its essence the defiance of God. No matter how it comes, it proposes nothing else and nothing less than to set up man's will against God's will. The only assurance for man, then, is to cultivate the sense of his dependence upon God, and to practice in every event of life submission to the will of God.

Information Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

During the past week a letter has been received from Commissioner Wm. F. McCreary, stating that the Government has allowed him to engage a man to travel through and make periodical visits to all the villages of the colonies of Swan River and Yorkton, sending in monthly reports to the officials of his movings, the condition and needs of the people. He is an honest, reliable, Christian man, has fair knowledge of business, speaks their language fluently, has their confidence and was a thorough practical farmer for eight years in South Dakota, and two or three years in Canada. The Commissioner further states that he has purchased and forwarded flour and corn meal to the amount of about two thousand dollars to the Saskatchewan district and instructed his agents to act intelligently, seeing that the most deserving families should have the benefit of that and of a kind donation authorized by the Canadian Government if they should still be short of provisions. He added:—I am keeping you furnished from time to time with all particulars and correspondence in regard to the Doukhobors. Arrangements have been made for free transportation of all serious cases of sickness to the hospital at Winnipeg. A contract for cutting cordwood at seventy-five cents per cord has been procured, so about one hundred from the North Colony are now cutting this wood. It is only about sixty miles from their colony and as the timber is all dry and fallen and they have not to split it, but merely to saw it with cross cut saws, each man should be able to saw a couple of cords per day. They are furnished with saws, camps, cooking stoves and everything free and the women and boys can also help at the work.

A letter from another correspondent states:—I sent five dollars to a family in Prince Albert district who recently lost a five months old child from starvation, the mother being very much exhausted for want of food, so had no nourishment for her child. She also speaks of two hundred dollars having been contributed in California and about three tons of dried fruit. The question however of the transportation of the latter is one likely to be attended with delay and expense, although the dried fruit when received will doubtless be a great blessing. Those who have goods that are perishable, to donate, but feel unable to defray the expense of sending them, should not be discouraged in making such donations, for it is hoped that others will contribute towards the payment of freight. It is advisable that all arrangements with the railroad companies be made through one experienced in shipping goods and who might influence the officials to carry all food and other articles gratuitously given, free of charge. The Canadian Government has generously allowed such merchandise as is given to the Doukhobortsi to be sent free of duty; but even with this advantage, if freight is charged and the goods donated have to be purchased in the open market, it is questionable whether they could be bought and delivered as economically as to buy them in Winnipeg.

PETRORKA, YORKTON, February 1900.

. . . . We could not write to you as promised because we had not anybody to write English and we profit of occasion presently. After my work was at an end in Brandon where I was very well, I came home; in the land choiced by my people. They did construct houses, bringing wood on the back, because there was only one horse and one team of oxen going always to Yorkton for flour for our food; we had also to plow, ourselves, men and women, that was not very heavy, twenty people for one plow.

After my house was finished to construct I did cut hay with the other men for winter; we did cut much for nothing, because we could not get cattle. We are only two hundred people, and have only five horses, two oxen, two cows, which don't give milk. I had to leave home again; my Macha, not very healthy, with rest of my family; my uncle, a man aged eighty-seven years, who remained twelve years in Siberia, who works yet. His poor members are trembling, attained by rheumatism; they had to bring wood for winter all on the back for several miles. I had to go at Railway after the principal of the work was done. I did work until snow came, for two months, and gained $1.35 per day. With that the company retained for our food, I had yet $48, with which I did buy flour, sugar, salt, butter, cabbage, and shirts, etc.; that is all gone now. I could not find other work, and had to remain home. There are almost three months I come again. Here I make one work and the other, tables, chairs, with wood that we got to cut and saw now, not having had time before; windows, also, were not finished, all workers having been out. Our houses are partly in earth; the wood is too far. They are more damp, but warm enough when there is iron stove; and we live yet, thanks to God. The only thing is that our provisions are near to end, we eat almost always bread, only third quality (4x). We would like to give milk and butter to our old uncle, and we would like to buy a cow for that purpose for him and little children. Macha, my wife, is not very healthy. Her uncle is near to death, her cousin very sick, a young man of twenty-five years; they would all be very thankful for you if you help us before I can go again work at Spring.

Yours truly Brother,

Doukhobor village of Petrorka, Makhortoff.
YORKTON, Assa.

The last comers who were supposed to have the most money made the same mistake, as some others had done, in buying young and unbroken horses, this tending to make them as poor as the others, and there was probably some friction in the delivery of goods by those who had their own teams. The teams of all the villages may not be supposed to be in very good condition, as it would not be an easy matter for those who have mostly to live on bread and water themselves, to furnish their stock with grain.

It is evident in the letters from the Commissioner that he was disposed to have supplies at the railroad stations as promptly as they could be taken. It has been the general impression that goods for the villages, have been first deposited in their respective storehouses and distributed through their own committees. The urgent instructions lately given to agents will now, no doubt, expedite matters very materially. We have not heard of more than two deaths that could be directly attributed to hunger and cold. A report from one living in the neighborhood of Kamsack says that the Doukhobors of that District have passed the wint so far without extreme suffering and doing t best they can. Out of a private fund giv her for distribution amongst the needy, s had expended $20 for wool, to be made into footwear and mittens, and invested in soo medicines for the sick. After receiving the things the Doukhobortsi called a meeting a expressed their gratitude with offerings praise and thanksgiving.

The following is a copy of an address th has lately been prepared and printed in bo English and Russian; a copy of each for ea of the forty-nine villages. It has been sent the Superintendent of the Immigration Depa ment to be forwarded and distributed.

To the Members of the "Christian Commun of the Universal Brotherhood" now in Northwest Territory, Canada.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS:—Having, the providence and wisdom of Almighty G been brought to a knowledge of each other, salute you as children with us of one comm Father, and partakers of his merciful dealir desiring your prosperity in every way.

It is cause of rejoicing that both with y and with our people, as with the immediate d ciples and followers of our Lord and Saviour Je Christ, there have been found those who we counted worthy to suffer for Him, and by wh faithfulness a great purpose has been wrou in the eyes of the nations, proving that t truth and love of God are not to be stamp out by persecution; and the arm of God brought salvation to those who trusted Him the end, and the children of such have be signally favored.

Blessed be the name of the Lord who ha strengthened your hearts to become witnes for Him, and kept you in courage under all y difficulties and losses of property, cruelties flicted, and deprivation of the society of so dearly beloved ones. But all your griefs known by Him who has many servants in affl tion, and can cause their constancy to redou to his glory, whilst the angel of his own pr ence is with the afflicted, and saveth them.

In the early history of our people, thousa suffered imprisonment and other cruelties, ma died in prisons, and some were publicly execut But the Lord had a purpose of his own in p serving us as a Society, enabling us to symp thize with others who for like cause have be distressed.

There are those of the "Society of Friend both in America and in England, disposed to all in their power for the release of your ext fathers, husbands, sons and brothers, or wh ever may be in banishment, because of th love to God and Jesus Christ, and who cann disobey the commandments of God and teachin of Jesus Christ our Saviour.

We are still exercised to minister to yo necessities, hoping the distribution will be justly made as circumstances will admit; ev the hearts of many of our little children, up hearing of your trials and sufferings, have be so tendered they have voluntarily given in th small measure of what they had, manifesting feeling of love and sympathy with you and yo little ones.

We desire your encouragement in all reas

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"When work is done"
That is begun
For Righteousness and Truth,
'Tis from within,
If we would win
Our wage in age or youth.

Make no mistake:
We cannot take
The works we outward sow,
They all belong unto the flesh,
For heaven they do not grow.

We cannot shirk—
Still, knowing that this kind
Will not prevail, "beyond the vail,"

It Saved the Ship.

They were speaking of wireless telegraphy when a retired naval officer said: "Let me tell you a true story, though I do not care to mention the names of the persons concerned, but they are in the navy to-day:

"We will say that Lieutenant Glover was officer of the deck of the ship Rancocus. She had been cruising off the coast of South America for several months and on putting into port received orders to sail for a small group of islands one thousand miles to the west and rescue some sailors who were reported there. The vessel was nearing this place when the incident occurred. As I have said, Glover was on deck that night. It was blowing pretty fresh and clouding up, and he ordered the royals in and then topgallant sails. Even then the ship was heeling so that it was not comfortable. He was about to call the watch and reef topsails when he heard a voice, 'Keep to the right; keep further to the right, for God's sake!' It was so distinct and clear that he turned, expecting to see some one, but the man at the wheel was a long distance off. Glover called to him, 'What did you say, quartermaster?' he asked. 'I didn't speak, sir,' replied the man. 'I thought you did,' Glover rejoined. He walked forward a way and looked out over the water again, when again came the cry, 'Keep to the right; keep to the right.'

"The officer turned quickly, but there was no one near him, and, startled, he turned aft, a strange fear or something akin to it taking possession of him. He was in charge of the ship and was responsible for her, but he had no right to change the course without consulting the captain. So he strode forward, with an effort to throw the feeling off. But as he grasped the shrouds and looked ahead, the voice came again: 'Keep to the right! In God's name, keep to the right!'

"That settled it. Glover sprang forward and shouted: 'Lay aft, watch! 'Bout ship!' The men sprang to their stations. 'Ready about, stations for stays!' came the order, followed by the whistle of the boatswain. The ship surged up into the wind, buffeted the waves for a few moments, then swung on the other tack. As she came on her course Glover made up his mind that he was in for it, and when he explained to the captain that he had put the ship about all on account of a voice he would in all probability either be put under arrest or placed on the sick report as being unfit for duty. But his relief in sailing in another direction was so great that he did not seem to mind anything else, and he immediately proceeded to report. 'Captain,' he said, 'I have come to report that I have put the ship about for what you will consider an idiotic reason. Three times I heard a voice by me on deck say, "Keep more to the right!" and I was so convinced that there was danger ahead that it became a certainty, and I put the ship about, sir.'

"Glover stood and waited for his sentence, as the captain was a noted martinet and an explosion was fairly sure to come, but to his amazement the captain said: 'You did quite right, Glover. Reduce sail and keep her as near the spot where you went about as you can until morning.'

"The captain came on deck early and sent at once for Glover. 'Mr. Glover,' he said, 'I wish you to figure out exactly the leeway and drift during the night and put the ship on the old course again, and let me know when you estimate that she will reach where you were last night when you put her about.' Glover figured awhile, ordered the ship about and stated that they would reach the spot in two hours. The men soon discovered that something unusual was in the wind, and excitement grew intense when the officer of the deck ordered an extra lookout in the top and told all hands to keep an eye out for danger ahead.

"The ship was forging ahead at great speed, and at four bells Glover informed the captain that as near as he could judge they were on the exact spot. 'Keep a weather eye out, lads,' said the captain, 'and the man who sees anything ahead gets extra grog.' For twenty minutes the ship plunged on. Then a man in the foretop waved his arm, shouting, 'Luff, luff; rocks ahead.' Up went the helm, and the big ship surged around into the wind while the sailor pointed to the starboard where the sea was eddying, boiling and foaming over a long, sunken ledge just at or below the surface, so low indeed that it could not have been seen until the ship was nearly on it. Glover's face was white as a sheet as the captain walked up to him and said, 'Say nothing of this, my boy, but you have saved us from a horrible death.'

"The wind was dying rapidly, and in a short while the boat ran within a few feet of the spot and found a ledge about a foot below the surface, a ledge of jagged, toothlike rocks extending along for a mile, and very narrow, with deep water all about; a ledge never known before. Now that ledge is marked on the charts.

"The strangest part ot the whole affair now comes in. Glover never mentioned the circumstance to any one, but when they reached port again some months later he found a letter from his wife, a portion of which he showed the captain. I cannot give it verbatim," said the story-teller, "but I have seen the letter, which ended with the hope, that her husband would not think her foolish, but she had had a fearful dream. She saw the ship rushing along, with him on deck, and there seemed to be a horrible abyss right before it. There was still time to save him, and she screamed, 'Keep to the right, keep to the right!" so loudly that it awoke her. She hoped it was not a presentiment of evil.

"That's all," said the retired officer, "and it is almost exactly true or as true as I can give it without naming the date, the officer, the ship and her cruising ground. The fact remains that his wife in a dream saw her husband rushing to disaster and by some stupendous mental effort communicated a warning to him several thousand miles away, her very words being repeated, so that his ship was saved."—New York Sun.

Summary of the Claims of "High Churchmen."

BY A. T. PIERSON.

1. The basis of all the rest is Priestly Ordination, which puts priestly intervention between a believer and his right to act as a minister of Christ, and is supposed to confer, by a sort of succession in grace, the Divine authority to preach and administer sacraments. In the primitive days, all believers preached (Acts viii: 1-4; xi: 19, 20), and Philip baptized, though he was set apart for a temporal office, and was, therefore, a "layman," and one case breaks the sacred line. Priestly ordination is the head of the whole system of sacerdotalism, and, if granted, it carries the rest with it by making a human authority necessary for all ministry, so that one is dependent for all else upon such priestly intervention.

2. Then follows Baptismal Regeneration, which puts the ordained priest between the infant child and the Church. Infant baptism becomes the means of regenerating the infant with the Holy Spirit and engrafting the child upon the body of Christ.

3. Next follows Priestly Interpretation, or indoctrination, which puts the priest between the baptized child and the Word of God. The priest becomes the teacher of the child, and churchly tradition the practical source of authority. Wherever the testimony of Scripture is considered doubtful tradition interprets it; and wherever the two conflict, tradition takes precedence. Hence the Bible is not a safe book to be put into the hands of any but priests.

4. Priestly Absolution naturally follows. The child is supposed to err, fall short, commit sin, and the only way to get clear of it is by the way of the confessional. This puts the priestly intervention between the sinner and Divine forgiveness.

5. Next follows Priestly Confirmation, in which is supposed to be found the channel of grace to the believer, as in ordination to the priestly candidate. This puts priestly intervention between the "child of the Church" and the Holy Spirit.

6. Then comes Priestly Administration of the Eucharist, whereby some mysterious change—transubstantiation, consubstantiation, or whatever it be called—takes place, in priestly hands, in the "bread and cup," so that they become the body and blood of the Lord. Hence the Lord's table becomes an altar, and the supper a sacrifice. This puts priestly intervention between the child of the Church and Christ's atoning death and sustaining life.

7. Finally come Prayers for the Dead. The soul departing lingers in some intermediate state of more or less imperfect and disciplinary suffering, until priestly intercession relieves it of disabilities, and promotes fuller entrance into the heavenly estate. This puts priestly intervention between the human spirit and final entrance into glory. What must the dying thief have done with no priest to baptize, instruct, confirm, absolve, administer the "real presence," or pray for the repose of his soul!

Humility.

It is only a little slip of paper, yellow with age, and yet, year after year, as the pigeonholes of my desk are re-assorted, and what is valueless culled out, this sheet is re-read and carefully put back.

Years ago I was often thrown into close touch with one who showed a Christlike spirit under all circumstances. Her environment was the reverse of pleasant. She was forced to live with those who were not only narrow, jealous and difficult to please, but who had no love for the things she loved. But she bore all with patience.

"How can you submit, as you do?" queried I, one day, when I chanced upon the scene and saw enough to suggest the thought that patience had ceased to be a virtue. "It is too much for human endurance!"

"You are right there," my aged friend replied, sweetly: "It is beyond human endurance: but the Holy Spirit, the Divine, enables me to bear patiently what would otherwise crush me. Years have taught me one lesson, however: If one has the true spirit of humility, there is little room for hurt feelings."

When next I called upon this saintly one she handed me the slip of paper which I shall always treasure, saying: "A quotation like this was given to me years ago, by one who awaits me on the other shore. I know not whose words they are, but I looked upon them as so good that I pasted the one given me on the fly-leaf of my Bible. To the frequent reading of it I owe so much that I want you, too, in possession of a copy. Perhaps after reading it, you will better understand the secret of my seeming indifference to what would once have made life a burden. Then, in tremulous tone, she added: "It is little I can give you, dear, but I copied this with a prayer that you, too, may be strengthened by it as I have been. To be 'clothed with humility,' as Peter puts it, has long been my aim; and I do know, by happy experience, that he 'giveth grace to the humble.'"

Then, with face illuminated from peace within, she placed in my hand the following apt definition of a virtue which is too little sought after:

"Humility is perpetual quietness of heart. It is to have no trouble. It is never to be fretted, or vexed, or irritated, or sore, or disappointed: It is to expect nothing, to wonder at nothing that is done to me, to feel nothing done against me. It is to be at rest when nobody praises me, and when I am blamed and despised. It is to have a blessed home in myself, where I can go in and shut the door, and kneel to my Father in secret, and am at peace, as in a deep sea of calmness when all around and above is trouble."

HELEN H. THOMAS.

"WE can say of our Bible to-day what was once said to the king of France, who was persecuting Protestants: 'Sire, the Church is an anvil, and it has worn out a great many hammers.' So our Bible has worn out many hammers, and will wear out a great many more."—J. Brown.

PRAYING IN SPIRIT.

"But thou when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father who is in secret, and thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly" (Matt. vi: 6).

I need not leave the jostling world,
Or wait till daily tasks are o'er,
To fold my palms in secret prayer,
Within the close-shut closet door.

There is a viewless, cloistered room,
As high as heaven, as fair as day,
Where, though my feet may join the throng;
My soul can enter in and pray.

When I have banished wayward thoughts,
Of sinful works the fruitful seed,
When folly wins my ear no more,
The closet door is shut indeed.

No human step approaching, breaks
The blissful silence of the place;
No shadow steals across the light
That falls from my Redeemer's face.

And never through these crystal walls
The clash of life can pierce its way;
Nor ever can a human ear
Drink in the spirit-words I say.

One harkening even, cannot know
When I have crossed the threshold o'er,
For He alone who hears my prayer,
Has heard the shutting of the door.

One Busy Girl's Way.

In the room of a girl friend the other da we noticed something which especially inte ested us. To the pin-cushion, which occupie the central position on her dresser, was pinne a short poem, evidently clipped from som newspaper. And the poem happened to be on which everybody knows about but comparativel few people know.

Now a pin-cushion is not the place whe one expects to find a poem, however grand o beautiful, and we looked to our friend for a explanation.

"I always have something I especially wa to know pinned to my cushion," she said, smilin "and when I'm brushing my hair or adjustin a collar button, I just glance over the line Before I know it I have the whole committe to memory and then I remove it and plac something else in its stead."

Now this girl, as we happen to know, is very busy girl, a stenographer in a law offic an earnest church worker, a favorite with oth young people, and we had been surprised t hear her spoken of as "so well informed We wondered how she found time to acqui her information, but the pin-cushion reveal the mystery. She had learned the art utilizing the minutes.—Selected.

rvation shows us that our little chil- uring their early years, pass through e stages of growth, which the race has rough. Since all savage peoples have ence for or fear of some power outside selves and superior to themselves, and nowledge of right and wrong, or good , we need feel no doubt but that very ildren will be able to grasp teaching iese two lines.

great deal of our theoretical and fig- religious teaching were reduced to em- g the importance of choosing to do hildren would much more readily grasp l Christianity.

Heavenly Father has planned the right l He comes into our hearts to show us y. When we do the thing which we right we feel happy because we are in with the Divine will; when we do the hich we know is wrong we feel un- ecause we are not in harmony with the will—most little children will acknowl- at they have this experience. Their should affirm and reaffirm this truth esults, until the lesson is fully learned. e entrance gate to the Christian road. lness in choosing to do right leads to knowledge of Divine things—to faith e as well as obedience.

g the years of adolescence when the al nature is at its highest sensitiveness, should especially guard their children even religious excitement. It is the nost conversions, it is true, but of most and crimes as well. The quieter re- growth which comes from choosing right king toward the blessed Holy Spirit for e, is the safest and surest way.

e all, as Dr. Stanley Hall says emphati- our big sons cultivate a spirit of pro- reverence to carry them through the nd strain of this period. If our children el this reverence we must be prayerfully to teach them Truth. How easy it is a lazy answer to their questions by "Most people do not do this or that," ds believe so and so." Many a man has th forever because the supposed in- standard erected by his parents, has very fallible. When the standard fell, ole belief of the mature man fell with o not dress as we Friends do, because decree it, but because of an individual Divine requirement; and, furthermore, it appeals to us, as one of the most al ways of upholding the simplicity our Saviour taught, and which was practised in the early church as well g early Friends.

children think we are not consistent respects, teach them that simplicity damental principle, which each Chris- ht to work out for himself. Truth is g to discover and live up to.

es ideas are so frequently full of error, ir practices so influenced by circum- stances, that it is possible to find really good people who support in life or teaching almost any truth or error. So the children must be taught to think and pray for themselves, and not to be disturbed by the contradictions among good people with whom they associate.

True prayer is the communion between our Heavenly Father and his children. Our part is to preserve an attitude of faith, obedience and love toward Him. Teach the children when they reach toward, long for, their Heavenly Father's presence, that He is well pleased with them, and from time to time will fill their hearts with joy, will prompt them to petition for grace and gifts which He will grant with his love. But they are far too finite to know of themselves the things for which they should ask.

Teach them that their Heavenly Father often accomplishes his purposes slowly and they may have to wait for the realization of their best desires. Preserve them in their childhood from the experience of prayers which they feel are unanswered. If their attitude is right, they may be sure of growth in things Divine.

The time has come when the thinking world has begun to look at the Bible as Robert Barclay taught in his Apology. And it behooves Friends to read his proposition on the Scriptures, and then faithfully to instruct the children in its truths; looking unto the Lord as of old to understand their spiritual teachings. There never was a time, when history illustrated, and research vindicated the truth and beauty of the Bible as they do to-day.

While we must leave to Him who can speak to our and our children's condition the spiritual openings of life in Holy Writ as living experience may need them, there are yet other and outward aspects of the Scripture—such as pertain to history, geography, customs of the time, language and literature—which clearly refer themselves to the outward understanding of men. When these features are kept in their true relation to the greater light which rules the spiritual day, the lesser light is by no means to be despised in its own sphere. There are no established facts in the historic setting or the literary features of the Scripture, but have their value in promoting a fuller and helpful understanding of its teachings. In proportion as the avenues of appreciation are increased, so the truth itself seems to be enlarged.

The Bible has for so long a time touched the heart side of humanity so exclusively, that the mental side stands in danger of losing its designed (though subordinate) place. What has Truth to fear? A Christian mind is only an added helper to a Christian heart. If our children have been taught the Truth and if they have the influence of Christian parents—parents who know the Truth and are true to their convictions — we may be assured that their minds as well as their hearts will enjoy and endorse the teachings of holy men inspired of God.

Every little Quaker child will probably ask its mother at some time, "What is a Friend?" What answer can we give which will be true?—an answer which will emphasize and dignify our denominational position and not underestimate the Christ-like life of those who belong to the church universal, but are not of our household of faith. In the first place we must make clear to our children that there is a church universal; that its members are in every sect and every nation; that membership in the Society of Friends is not, necessarily, membership in the church universal; that it is of first importance to know the will and love of Christ to fill the heart; that certain principles have been committed to the Society of Friends to be held and taught, and that these distinguishing principles are becoming more and more to be understood by other Christian people.

1st. Silence as a basis for worship, in place of pre-arranged services. The attitude of silent prostration of spirit before the Lord, when the whole man is ready to be filled with the Holy Spirit and yield obedience to his will is the best attitude for religious worship.

2. A ministry freshly inspired for each occasion. The Holy Spirit alone should be depended on to inspire vocal service. Intellectual discourses or unintellectual talk are not satisfying to the hunger of the soul. Prophets who have a message from the Lord for which the hearts of the people are prepared by the Lord, are now, as in olden time, the strongest upbuilders of the church.

3rd. A belief in the spiritual interpretation of "the ordinances."

4th. A belief in peace among men and nations as a Christian principle.

If our children grasp these four principles and have a personal realization of their truth and power we may be well satisfied to call them Friends. And without such realization we do well not to consider them or ourselves to be really Friends, but only members of the Society.

The world is slowly but surely coming to understand these same Christian views; but none the less do we need to be loyal to the principles of our progenitors. And so to teach our children that they may count it a blessing to receive teachings of truths from their parents which many work out for themselves through long and painful ways, yea, even through persecutions and evil reports.

When in the far-away future the day comes when man shall see far better the truth and beauty of Truth's blessed way, will he build Him costly churches, with organs to sound forth praise and one man to lead the worshippers into the Divine presence? Or will devout souls gather together in consistent simplicity to offer from all hearts, as one, the praise due to the Father of spirits? Sometimes it is as helpful to gaze into the future as to linger in the past. I would that such a gaze might quicken every parent to love and teach Christian and Quaker truths to the children in such an intelligent and living way that the hearts of the children would grow warm with love and zeal for Christ and his blessed Truth.

Question.—What of miracles?

Answer.—The Lord's power is infinite. Both to will and to do whatsoever He seeeth fit, and whensoever there is a necessity for it.

But his arm is not revealed unto the people, for "He maketh darkness his covering and thick darkness his pavilion."

Yet the Scripture saith "He is light, and in Him is no darkness at all."

Therefore the darkness is with the people, and it remaineth with them.

THE PENALTY.

We are mad—grown mad in the race for gold;
We are drunk with the wine of gain;
The truths our fathers proclaimed of old
We spurn with a high disdain;
But, while the conqueror's race we run,
Our rulers should not forget
That the God who reigned over Babylon
Is the God who is reigning yet.

Would we tread in the paths of tyranny,
Nor reckon the tyrant's cost?
Who taketh another's liberty,
His freedom hath also lost.
Would we win as the strong have ever won?
Make ready to pay the debt;
For the God who reigned over Babylon
Is the God who is reigning yet.

The ruins of dynasties passed away
In eloquent silence lie;
And the despot's fate is the same to-day
That it was in the days gone by Against all wrong and injustice done
A rigid account is set;
For the God who reigned over Babylon
Is the God who is reigning yet.

The laws of right are eternal laws.
The judgments of truth are true.
My greed-blind masters, I bid you pause
And look on the work you do;
You bind with shackles your fellow-man;
Your hands with his blood are wet;
And the God who reigned over Babylon
Is the God who is reigning yet.

For "THE FRIEND."

Love.

"We love Him because He first loved us" (1 John iv: 19.)

Love is reciprocal in its action. There is a natural love and affection, thus spoken of: "for sinners also love those that love them" (Luke vi: 32). But this is not identical with that love of which John speaks in the above text; for sinners may be and are as sinners dead to God, having the carnal mind which is "enmity against God." Sinners love those who love them, but the children of God, born of his Spirit, love those also who are yet enemies.

"God is love" (1 John iv: 16), and as such is the inexhaustible Fountain of love, pouring out the same as the sun pours out heat and light for ages, losing nothing of its brightness and glory. There is that which cannot come into this love, this light and glory, and that is, the fruit of darkness—sin. But God's love flows through Christ Jesus, his beloved Son towards men whilst yet sinners, that his love may woo them from sin, and his light make plain the way of escape therefrom; forsaking which they receive of his love. As the infant instinctively turns to and loves the nourishing breast, so is this Divine love a first fruit of the Holy Spirit by which man is born again, becoming a child of God.

"That which is born of the spirit is spirit." Man "must be born of the spirit or he cannot see the kingdom of God." The child of God is then "born of the incorruptible seed, the word of God, that liveth and abideth for ever." With this life comes love, nor can we take away the one and leave the other, for the life, as the love, is of God. As then we abide in Christ, who is our life, we shall abide in his love. Christ Jesus said, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love." And Christ's commandment above all others is "That ye love one another as I have loved you" (John xv: 12). For if Christ and his love be in us, that love must flow towards those whom He loves and who being born of the spirit love God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Christ Jesus gives this love as an inalienable and never-failing gift to all his people. To them it becomes a sure evidence that they walk in his favor, that they enjoy that eternal life which is God's gift to those who believe in his Son. He gives it to them as the badge of discipleship whereby others know them as such. It is, as baptized by one spirit into one body, one life and one love, that herein they receive the unction of the holy One to become "kings and priests unto God, his Father."

Where this love holds sway in the heart, kindness, forgiveness and mercy are the attendant graces, the works of evil are diligently eradicated and every virtue flourishes.

It is this love that enables to fulfil the royal law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." And Christ briefly sums the whole duty of man as love to God and love to man.

All true believers are God's husbandry, working with Him in the garden of their hearts, having a duty to do as Adam had in Eden "to dress it and keep it," and the fruits, those of the spirit, are fruits of righteousness well pleasing to God. So Jude counsels how through faith and prayer in the Holy Ghost, ye "Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" (21 v).

Far removed from this Divine love that knits the whole family of God in one brotherhood is that specious love which is in word only and not deeds. The former, like a quiet stream from the spring of life, often gladdens God's people and cements their hearts in one; the latter idly vaunts itself in words, in words far from being expressive of the true thoughts of the speaker.

Finally, this love is a gift of the Prince to his sons and as such "shall be their possession by inheritance." Gifts of service to servants, as prophecy, gifts of healing, knowledge and the like may fail, but love never. It flows forever, gently onward towards the fountain of its source. Paul near the end of his pilgrimage beheld it as a vast flowing stream of which nothing here below nor any of the powers of evil could stem the resistless tide. Nor do we cease to love when we cease to breathe, for that love is inseparable to that life which comes from God.

W. W. B.

"OUR business here is to believe, adore, love and obey; not to comprehend and dispute. We receive the benefit of the rain, and avail ourselves of the winds and tides, and seek shelter from the storms whether we understand the theory of them or not. Thus let us flee from the wrath to come, take refuge in the hope of the gospel, receive the comforts of life thankfully, and bear its burdens cheerfully, without being desirous of knowing those 'secret things which belong to the Lord our God.' The government of the world is his, and He neither needs nor asks our advice; but to man He saith, 'The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.'"—Thomas Scott's Commentaries.

Thousands Saved from Wild Waves.

The annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-saving Service states that at the close of the year the establishment embraced 265 stations, 193 being on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, 56 on the Great Lakes, 15 on the Pacific and one at the Falls of the Ohio, Louisville, Ky.

The number of disasters to documented vessels within the field of the operations of the service during the year was 428. There were on board these vessels 3,903 persons, of whom 3,847 were saved and 56 lost. The estimated value of the vessels involved was $6,072,000, and that of their cargoes $2,032,005, making a total value of property imperiled $8,104,000. Of this amount $6,261,900 was saved and $1,842,740 lost.

Seven hundred and fifty-one shipwrecked persons received succor at the stations, for whom 1,460 days' relief in the aggregate was afforded.

The number of vessels totally lost was 7[illegible]

In addition to the foregoing, there were during the year 294 casualties to small craft such as small yachts, sail-boats, row-boats, etc., on board of which were 671 persons, 66 of whom were saved and seven lost. The property involved in these instances is estimated at $138,535, of which $129,285 was saved and 9,250 lost.

Of the 63 persons who perished, 44 were lost in one district, the Second, on the coast of Massachusetts, and 40 of these in one storm, the almost unprecedented tempest of Eleventh Month 26th and 27th, 1898. One-half of the latter number were on board of vessels which were destroyed on outlying rocks and shoals where they could not be seen.

The entire loss of life in all the other districts was only nineteen. These, with the 44 lost in the Second district, aside from those who perished in the autumn hurricane, make a total loss of twenty-three, which number is considerably below the average annual loss in all the districts in recent years.

Besides the number of persons saved from vessels of all kinds, there were 72 others rescued who had fallen from wharves, piers, etc., the most of whom would have perished but for the aid of the life-saving crews.

The crews saved and assisted in saving during the year 387 vessels, valued, with their cargoes at $2,998,255, and rendered assistance of minor importance to 382 other vessels in distress, besides warning from danger by signals of the patrolmen 193 vessels. The number of lives and amount of property saved through these warnings is, of course, indeterminable.

IN the reign of Edward III. there were in Bristol, Eng., three brothers who were employed as clothiers and woolen weavers, and whose family name was Blanket. They were the first persons who manufactured that comfortable material which has ever since been called by their name, and which was then used for servants' clothing.

IST AND CHRISTIANS.—In Prof. Max.
's account of his Indian friends, in the volume of his "Auld Lang Syne," he ven a striking sketch of a very talented itivated young man, of the highest caste, ad been brought to faith on Christ in and who came to London in order to Christianity in a Christian land. When about the thought or experience that ade him a Christian, he gave this remark-estimony: "I can explain why I rejected nd Krishna and Allah, I can tell you hing that kept me back so long from anity as preached to us in India, and ne reject the New as well as the Old ent as unsatisfactory to a thinking man. y and how I became a Christian I can-plain. I was caught as in a net, and I ot get away from Christ."
t an illustration of our Lord's own words,
, if I be lifted up from the earth, will l men unto me." There was something Spirit of the Lord, quite distinct from sentation of his teaching, which caught ld his acute mind and inquiring heart.
it was a case of heart drawing, as over mind conviction. . . .
woman of Samaria persuaded the men town to come and see the man who told she had ever done. And they said:
we believe, not because of thy saying;
for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world."

But there was another testimony of the young Hindu. He had come to London, hoping to find the concrete exemplification of the life and doctrine of Jesus in a Christian civilization. But what he actually saw was so different from his ideals that he said to Prof. Muller: "If what I have seen in London is Christianity. I want to go back to India; if that is Christianity, I am not a Christian."

It is a severe indictment of our practical living of the Gospel, but it was a judgment that the Hindu had the right to pronounce. Christians are the living representatives of Christ. It is through their life that the Gospel is made known to the world far more than by their word. The Hindu had been drawn to Christ by what he had learned of the Master himself. He was repelled again by the imperfect life of the Master's professed disciples. —W. A. Brooks, in the Presbyterian.

Items Concerning the Society.

PUBLIC MEETINGS, ARCH ST. AND LANSDOWNE, PA.

A MEETING has been appointed under a religious concern of Cyrus Cooper (who has a minute for service within the limits of Philadelphia and Abington Quarterly Meetings), to be held in the meeting-house at Fourth and Arch Streets, next First-day afternoon, the 11th inst., at three o'clock. The attendance of young people interested in attending Friends' meetings is especially desired, while others also are not excluded.

A meeting for worship is appointed by authority of Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa., to be held in the meeting-house at Lansdowne, Pa., Fifth-day evening, the 15th inst., at eight o'clock.

A correspondent writes: "Eastern Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held at Cedar Grove, Northampton Co., N. C. twenty-third and twenty-fourth of Second Month, 1900, and we believe it was one of the best ever held at this place. The meetings for worship were solemn and impressive, and the power of the Lord seemed to be over all. The business affairs of the church were transacted with an unusual degree of love and unity. We had the presence of our dear friend, Joseph J. Neave, from Australia, accompanied by John W. Watson, from the Indian Territory. The former was here thirty-five years ago when our country was involved in war, and he suffered much in performing the duty he felt to be laid upon him. He seemed to be highly pleased and very thankful to find our country under so much brighter skies than when here before, also expressing himself as being truly glad to find our meeting here held as Friends would hold one, and so well attended."

WORK UNDER THE NAME OF FRIENDS IN CUBA.—Letters have been received from John B. Wood, for expressing the substance of which we are indebted to the London Friend, as follows:

"The last year has witnessed an interesting and encouraging drawing towards Friends in Cuba. Before any member of the Society had been engaged in missionary effort in the island, the reading of Friends' literature attracted a number of persons toward the spiritual views of Friends. As an outcome of the residence amongst them of Francisco G. Cala and his wife, a meeting has been established, which is held at Tenerife 52, Havana. John B. Wood, who has recently gone to reside there, states that on reaching Havana he found six families of twenty-four persons living in this house, besides one hundred and nineteen children being educated there, and frequent meetings held during the week. It was then hoped to make early arrangements to reduce the overcrowding, and an effort is being made for the building of a meeting-house. The Havana Monthly Meeting, in the course of an address to Friends generally, says:

"'We are thankful for the religious liberty which exists to-day in our country, and with the purpose of extending the reign of Christ among us we have established, with the consent of your Mexican meeting, a Monthly Meeting in Havana, and salute fraternally all men that accept Christ as Master and Redeemer of the human race, and ask their prayers and help.'"

Notes from Others.

Almost anybody is willing to be a hammer and strike for God, but very few people are willing to be an anvil and to be struck for God.—S. Jones.

The Ecumenical Conference of 1900, representing the Protestant Missionary Societies of the world, is announced to be held in New York, beginning Fourth Month 21st. Notable delegates from many countries are expected.

Hobson City, Alabama, is a town of four hundred colored people, with one hundred houses, three churches and a school house, several stores and no saloons. At the election of officers, Eighth Month 15th, not a drop of whiskey was seen, nor the least disorder occurred. This is quite an improvement over the white towns of Alabama.—Southern Christian Recorder.

Rachel C. Mather, of Beaufort, S. C., who has given her means and thirty-three years of her life to relief work for the negroes in that region, now appeals for funds to erect a hospital on a bluff of Broad River, overlooking Port Royal Bay and the mainland. Thousands of negroes having been ejected from their homes for taxes made delinquent by destruction of crops by wind and wave, their general distress seems heart-rending, and the need of a shelter for the aged, the sick and the helpless, makes a loud claim on humanity.

The task of taking a religious census of Philadelphia, which was begun by volunteers from various churches on Washington's Birthday, Second Month 22nd, is complete in eleven districts only—about two-thirds of the task. The work is still going on. Thus far only 23 in every 100 persons appear as adherents of any religious creed. The large number of 77 in 100 are without denominational ties.

The statement shows that 4,609 visitors were engaged in taking records. People belonging to over sixty-one creeds and religions were found. The number of Catholics average about one to four of the combined Protestant churches. The total number of records taken is 253,169. As each record represents four persons, the number of people seen is 1,012,676.

Counting by records, the Catholics have the highest number among individual denominations, with 67,045. Other figures are: Baptist, 25,187; Episcopal, 25,953; Presbyterian, 25,595; Methodist Episcopal, 33,451; Lutheran, 17,827; Jewish, 5,728; Chinese, 50; refused information, 3,903; no religious preference expressed, 15,421; vacant houses in the city, 6,076.

There are yet 40,000 records to be made, which means that over 160,000 people have not been visited.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States imported more merchandise last year from every quarter of the globe than it took in 1898.

The Puerto Rican Tariff bill, amended so as to reduce the tariff from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. and limiting its life to two years, passed the House on Second Month 28th, by a vote of 172 to 161. Six Republicans voted with the opposition against the bill, and four Democrats voted with the Republicans for it. Each side made herculean efforts to get ont a full vote, six members being brought from beds of sickness to vote.

Senator Davis of Minnesota, has offered an amendment to the Puerto Rican Tariff bill granting free trade to the island and extending to it the provisions of the Constitution, while implying that such privilege cannot be extended to the Philippines except by legislative action.

President McKinley has sent a message to Congress recommending that $2,095,455.58, collected as duties upon goods imported from Puerto Rico since the Spanish evacuation of the island, on Tenth Month 18, 1898, be appropriated for the use and benefit of the island. The House accordingly passed a bill by a vote of 162 to 107, appropriating the money to be used as the President may desire.

The Washington correspondent of the Public Ledger, writes:—"The temperance question in the Philippines is stirring a tidal wave of petitions into motion all over the country. From the West and from New England there comes daily a tremendous mass of correspondence to Senators and Representatives expressing indignation at the possibility of the young men in the army in the Philippines becoming drunkards. In response to this spirit of protest in his State Mr. Gillette, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill in the House prohibiting the sale anywhere in the Philippines of whiskey or other distilled liquors in quantities less than twenty gallons, unless on a physician's prescription. The penalty for the first offence is fixed $10 or thirty days' imprisonment. The second offence can be punished with a fine of from $10 to $1000 or six months' imprisonment, or both."

The War Department has received a cable statement showing that the total receipts from the Philippine Islands for Second Month, 1900, were $426,423, of which amount $357,000 was derived from customs.

The total Government receipts during Second Month were $45,631,265 and the expenditures, $37,738,472, leaving a surplus of $7,892,793.

The people of Cuba demand from the United States the same favor that is shown Puerto Rico. Cuba now pays the same customs duties that were paid while the island was under the dominion of Spain. Robert P. Porter, formerly Superintendent of the Census and now the President's special representative in Cuba, and Quesada, the Cuban Commissioner to the United States, are already calling attention to this contradiction of tariff responsibilities. They urge that Cuba is in the hands of the United States, and that fair play is a jewel to which the island has a right to lay claim.

"Not only," says R. P. Porter, "should the Cuban planter be put on equality with the sugar producers of the other West Indian islands—should the reciprocity treaty with the British West Indies go through—but with the sugar producers of Puerto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands also. As matters staud, the discrimination against the Cuban planter is very unfair. For example, I know of a sugar estate in the Hawaiian Islands which last year paid a net profit of $993,532.74, out of which sum no less than $751,223.55, was the saving of duties, a sum which a Cuban planter producing the same amount of sugar would have been compelled to pay into the United States Treasury. I have the facts to substantiate this statement or I would not make it."

In the past ten years the production of wheat has increased 54 per cent. in the South, and the number of hogs raised there has during that period nearly doubled.

Last year Minnesota's wheat fields covered nearly 5,000,000 acres, and she grew upward of 78,000,000 bushels —more than twice the entire production of the continent of Australia, and more than that of Great Britain and Ireland.

A despatch from Memphis, Tenn., of the 2d inst., says:—"Cotton to-day in Memphis, was quoted at 9 cents, the highest price since Third Month 13, 1893. The advance of the last week added a million dollars to the value of the Memphis stock. The advance since Ninth Month 1st. is equivalent to about $15 per bale."

On the fifth, cotton was sold in New York city for 10$\frac{1}{16}$ cents, and in Atlanta, Ga., the price was higher than for years past.

There will be $85,000,000 expended next year in Greater New York in the construction of buildings. This estimate is exclusive of the cost of structures contracted for by the city.

A special from Lancaster, Pa., says:—A pigeon belonging to Wallace L. Robinson, several days ago hatched out two chicks, and attended the "peeps" as faithfully as though they were of her kind.

An appropriation of $100,000 has been made by the Kentucky Legislature to be used in detecting and convicting the assassin of Governor Goebel.

There were three deaths from the plague at Honolulu on Second Month 19th, the first for twelve days.

There were 536 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 151 more than the previous week and 30 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 312 were males and 284 females: 96 died of pneumonia; 66 of consumption; 50 of heart diseases; 30 of diphtheria; 27 of apoplexy; 25 of convulsions; 21 of nephritis; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of old age; 17 of uræmia; 14 of marasmus; 12 of paralysis; 11 of cancer; 11 of inanition; 10 of peritonitis; 9 of measles; 9 of typhoid fever, and 8 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—The budget introduced in the British House of Commons calls for an expenditure of £154,082,000. For the year just ending an anticipated surplus of £5,000,000 has, by the war, been converted into a deficiency of £17,770,000. The total cost of the war is estimated at £60,000,000, in order to meet which it is proposed to increase taxes, issue Treasury bills and borrow money on bond. The House adopted the proposals.

About 4,000 prisoners, including several Boer officers of distinction, are among the captures made of General Cronje's forces. The prisoners were treated with consideration by Lord Roberts, and were transferred to Cape Town.

A London special from Cape Town of the 1st instant, says that a telegram has been received there from Mafeking announcing that the Boers made a severe and protracted assault on Second Month 17th, but were driven off at all points. The fiercest work is usually observed on the 8th day of the week was broken on the 18th by another fierce attack, but after determined fighting the Boers were repulsed with a loss of forty killed and wounded.

The siege of Ladysmith has been abandoned by the Boers. On the night of Second Month 28th, General Duudonald, with the Natal Carbineers, succeeded in entering the town. General Buller visited the besieged garrison on Third Month 1st. He found the men living on a ration of a half pound of meal per day per man, and they were supplementing the meat rations by horses and mules. The fortitude of the relieved people was very touching. The news of the relief of Ladysmith caused wild demonstrations of joy throughout Great Britain. The bells of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, were rung and business was practically suspended.

Martial law has been declared by Sir Alfred Milner in the portions of Cape Colony where many British subjects have taken up arms.

Not very long ago a bedstead made of gold and silver and inlaid with precious stones was discovered in a cave between Beyrout and Damascus. An inscription shows that it belonged to the famous Queen Eleanor, of England, who followed her royal husband to the Crusades; this wonderful piece of furniture had lain concealed in the cave for six centuries.

Russia, already a contractor for American iron and steel for her great Trans-Siberian Railroad, is likely to become a large consumer of American bituminous coal. While no contract has yet been signed, representatives of the Russian Imperial Government have been making overtures to the Berwind-White Coal Mining Company, looking to the purchase and shipment of nearly half a million tons to ports on the Baltic.

American locomotives are used on the Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway. The extent to which American locomotives are being used abroad does not fail to awaken voices of anguish among the foreign press.

A special to the Chicago Record of the 2nd instant, from Guadalajara, Mexico, says: "The recent earthquakes, which were felt throughout Southera Mexico, did much greater damage than was indicated by the earlier reports. News from remote coast and mountain towns has just reached Gundalajara, and stories of great destruction of property and considerable loss of life are told. The severe shocks had a remarkable effect upon the sea, causing it to roll inland and covering the country for a distance of over one mile from the beach. The tidal dation occurred three times in rapid succession every movable thing in its path was swept away. was most severe on the Pacific coast, extending Acapulco to Manzanillo. Several of the mountain in the State of Michoacan suffered severely."

The bubonic plague has appeared on the isla Cozumel, off the coast of Yucatan.

Thousands in India are dying weekly of famine, where five cents, we are informed, would keep one individual alive for one week.

The "Salvation Army" officers in India are face to face with this horror every day, and their organization is administering such aid as may come to them from this or any country. The Philadelphia division is endeavoring to raise $5000 to keep five thousand persons from dying of starvation for a period of twenty weeks. Help for them may be sent to Adam Gifford, 14 S. Broad Street, Philadelphia.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Life of the Spirit.

Surely to be commended is the imitation of a good example; yet better than imitation of any virtue is the possession of it in the heart as an active principle leavening the deeds of life with its own heavenly quality. It is not the form of godliness which should be the Christian's care, so much as the power of it.

So, the ideal which is set before us in the gospel of Jesus Christ, is not simply the performance of a code of conduct imposed as an outward rule—is not simply an imitation of our Lord's earthly life—even though haply a man might be willing it live a life that could be accounted an imitation of Christ's; but, above all, are we called to possess the Spirit of Christ, without which, the apostle teaches, we are none of his. It was our Saviour's injunction to his followers that they be children of their Father who is in heaven. As they become children then are they partakers, in measure, of the Father's nature—being born again and of the Spirit, "not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." His will done in the earth through such instruments is not wrought by imitation, but is the outward expression of that inward life which is by the faith of the Son of God. C. F. S.

"To him that overcometh, I will give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."

Beyond all our discoveries in his words and being, there lie depths within depths of truth that we cannot understand, and yet shall be ever going on to understand. Yea, even now sometimes we seem to have dim glimpses into regions from which we receive no word to bring away.

The fact that some things have become to us so much more simple than they were, and the great truths have come out of what once looked common, is ground enough for hope that such will go on to be our experience through the ages to come. Our advance from our former ignorance can measure but a small portion of the distance that lies, and must ever lie, between our childishness and his manhood, between our love and his love, between our dimness and his mighty vision.

To Him ere long may we all come, all children, still children, more children than ever, to receive from his hand the white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it. . . .

The true name is one which expresses the character, the nature, the being, the meaning of the person who bears it. It is the man's own symbol, his soul's picture, in a word—the sign which belongs to him and to no one else. Who can give a man this, his own name? God alone. For no one but God sees what the man is, or even, seeing what he is could express in a name-word the sum and harmony of what he sees. To whom is this name given? To him that overcometh. When is it given? When he has overcome. It is only when the man has become his name that God gives him the stone with the name upon it, for then first can he understand what his name signifies. It is the blossom, the perfection, the completion, that determines the name; but the tree of the soul, before its blossom comes, cannot understand what blossom it is to bear, and could not know what the word meant, which, in representing its own unarrived completeness, named itself. Such a name cannot be given until the man is the name. . . .

As the fir-tree lifts up itself with a far different need from the need of the palm-tree, so does each man stand before God, and lift up a different humanity to the common Father. And for each God has a different response. With every man He has a secret—the secret of the new name. In every man there is a loneliness, an inner chamber of peculiar life into which God only can enter. I say not it is the innermost chamber, but a chamber into which no brother, nay, no sister can come. From this it follows that there is a chamber also (O God! humble and accept my speech), a chamber in God himself, into which none can enter but the one, the individual, the peculiar man—out of which chamber that man has to bring revelation and strength for his brethren. This is that for which he was made—to reveal the secret things of the Father. . . . . .

Each of us is a distinct flower or tree in the spiritual garden of God—precious, each for his own sake, in the eyes of Him who is even now making us, each of us watered and shone upon and filled with life, for the sake of his flower, his completed being, which will blossom out of him at last to the glory and pleasure of the great Gardener. For each has within him a secret of the Divinity; each is growing towards the revelation of that secret to himself, and so to the full reception, according to his measure of the Divine. Every moment that he is true to his true self, some new shine of the white stone breaks on his inward eye, some fresh channel is opened upward for the coming glory of the flower, the conscious offering of his whole being in beauty to the Creator.—Unspoken Sermons.

HOLY LIVING.—"Be a book," was the answer given by a wise friend to a young aspirant who desired to write a book. Better even than to be an apostle is it to be a living epistle, known and read of all men. The greatest thing that any of us can do is to live not for Christ, but to live Christ. What is holy living? It is Christ life. It is not to be Christians, but Christ-ones. It is not to try to do, or be some great thing, but simply to have Him and let Him live his own life in us, abiding in Him and He in us, and letting Him reflect his own graces, his own faith, his own consecration, his own love, his own patience, his own gentleness, his own works in us, while we "show forth the virtues of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." This is at once the sublimest and the simplest life that it is possible to live. It is a higher standard than human perfection, and yet it is possible for a poor, imperfect, sinful man to realize it through the perfect Christ who comes to live within us. God help us so to live and thus to make real to those around us the simplicity, the beauty, the glory and power of the Christ life.—Zion's Watchman.

For "THE FRIEND."

Two little girls that enjoy hearing the Bible read were one day discussing what seemed mysterious to them, without in the least questioning the truth of all; when the older remarked, "I can not understand how Jesus can see us in the dark. I think He must have a light somewhere about Him—perhaps He carries a lantern in his clothes." Lydia, the younger, not yet four years old, replied, "Why, Mary, Jesus is all light himself!" S. A. AN ODE TO FOURTH AND ARCH ST. MEETING-HOUSE.

[Written by a girl of sixteen (not a member of the Society of Friends)—a pupil in Friends' Select School.]

Far down in the older city,
Near the warehouses dingy and tall,
Where the dwellings, century, olden,
Have legends in every wall,

Where the air is filled with shouting
And with rolling of heavy wheels,
And the thronging life of the city,
Is all that one hears or feels;

There stands the old Friends' meeting,
Apart from worldly ill,
As though to the crowd it were saying
Like our Master, "Peace, be still!"

Surrounded by restful silence,
Shut off from the city's din,
Like a patient father, waiting
To gather his children in.

Within there is peaceful quiet
Alike for the heart and brain,
A quiet that hushes worries,
A quiet that comforts pain.

Tis there I find rest from wishing,
And the answer to questionings deep,
And all my petty trials
Are suddenly hushed to sleep.

Ah, blessed Friendly Meeting!
If Heaven should e'er be mine,
God grant it may hold a quiet
As sweet and calm as thine.

An Unofficial Red Cross Report.

There has been much discussion in the papers of late concerning the true place or characterization of alcohol. Many eminent scientists have been cited to prove that it is certainly a poison; others have been summoned to demonstrate that it may even be reckoned as a food.

The sharp revival of this subject may undoubtedly be referred to the publicity given to certain brief and inconclusive experiments made last summer by Prof. Attwater, of Middletown College, Connecticut. The following statement may throw some light upon the controversy, and help us to a summing up at least of the general subject.

The statement I refer to is that of Bertine H. Lesser, of the Red Cross Hospital, of New York, who narrates a suggestive incident of her experience in one of that city's foremost hospitals and training schools for nurses, whither she had gone as a learner, in anticipation of the establishment of a similar institution for the Red Cross sisters. In the last six months of her studies, having the charge of the children's ward, she had as a patient, ill with pneumonia, a boy of twelve years, to whom was to be given as part of his medicinal treatment a half-ounce of whiskey three times a day. Whiskey or brandy, in larger or smaller doses, were the principal stimulants used then, and it was not usual for a patient to object to taking such drinks. This boy, however, seemed not to like either the odor or taste of the prescribed doses, so that some urging was needed to persuade him to take it.

"For several days in succession," says Wardmistress Lesser, "I had the same difficulty whenever the dose was due, until he finally became, as I then thought, a very good boy, and took the brandy as readily as he did the other medicines. His illness was of a rath long duration and the medicine was given f about three or four weeks. About the mid of the second week, the order was chang from whiskey three times a day to twice a d which was to be given mornings and evenin When noon came and he did not get his do as usual, he reminded me that I had forgott his medicine. When told that he was to ha it only twice a day, I could see that he w disappointed. Next day at noon he pretend to be very weak, with the expectation of g ting the third dose, but it had not been dered and of course he did not get it. It v evident the little man had learned to like bad medicine very much. This continued four weeks, during which time the dose whiskey was gradually decreased, and he discharged as cured."

This, however, was not the end of the i dent. A few months after the lad had left hospital, the ward-mistress met the moth showing a very care-worn face, and natur inquired as to the health of the late pati With tears in her eyes she told how he m her buy brandy and whiskey on the plea t he needed it to regain his strength. Later, dropped the excuse of ill-health, and sim demanded the money for drink.

Following this unsatisfactory occurre and actuated by the hope, if not the belief, t the administration of alcoholics in sick might be dispensed with, various experim were undertaken and investigations instit on the part of physicians interested, but were inclined to be skeptical, with the re that they felt constrained to re-cast t former views and to admit that brandy whiskey did not possess the worth in sick that they had been taught to believe. The tablishment of the Red Cross Hospital, in followed. About twelve hundred patient all classes, and suffering from all kinds of eases, have been treated since then, the tality never averaging higher than one cent. These few incurable cases were "diseases for which science as yet know cure."

The value of the foregoing account is centuated by the concluding statement, "before and during the recent Spanish-An can war, we attended thousands of patien Havana, and eight hundred and three pati during the Santiago campaign. Our res even under the most unfavorable circumsta in the latter instance, were always the as those in our hospital in this city."

A statement, well sustaining the a which came under my notice last week, is of Dr. A. M. Hutchinson of the State Refo tory of Kansas, an institution with upwar five hundred and fifty inmates. He says now entering on his third term, has made five thousand prescriptions and has not it necessary to prescribe an intoxicant single instance. There have been only deaths in the four and-a-half years of his vice, three from consumption and one internal hemorrhage. Further, in his pr practice, out of hundreds of cases of pneum and typhoid fever treated in the last e years, he has lost only two. At the Wor National Temperance Hospital, Chicago, w 238 cases were treated last year, 201 of involving surgical treatment, no alcoholics

Some Fruits of Walking in the Light.

The design of history and biography is to transfer instruction and benefit of former experience to the present and succeeding generations.

Reference to early Friends in books and papers is not uncommon, exalting their principles as the foundation of true living, and in accordance with the Holy Scriptures.

It may be fitting at this time to review these legacies to the nation, so forcibly set forth by statesmen and members of other religious denominations, who accord to the founders of the Society of Friends the most advanced place among reformers, and recognize that they have contributed to American history the ideal civilization.

They may be considered as a peculiar people, but there is a consistent reason for every peculiarity.

Through them the affirmation is recognized in courts of justice. They argued they would have every word uttered by man as true as an oath.

They led in prison reforms and charities, and practised religious tolerance.

Their persecutions were borne without retaliation, and their method proved that "Power hath not half the might of gentleness," for by their beautiful spirit and quiet suffering, the public at last demanded that persecution should cease.

George Fox said he saw the infinite love of God, and this led him to recognize the common brotherhood, and to do good to all men.

He considered woman as man's equal, and to establish her equality he gave her her full half of the meeting house.

That honesty and truthfulness might be made easy, Friends advocated simplicity of life in every thing, and protested against extravagance, waste, vanity, idle luxury and change of dress for the sake of fashion.

The colony established by Wm. Penn was noted for its friendship with the Indians, and its temperance and anti-war spirit, causes which still need to be agitated.

It was the advice of General Grant to the friends of Peace, that if they would succeed in the great cause of Arbitration, they must persist in keeping the subject before the people.

As true patriots, Friends effectively served their country by denouncing all destructive evils, and by keeping before the people uplifting and inspiring ideas.

Instead of calling guns, swords, forts, battleships and armies the National Powers, they put far beyond these the power of right thoughts, high ideals, holy visions, righteous principles and burning aspirations, which come direct from the Divine source.

These make the true manhood and womanhood, and as is the individual so the nation.

The abolition of slavery was a grand illustration of their power. To make their work effective they must have clean hands, and first get aid of the evil among themselves.

This was a long, hard struggle. Many were blinded to the wrong, or knew not how to avoid it. It seemed a necessity, yet it was sin, and sin is never a necessity.

In 1688 Friends of Germantown, Pa., sent out the first protest ever made by any Christian church against the sin of slavery, and a copy of this protest may be seen hanging in the Friends' Free Library at that place.

Although agitation had begun, there were no practical results until John Woolman's day, when he visited Friends in New England, Pennsylvania and through the South. Such a deep impression was made by this visit that many voluntarily accepted his views, and took measures to liberate their slaves.

In 1784, after years of advice and entreaty, the Yearly Meeting directed that members holding slaves should be disowned. Still labor was extended, and it was not until 1818, thirty-four years later, that the Yearly Meeting was able to make the record:

"None held as slaves."

It was through the friendship of Benjamin Lundy, a pupil of John Woolman's, that Wm. Loyd Garrison became interested in this cause; who is honored by the nation for his efficient labors against slavery, as is also our beloved poet, John G. Whittier, whose stirring appeal—"Young man, espouse some righteous, unpopular cause early in life"—will never lose its significance.

The triumph of principle is again seen at the time of the Rebellion—not one Friend, who steadfastly refused to take up arms, lost his life by violence, though orders were repeatedly given to shoot them down, and they were placed in the front of battle.

Their protection was a marvel to their enemies.

Stephen Grellet and Wm. Allen influenced Alexander I., of Russia, to take steps for the abolition of serfs, which was peacefully accomplished in the reign of Alexander II.

Frenchmen who were in America during the Revolutionary War, became interested in the views of Friends, and carried their sentiments home with them. To one of these statesmen can be traced the Proclamation of Emancipation in Hayti; also the labors of Thomas Clarkson for suffering humanity, were largely due to the influence of Friends.

The lessons of instruction from these earnest lives will never grow out of place or out of date. We may take the example of John Woolman, when by frugality and industry he became a prosperous merchant, with increasing business. He was deeply concerned lest it absorb his time and attention to the neglect of religious duties. He advised his customers to purchase elsewhere. Still not satisfied, he gave up his store and resumed his former occupation of tailoring, having a care that nothing might hinder his steadfast attention to the voice of the true Shepherd, esteeming humility, with the blessing of the Lord, great gain.

His spiritual insight placed him in advance of his generation; and seeing the prevailing thoughts and customs were not in harmony with religion, he was influenced to devote his whole life to bettering the moral condition of the people. Like Thomas Ellwood "he cared not what cost he was at to do good."

There was as great need of reform on the labor question then, as to-day, and he was a champion for labor's rights. His nature was so sensitive to the impoverished condition of the toiler, that he chose his frugal life, and wore the plainest white clothing. He discarded colors as a result of slave labor and a device for hiding dirt.

Being liberated by home Friends to visit in England, he took steerage passage to avoid appearance of luxury and needless extravagance.

Arriving at London Yearly Meeting, his dress did not make a favorable impression with the mere aristocratic, and he was advised to return home. He was distressed and sought counsel of the Lord. When he arose to speak, such was the sweetness of his spirit and the power accompanying it, there was no more opposition, and he was heartily welcomed. He wrote on various questions of reform: The Indian, Slavery, Temperance, and Total Abstinence, and often pleaded for kinder treatment of the dumb and defenseless animals. When actively engaged in business he gave much time to spiritual meditation. This valuable life closed in England at the age of fifty-two. The secret of his wonderful power was his close walk with God.

Says the Presbyterian: "We need to return to the old-fashioned virtue of silent communion with the living heart of the Saviour, and wait for the illumination of the Holy Spirit, which reveals to man wondrous truths in the kingdom of God, and the plain pathway unto eternal life."

"Oh, spirit of that early day,
So pure and strong and true,
Be with us in the narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew.
Give strength the evil to forsake,
The cross of Truth to bear;
And love and reverent fear to make
Our daily lives a prayer."

TRAINING THE COLT.—I had overheard a conversation between Karl and his mother. She had work for him to do, which interfered with some of his plans for enjoyment, and though Karl obeyed her, it was not without a good deal of grumbling. He had much to say about never being allowed to do as he pleased, and that it would be time enough for him to settle down to work when he was older. While the sense of injury was strong upon him I came out on the piazza beside him and said, "Karl, why do you try to break that colt of yours?"

The boy looked up in surprise, "Why, I want him to be good for something."

"But he likes his own way," I objected. "Why shouldn't he have it?"

By this time Karl was staring at me in perplexity. "I'd like to know the good of a horse that always has his own way!" he said, as if rather indignant at my lack of common sense.

"And as for working," I went on, "I should think there was time enough for that when he gets to be an old horse." "Why, don't you see if he doesn't learn when he's a colt—" Karl began. Then he stopped, blushed and looked at me rather appealingly. I heard no more complaints from him that day.—Church Record.

WHAT MAKES A GOOD FRIEND.—I have often thought that you will never grow strong in the Truth nor teach the principles thereof one to another, until you be obedient thereunto in your own hearts, and act and behave in all things according to the pure witness thereof in your ownselves. This makes living, sound, steady members, zealous, both of love and good works, in themselves, and amongst their brethren and sisters."—John Churchman.

PALESTINE.

J. G. WHITTIER, 1837.

Blest land of Judea! thrice hallowed of song,
Where the holiest of memories pilgrim-like throng;
In the shade of thy palms, by the shores of thy sea,
On the hills of thy beauty my heart is with thee.

With the eye of a spirit I look on that shore
Where pilgrim and prophet have lingered before;
With the glide of a spirit I traverse the sod
Made bright by the steps of the angels of God.

Blue sea of the hills! in my spirit I hear
Thy waters, Genneseret, chime on my ear,
Where the Lowly and Just with the people sat down,
And thy spray on the dust of his sandals was thrown.

Beyond are Bethulia's mountains of green,
And the desolate hills of the wild Gadarene;
And I pause on the goat-crags of Tabor to see
The gleam of thy waters, O dark Galilee!

Hark! A sound in the valley, where swollen and strong,
Thy river, O Kishon, is sweeping along;
Where the Canaanite strove with Jehovah in vain,
And thy torrent grew dark with the blood of the slain.

There down from his mountains stern Zebulon came.
And Naphthalia's stag, with eyeballs of flame,
And the chariots of Jabin rolled harmlessly on,
For the arm of the Lord was Abinoam's son!

There sleep the still rocks and the caverns which rang
To the song which the beautiful prophetess sang,
When the princes of Issachar stood by her side,
And the shout of a host in its triumph replied.

Lo, Bethlehem's hill-side before me is seen,
With the mountains around, and the valleys between;
There rested the Shepherds of Judah, and there
The song of the angels rose soft on the air.

And Bethany's palm-trees in beauty still throw
Their shadows at noon on the ruins below;
But where are the sisters who hasten to greet
The lowly Redeemer, and sit at his feet?

I tread where the twelve in their wayfaring trod,
I stand where they stood with the chosen of God—
Where his blessings were heard and his lessons were taught,
Where the blind were restored and the healing was wrought.

Oh here with his flock the sad Wanderer came;
These hills He toiled over in grief are the same;
The founts where He drank by the wayside still flow,
And the same airs are blowing which breathed on his brow!

Enthroned on her hills sits Jerusalem yet,
But with dust on her forehead, and chains on her feet;
For the crown of her pride to the mocker hath gone,
And the holy Shechinah is dark where it shone.

But wherefore this dream of the earthly abode
Of humanity clothed in the brightness of God?
Were my spirit but turned from the outward and dim,
It could gaze even now, on the presence of Him!

Not in clouds and in terrors, but gentle as when
In love and in meekness, He moved among men;
And the voice which breathed peace to the waves of the sea
In the hush of my spirit would whisper to me!

And what if my feet may not tread where He stood,
Nor my ears hear the dashing of Galilee's flood,
Nor my eyes see the cross which He bowed Him to bear,
Nor my knees press Gethsemane's garden of prayer,

Yet, Loved of the Father, thy Spirit is near
To the meek, and the lowly, and penitent here;
And the voice of Thy love is the same even now
As at Bethany's tomb or on Olivet's brow.

Oh, the outward hath gone! but in glory an power,
The spirit surviveth the things of an hour;
Unchanged, undecaying its Pentecost flame
On the heart's secret altar is burning the same!

Reminiscences of the Life of William and Debb Dewees.

PIONEER LIFE IN THE EARLY SETTLEMENT OF OHIO.

Gather up "the fragments that nothing be lost."

Although there are now but few on the stag of action that knew my parents when in t meridian of life, they being the children of la century, yet it has occurred to my mind th some of the present generation in whose vei flow kindred blood, as well as others, maki profession of the same religious faith, may ta an interest in being informed of the trials which they were subjected through the pa way of this life. Let me here say to t critic that my hope is that he or she m make due allowance for imperfections, as am not in possession of any other knowlec than my own memory has furnished by list ing to their instructive conversation in my venile years. Since the year 1836 my o knowledge is depended upon. It is now nea fifty years since my father died—the third a century since my mother filled a Christi grave. It may now suit my convenience leave my mother, save an incidental ment ing, until I have followed my father to his resting-place.

He had not the privileges of a birth-right m bership in the Society of Friends, and as his birth-place I am not sure, but thin most likely to have been in the city of Ph delphia, as he used to relate that his fa had the trade of shoe-making and worke that business in that city; and when the ye fever broke out there early in the year 1790, the family compact of Cornelius Sarah Dewees, was broken up, never mor be united. The mother and children fle the country and sought homes as best could, the devoted father remaining in the one of a select guard to care for the sick dying and the dead. He being a strong, absolute man, continued to go the rounds assi him after all his co-workers were dead o abled. When this scourge was past, my f had found a home with a family of Friends ing the name of Stephen and Charity who so much desired to keep him that importunity prevailed, he being then near years of age. Here, it is presumed, he h good home; but, according to the custo the times, received many a birching ove leather breeches.

At a period in my father's early manho became convinced of the principles of th ciety of Friends, and sued for membersh cannot tell when, but it was doubtless pr his marriage to Debby Hoopes, of Birmin Pa., for I remember to have seen their riage certificate, which probably bore th of Tenth Month, 1810.

Whether any instrumental means were in the conversion of my father to Quak or true Christianity, is not now known writer. Be that as it may, the work wa and well done. Perhaps none had clearer on the various difficulties through whic Society passed during his activity in the of the church. After marriage, the chi on of my parents may be comprehended this one heading, viz : They followed ndry ; and, being unitedly anxious to have and property of their own, in 1815, my and James Davis, his brother-in-law, set horse-back from Birmingham, Pa., and in Belmont County, Ohio, slightly im- land, on which my father decided to in the near future. On returning and ning my mother, she felt that it would be t trial to go to the back-woods and leave ed and feeble parents, and proposed that defer migrating one year, which was sced in. Ere that period of time had , both her parents were dead, and she o relate that she then felt a freedom to the new country, and the journey was med without any serious happening. my parents found it necessary to use all conomy that they were capable of. A neep were procured, as soon as possible, ed for a small crop of flax ; and the writer emembers the flax break, the switching and kibe, and the handcards with which ool was formed into hats or rolls for spin- and the greater and lesser wheel seem t to loom up in my view as seen three- and ten years ago, with mother at one nd sister at the other, drawing out the woolen fibre. Soon after my parents lightly fixed in their new home, my father back, I think, into Centre County, Pa., ssisted his elder and only brother in mov- is family to the same part of Belmont y, Ohio. My traditional knowledge doesn't me to a certainty whether my father d the mountains any more for several though he travelled frequently abroad as ny to ministers going out, as well as those g into the limits of his home meetings. of these services my parents were com- y united, though their sphere of action fferent. He was called to go from home, ich service my mother used cheerfully to He would have his reward ;" and she as elieved that there was a reward in store ose that stayed by the stuff.

the beginning of the year 1836 my pa- had a family of seven children. Their -room was limited and of primitive archi- re—made with logs and poles, and they anxious to provide necessary comforts ieir growing family, conceived the idea tivating a crop of tobacco. That season was procured, plants brought forward, usiness in general going on to satisfaction, a strange disorder appeared among the en. The doctor was called. He, too, stonished, never having met with such a e. He knew not what to call it or do for t, on consulting his medical works, con- l it must be scarlet fever and putrid sore , and treated it according to rules laid in his medical works. In a few days a sing lad of thirteen years died, and in days after another equally loved boy of ummers was taken from the family group. ent was made in the little cemetery on le hill of the little creek that went bab- by, having the name the Red men gave from which the meeting of Friends took me ; as the writer remembers hearing erk read from his elevated stand more three-score years since. "At Captina ative meeting of Friends." . . .

The heart-stricken and care-worn parents still had much to do in caring for their afflicted family, some of whom seemed for a time unlikely to rally from the shock, and one carried on her person marks of the dire disease to the end of her days. By the time this scourge was past, my father and mother realized that no tobacco was harvested, and other farm crops were necessarily neglected, and their annual income would fall far short of their outlay, and were led to reflect that if in the early part of the season their efforts had been directed to bringing forward cereals they might have had enough. But, as tobacco would not of itself support life in man or beast, they were exceedingly ashamed, and covenanted that if God would forgive them, never a plant of it should be cultivated on soil over which they had control. This covenant they firmly kept, nor would they encourage their children in helping others to cultivate or save a crop of tobacco. In rehearsing these things I am induced to believe that my father and mother may justly be considered among the first members of the Society of Friends to bear a clear and decisive testimony against the fashionable use of tobacco. And it is highly probable that it is due to their watchful care, that none of their four sons, that lived to middle age, used the article.

The abatement of scarlet fever in the family of William and Debby Dewees was but a temporary relief from affliction ; if not in their own household they shared it in sympathy with their personal friends. For not many months after a malignant fever entered the home of a near neighbor, who had several children, living near by, each feeling in duty bound to assist in the care of their afflicted parents and their household. So contagious was this fever that it seemed to follow each member of the family to their own homes and there abide until each member of the family became its victim. The writer well remembers the widows and children of three brothers that died near the same time with that dire disease, and though more than three-score years and ten have passed away, that period of time is not unfrequently spoken of as the season of the Edgerton sickness. Tradition has told me that in all this, my father, though a feeble man, was ever diligent in going from place to place, often accompanied by his eldest daughter, relieving, as far as it was in their power, the sufferings of their sick and dying friends. My mother, true to her motto, "remaining by the stuff."

"Faith" versus "Belief."—Belief will not save any one. The Scripture saith that the devils believe and tremble. What we need is a living faith and that is from within, not the outward hearing or believing, for faith is something more, it is knowing. Belief takes for granted and accepts what it hears, if the authority is supposed to be correct. Faith has the knowledge within itself to correct a misstatement, viz: "It is God's judgment given to those who strive to enter in at the straight gate, and therefore it is righteous judgment" and not "from the outward appearance." He requires an entire surrender of ourselves (the only thing we have to give, then "He is faithful, to give us himself, in place of the selfish nature," and if we look to and depend upon Him, all our needs will be supplied while our wants will disappear. But we cannot find Him, "Except our inward ear be opened." Hear, and thy soul shall live," is from within, and therefore is living faith."

A letter recently received from F. Leonhardt, interpreter and correspondent for the Doukhobortsi, gives the following information of their condition on a late visit among their villages : There is a little fever among the Cyprus and Stony Creek villages. Many complain of the neighboring ranchers allowing their cattle to run and feed upon the Doukhobors' hay. They have fenced it in several times, but before morning the fences were all down. A scarcity of teams is spoken of, and lack of means to procure warm clothing. F. Leonhardt writes of having lodged with one of their aged men who had been reported among the sick and afflicted, but on this occasion seemed bright and happy throughout the evening. Alluding to the provisions in that particular village, he saw potatoes, cabbage and onions, as well as cracked wheat, from which they prepared a sort of porridge for supper, and a good soup containing all of the above vegetables. They have planted onions in boxes, and use the green sprouts in their soup, which, together with corn mush, they have daily. This is the best bill of fare of any village that has come to our knowledge ; and it is not supposed that the villages in general are nearly as well off, as there are accounts of flour of a low grade having been bought on credit at the stores, and the Immigration Commissioner writes that the large Lake of the Woods Flour Mills have shown liberality and leniency. Teams are quite short in places, as also cows. Some condensed milk, however, has been sent by benevolent individuals for the children ; on the whole, there is reason to believe that there is less suffering than might have been feared. Some benevolence has been manifested in furnishing seed, but in no wise adequate to the apprehended need. The testimony of one connected with the railroad work, given in a Canadian paper, is to the import that the Doukhobors who have been employed on that line have done creditably, and have learned English rapidly in the short time that opportunity offered. The Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings has agreed to furnish Commissioner McCreary with $3500 for the purchase of seed rye, oats, flax, barley and potatoes.

Making the Best of Life.—The recent death, in Brussels, of a most remarkable man, is another illustration of the fact that a man can make his life tell for something, no matter how apparently helpless he may be ; and that no one has a right to despair, even when he seems to be most unfortunate. This man, whose name was Charles Francois Felu, had no arms. How then could he cultivate the talent God had given him, for he was one of the most successful copyists of famous paintings. Having no arms he used his feet, holding his palette on his left great toe, and skilfully using the brush with his right foot. He lived to be seventy years of age, and among his works are some fine copies of the best masterpieces. Many of his pictures are owned in America.

THE WORLD'S PERENNIAL HOPE

O golden age, whose light is of the dawn
And not of sunset, forward not behind,
Flood the new heavens and earth, and with thee bring
All the old virtues, whatsoever things,
Are pure and honest and of good repute,
But add thereto whatever bard has sung
Or seer has told of when in trance and dream
They saw the Happy Isles of Prophecy!
Let Justice hold her scale and Truth divide Between the right and wrong; but give the heart
The freedom of its fair inheritance;
Let the poor prisoner, cramped and starved so long,
At nature's table, feast his ear and eye
With joy and wonder; let all harmonies
Of sound, form, color, motion, wait upon
The princely guest, whether in soft attire
Of leisure clad, or the coarse frock of toil,
And lending life to the dead form of faith,
Give human nature reverence for the sake
Of One who bore it, making it divine
With the ineffable tenderness of God.
Let common need, the brotherhood of prayer,
The heirship of an unknown destiny,
The unsolved mystery round about us make
A man more precious than the gold of Ophir,
Sacred, inviolate, unto whom all things
Should minister as outward type and sign
Of the eternal beauty which fulfils
The one great purpose of creation, Love,
The sole necessity of Earth and Heaven!

Mysteries.

A mystery is that which by its effects is known to be, but why or how these effects are produced cannot be comprehended by any faculty of the mind. These are met with in nearly every branch of science and more so by the most profound thinkers who explore each path to its goal. Were the earth girdled eight times around by a perfectly insulated wire, the electric current would traverse the octuple circuit in one second of time. The nature of this current, how or why it does this, no scientist can tell, and many like mysteries are found. But who would refuse to unravel the many marvellous things in science, because one or more paths are inexplicable? By means of the atomic theory, the law of equivalents and the analysis of matter into its elementary substances, many mysteries have been cleared up. To the unfolding mind of each rising generation mysteries will rise and disappear.

If then these mysteries are found in natural science, should it be cause of surprise, or prove a stumbling block to us, because such mysteries shroud at times, spiritural truths? In natural things does not the child learn to have these dissolved and made plain by attentively following his teacher? Now He who framed all material things, and even the subtle mind of man, with its varied powers, gave to man natural powers of mind to investigate all created things and the laws that govern them, but the knowledge of himself, the Creator, He reserved to himself, as the Apostle Paul declares, "the things of God knoweth no man but the spirit of God." But the highest and noblest purpose of God's creatures, man, is that man might know his Maker and glorify and worship Him. In order then, that man may fulfil this purpose, "God gives to every man a manifestation of his spirit to profit withal. It is this spirit of God which alone can lead man into a true and certain knowledge of God. It was the spirit of God who in the prophets of old spake of the things relating to the truth of God and who by his direction wrote what is recorded in the Holy Scriptures. And yet the wise and learned Jews even having these Scriptures and priding themselves on their knowledge of them, failed to comprehend their true meaning or to believe in Him of whom they did testify. Whereat Jesus said, "I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and hath revealed them unto babes; even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." And this revelation of the truth of God was as Christ Jesus told Peter by the revelation of the spirit of God. If then, this Holy Spirit is "to lead into all truth" no other leader can be found. Nor can any find the Truth any other way but by the revelation of God's spirit.

The true and saving knowledge of God and of Christ must ever remain a hidden mystery to the natural mind of man, but when man humbly turns from self and comes to that of God which though in man is not of man, he comes to that spirit of God "which searches all things, even the deep things of God." He must become as a little child willing to be taught, led and guided by this Spirit. It is the spirit of grace, given to man, through Christ, as a gift to enable him to draw nigh to God.

What could a pupil know of the higher mathematics if he had not mastered the rudiments? What can the man new-born of the spirit know if he learn not the lessons though simple which that Divine teacher gives?

There are deep mysteries of Divine truth which in time may never be unfolded; but aside from these are truths enough sublime to dwell and meditate upon, even though Methusaleh's life were ours.

> "When I stand with Christ in glory,
> Looking o'er life's finished story,
> Then, Lord, shall I fully know,
> Not till then, how much I owe."

But "God, who wills not that any should perish, but that all should come to the knowledge of the truth and be saved," gives grace enough to each and all, that through faith therein and obedience all may come to a true knowledge of Him and of his love and mercy extended to all men in his beloved and only begotten Son Jesus Christ, whom He sent into the world that through faith in Him, the world might be saved.

No man, coming in sincerity and with a single eye towards God, can deny the position Paul takes when he says, "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness," but it is not for us to ask why or wherefore were these things so, but rather humbly and confidingly trust in Him in whom we have believed, knowing that, in his own good time, "He will make it plain." In eternity faith shall be turned to sight, and what now we see as through a glass darkly shall be seen in all its beauty and glory.

Let us then unreservedly commit the keeping of our souls into the care of a loving, covenant keeping God, who is merciful, gracious and long suffering to all, especially to those who trust in Him, and commit their way to Him.

Peter the Great and the Quakers.

"It is about two hundred years," says Christian Endeavor World, "since the fam Russian Emperor, Peter the Great, then a yo man of twenty-six, went on a visit to Lon and lived for some time in Buckingham Str As the quiet and respectability of the spot not suit the rather uncivilized czar, who lo drinking and rioting with his boon compani he soon afterwards removed to Deptford, wh in three months he damaged the house to extent of seven hundred and fifty dollars.

"Religion was not Peter's strong point, one would think that the quiet simplicity Quaker service would be the last to att such a man, and yet, curiously enough, du his sojourn at Deptford he used to attend Friends' meeting-house there. The buildin still in use, though it dates from 1692. contains a large room and some smaller ro and has a little graveyard in the rear, approached through the meeting-house, w is closely built on either side.

"Peter retained his respect for the Soc of Friends after he had left England. Acc ing to the Journal of Thomas Story, it app that, when in Germany in 1712, the Emp found his troops occupying a Quakers' meet house in Frederikstadt, and at once ord them to vacate it. He then made it kn that if the Friends resident in the town w assemble for a meeting, he would atten This meeting took place, and the emperor, the benefit of his generals, translated what said by the German Quakers, and added his commendations.

"It is not customary for Friends to che relics of the dead or the distinguished ar their own people; but they preserve, in old Deptford meeting-house, a plain wo bench, which is said to be the actual seat he used to occupy when at the service."

All familiar with the history of Friends the journals of their ministers, will recal counts of their interviews at various t with the czars of all the Russias, and their fidence that behind the grim absolutism of Russian government there was hidden s where the devoutness of a tender Chri heart. It may be that the voice for p from a Russian autocrat is an echo from quiet testimonies of these godly, gracious worldly men, who having nothing to ask nothing to fear or lose, dared to treat and emperors and kings and princes as and tell them truths which they would n hear from the lips of parasites and court —*H. ministering Friend, of Philadelphia, related following: "I was once in company with a per of persons on business of a benevolent acter. After we had finished what was before ne of the company introduced the subject usic, and expatiated largely upon its good t, both upon the body and mind of those cultivated a taste for it. It was evidently ntention to draw me out, or to reproach Society for our opposition to this way of ding time. The rest of the company, with xception of an aged Presbyterian, joined th the first speaker. Finding that he took art in the conversation, he was at length edly appealed to, to know what he thought usic and its effects.

Items Concerning the Society.

appointed meeting held at Arch St. meeting-on First-day last was attended by an unex-ly large number, coming from within a ra-f thirty miles, and nearly filling the floor. ng of ancient goodness overspread the meet-lemnizing it under the many living truths l forth. The testimony seemed clear that the ling of the walls of our Zion, as when Nehe-ebuilt those of Jerusalem, must be upon the t foundation.

The power of the devotees of war to bring even the disciples of peace under tribute was well shown a few months ago, when a bequest amounting to one hundred thousand dollars from John G. Lane to New York Yearly Meeting, for educational purposes, was found to be liable to the ten per cent. war tax of the United States government. Ten thousand dollars of Quaker money forcibly taken for purposes conscientiously objected to by Friends is only one of the many unfair actions of present day militarism.—Australian Friend.

In Iowa Yearly Meeting of the "Friends' Church," the salaries paid to pastors during the last twelve months for which figures are available, aggregated £3,080 [about $15,000]. The expenditure for all other church purposes, including foreign missions, evangelistic work, building and repairing places of worship, was reported to be £1,458. As there are about 2,255 families in the Yearly Meeting, the average contribution per household was one pound seven shillings three pence for the pastor as compared with thirteen shillings for other religious purposes.—Australian Friend.

The Interchange reports that according to the answers to the questions which Mary Mendenhall Hobbs sent out to members of various Yearly Meetings, the present tendency is toward a lessening of the ministry of women. The only exception to this in the answers received by her was from Baltimore Yearly Meeting. The general feeling of her correspondents seemed to be that the introduction of the pastoral system is largely responsible for this decline, for although there are women who are pastors, yet the general feeling in many parts is not favorable to them in this capacity. One of her correspondents added that the substitution in many places of lectures and prepared sermons, instead of the prophetical utterances that we used to have, has also discouraged women from the exercise of the gift. The author felt that the fact that so many in the congregation wait on the ministers instead of on the Lord, was also somewhat to blame.

The second number of the Havana "Friend" (El Amigo), appears in an enlarged form. Its scope may be gathered from its descriptive words: "A Religious, Anti-sacerdotal, Political, Literary and Miscellaneous Journal. Devoted to the defense of liberty of conscience, and the doctrines of the Christian religion without distinction of denominations or sects."

To this it may be added that a prominent member of a large American fruit concern, having one hundred thousand acres of land near Santiago, has been urging upon Friends to establish a meeting and location for religious labor there. He has sent a check for one thousand dollars, which is held in trust in Baltimore towards starting such an effort. Though himself a Methodist, he believes, by what he has seen in Jamaica, that Friends are the only people for such a service among those neglected islanders.

Notes from Others.

John Ruskin's life illustrated the absolute sincerity of his conviction. He gave all his powers of brain and purse to the service of his fellows. Beginning by tithing his wealth and then halving it, he ended finally by giving it all away in an almost unparalleled act of renunciation in our modern world, reserving for himself simply the modest competence of $1,500 a year for old age.

An exchange says that alcohol will remove grass stains from summer clothes. The exchange is right. It will also remove the summer clothes, and also the spring and autumn and winter clothes, not only from the one who drinks it, but also from his wife and family. It will likewise remove the household furniture from the house, the eatables from the pantry, and the smiles from the face of his wife, and the happiness from the home. As a remover of things alcohol has few equals.—United Christian.

Bull fights seem to have been generally suppressed in our new Spanish islands, but officers of our American army and navy at Havana have themselves arranged Sunday horse-races.—Twentieth Century.

As a companion to this we give the following extract from a speech of President Schurman, chief of our government's commission to the Philippines:

"We suppressed the cock-fight there, and permitted the taverns to flourish. One emphasized the Filipino frailty, and the other the American vice. I suppose wherever there are sixty-five thousand Anglo-Saxons there will always be some drunkards, and it seems difficult to prevent it. But it was unfortunate that we introduced and established the saloon there, to corrupt the natives, and to exhibit to them the vice of our race. I have never seen a Filipino drunkard."

The Indian has been starved and overpowered till he is almost exterminated.

The African was made the white man's slave, but he continues.

The Crusades lavished the lives and wealth of Europe to snatch the Holy City from the Moslems. But the Turk still guards the city and keeps peace between rival Christian sects in the church of the Holy Sepulchre.

History asks what real progress have these wars produced except in material gain.

Correspondence.

"I would urge that we shall not allow our devotion to the record of revelation in the past to serve as a pretext for present quenching of the Spirit, and for intimating that it is possible to be too spiritual in the development of heavenly truth."

"Rant and cant I hold to be the mental Scylla and Charybdis of our day. I seem to find the professed followers of Fox with perhaps the generality of the sects, vibrating between "the anarchy of the ranter" and the lethargy of the canter.

"No literal rule nor collection of rules will suffice to serve as mediator between the opposing tendencies."

"The Bible is indeed a copious prescription book for the inveterate malady of our race. But it is a prescription book for the world and for the infantile neophyte [more] than for the experienced believer. In his hands it is rather a Dispensary for the due equipment of 'the man of God' (2 Tim. iii: 17), in his witnessing to the faith which is ever in increasing measure delivered to the saints.'"

The recent remarks in The Friend regarding legible handwriting I much approved of, as the same subject had been distinctly before my mind within a week, and, had I been a better example in that regard, might have prepared a few lines. I have not unfrequently punished myself, as it were, for lack of care, by destroying and re-writing postals or letter pages. A letter of Anthony Benezet's, which I possess, bearing date 1773, would, I think, if reproduced, serve as a nice model of clear handwriting, indited by a man who was careful as to his thought and walk. SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

United States.—President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, of the University of California, in an address to the Monticello Club, gave the details of the negotiations which Secretary of the State Hay has had under way for some time relative to the Chinese "open door." President Wheeler learned the negotiations while in conversation with Secretary Hay during his recent visit to Washington. President Wheeler said: "In the course of the week Secretary of State Hay will announce to the people a victory not of war—call it diplomacy, if you please—in that the ports of China will be opened to the commerce of the world. He has reached an understanding with Great Britain, France, Russia and Germany which does away with territorial spheres of influence.

"According to the terms of the agreement there will be no longer any spheres of influence in the Flowery Kingdom, Customs tariffs will be abolished as well as other imports upon shipping. The idea is to make the ports free to the world's commerce and give all nations a free hand in exporting their markets. It is the consummation of British idea of the 'open door' which found so strong an advocate in Lord Beresford."

A bill introduced in Congress authorizes the President to invite countries on the American continent to meet in Washington for the consideration of international boundary disputes.

The ratifications of the Samoan arbitration treaty were exchanged at the State Department at Washington on the 7th inst., afternoon by Secretary Hay, for the United States, Lord Pauncefote, for Great Britain, and Dr. von Holleben, for Germany. The treaty submits the claims to the arbitration of King Oscar of Sweden.

Reports of Indian agents show that the entire Indian population is 297,905, of which number 95,679 wear citizens' dress, while 31,923 wear a mixture of Indian and civilized clothing. Those who can read number 42,597. There are 31,655 Indian church members, and 348 church buildings upon the various reservations.

"The Grain Trade of the United States" is the title of a monograph just published by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics as the first of a series of studies upon the production and transportation of the great staples, and upon the internal commerce of the country. The present article points out the immense increase in the agricultural production of the country, the rapid and continuous westward shifting of the area of cultivation and the changes in the routes by which Western grain reached the Eastern consumers and the European markets.

The Third Month report of the situation of the Department of Agriculture will show the amount of wheat remaining in farmers' hands on Third Month 1st to have been about 158,700,000 bushels, or 29 per cent. of last year's crop, as compared with 198,000,000 bushels, or 29.3 per ct. of the crop of 1898, on hand on Third Mo.1, 1899. The corn in farmers' hands is estimated at 773,700,000 bushels, or 37.2 per cent. of last year's crop, against 800,500,000 bushels, or 41.6 per cent. of the crop of 1898, on hand on Third Month 1, 1899. The proportion of the total crop of last year shipped out of the country where grown is estimated at 16.8 per cent., or about 348,000,000 bushels. The proportion of the total crop of last year that was of a merchantable standard is estimated at 86.9 per cent.

Of oats there are reported to be about 290,900,000 bushels, or 36.5 per cent. of last year's crop, still in farmers' hands, as compared with 283,000,000 bushels, or 38.7 per cent. of the crop of 1898, on hand on Third Month 1, 1899.

During the last year 25,202,907 bushels of grain and 2,198,513 gallons of molasses were used for the manufacture of liquor in this country, which produced 107,618,-120 gallons of spirits and 1,657,808 gallons of rum, making a total of 109,275,928. This is about one gallon and a half to every man, woman and child in the country.

It is interesting to see just how rapidly emigration to this country has fallen off. In 1881 there were 220,900 emigrants from Germany; in 1887 there were 104,780; in 1891, 120,090; in 1895, 37,490; in 1896, 33,820; in 1897, 24,630, and last year, 20,960.

The cost of the war with Spain is estimated at $259,-341,299; that of the war in the Philippines for 1899 and 1900 at $165,503,201. The war in the Philippines is not yet over, and for years to come the naval and military expenses of the nation will be "expanded" with the expansion of the nation. The commercial returns to the truats that will take possession of the Philippines as soon as they find it safe to do so will have to be large if they are to offset the cost to the people of the acquisition of these distant islands.

Arrangements are being made to forward 500 tons of food supplies to the destitute people in the interior at Puerto Rico. The supplies will be shipped on the transport Kilpatrick.

The peanut crop of 1899 is nearly 100,000,000 bushels heavier than the crop of 1898.

The estimate is that Colorado, next year, will produce between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 in gold.

In the number of locomotives the United States comes first, with a total of 36,746. Great Britain comes next, with 19,602.

Representative Alfred C. Harmer, a member of Congress from this city since 1871, with the exception of a single term, died on the 6th inst., in his seventy-fifth year.

Harland Whittaker, of Butler county, Kentucky, was held without bail at Frankfort, on the 6th inst., on a charge of assassination of Governor Goebel. The case will be presented to the Fourth Month Grand Jury.

At the Red Ash Mine, in the New River region, West Virginia, on the 6th inst., an explosion near the entrance resulted in the entombing of forty-nine miners. Forty-seven bodies have been recovered and a large rescuing party is at work. The cause of the explosion is believed to have been fire-damp.

There were 511 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 85 less than the previous week and 9 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 252 were males and 259 females: 84 died of pneumonia; 45 of consumption; 41 of heart diseases; 21 of apoplexy; 21 of convulsions; 20 of diphtheria; 18 of cancer; 18 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of inaoition; 14 of marasmus; 14 of nephritis; 13 of paralysis; 12 of bronchitis; 12 from casualties; 10 of typhoid fever; 10 of debility; 10 of measles; 9 of Bright's disease; 9 of uræmia and 5 of influenza.

FOREIGN—Lord Robert's force advanced early on the morning of the 7th inst. from Osfontein. General French turned the southern part of the position of the Boers, who fled incontinently, leaving a gun, immense quantities of forage and their tents. He is now in pursuit. The Boers on the north bank are also evacuating the position. Lord Roberts reports to the British war office that he attacked the Boer army near Driefontein, in the Free State, on the 10th, and a fierce fight ensued, in which the burgher forces were defeated. More than 100 Boer dead were left on the field, and the list of British casualities includes several officers of distinction. The British reported casualties in South Africa to Third Month 12th, are as follows: Killed, 2418: wounded, 8747: died of disease, 1029: missing, 3483: total, 15,677.

General Gatacre entered Stormberg unopposed on the Fifth. The Boers destroyed the railway approach, but the station is intact.

Lord Salisbury has been offered peace proposals on the basis of independence for the South African republics, and the foreign Consuls at Pretoria have been requested to invite intervention of the Powers to prevent further bloodshed. The British Government is not prepared to grant independence to the Boer Republics.

It is said that England's war loan of $150,000,000, at 2½ per cent., has been subscribed in London twenty times over, with most of the financial world yet to be heard from.

The Boers are said to owe the Transvaal mines over £2,-000,000 already.

Gold production in the Transvaal is only one-eighth what it was a year ago.

The fourth death from the bubonic plague occurred at Sydney, New South Wales. Three fresh cases were officially reported on the 11th inst.

Numerous factories in Germany are shutting down for the want of coal. Russia is in the same plight and has removed a tariff on coal, while the price of naphtha has increased 400 per cent. The coal famine in Russia is so serious that the Minister of Finance has persuaded the Emperor to permit foreign coal to be imported free of duty for the use of the railroads.

Of the 34,000,000 people in South America, it is estimated that 30,000,000 have never seen a Bible.

The bubonic plague has made its appearance in Buenos Ayres.

Incendiarism is rampant in Barbadoes, Jamaica. Within four weeks sixty sugar estates have been set on fire by negroes. The negroes are said to be starving and lawless.

The customs receipts from all sources in Cuba during First Month were $1,511,094.

Out of 1,548,654 votes polled in the recent election in Mexico, only 92,172 were against Diaz.

A new directory of Toronto placee the populati that city at 250,000.

Thirty-six foreign vessels, having an aggregate ton of 57,556, met with disaster in American waters year.

The amount of gold coin in actual circulation i world is estimated by the Bank of England officiale about 865 tons.

AR may be as great an evil as the advo- of peace under all circumstances declare be. But the only apparent way to avert to bring every country on the globe be- the sway of a single despotic central nment.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

e agree with the Bulletin in this view, pro- we agree that the "single, despotic (that solute) central government" is the Prince ace himself, spiritually ruling in the hearts en. Thus "nations shall learn war no " (Isaiah ii: 4), and "Of the increase of overnment and peace there shall be no (ix: 4). "The Lamb of God," as fast as takes away the sin of the world," will be g away war as its most awful development. Lamb of God shall overcome" the powers e beast, "for he is Lord of lords and King ngs, and they that are with Him,—called, hosen, and faithful" (Rev. ix: 17). Every omer of a hostile spirit or impatient ht towards another is to that extent an in forwarding the peaceable reign of single, absolute, central government, of t crucified, the "wisdom of God and the r of God."

R HIDDEN WORKERS.—It is little under- how much unhired work is silently ex- d in conducting the affairs of Truth in eligious Society, whether at the hands of diligently engaged in their other business, those who have gone out of business the usefully to serve the cause for which we . This can be said also of much of the aried portion of church-workers in other ominations, as well as of many of our mem younger and older, working for the wel- of their fellow-beings in ways entirely un- ician. We not unfrequently see a Friend re from business," only to find about all vailable time devoted to the services of ociety in various ways. We adapt lan- quoted from the Missionary Review to tuation of many workers among us:

"These men devote much time and labor to the affairs of the Society, leaving their own work, often at great inconvenience, to attend designated meetings and to toil on committees —earnestly, prayerfully, considering the things which pertain to this sacred cause. Yet they receive no compensation whatever, but solely out of disinterested love, they give the church the benefit of their ripe experience and business capacity. You would have to pay a good round sum to command their services for any other cause, if, indeed, you could command them at all. One of them is reported to have said: 'I could not be hired to do this work for five thousand dollars a year; but I will do it gratuitously for the sake of Christ and my brethren.' The church owes to such men a large debt of gratitude. Let them be slow to criticise and quick to praise. Whatever their shortcomings, these men are unselfishly and self-sacrificingly administering the great trust which has been committed to them, and though they may make an occasional mistake, their loyalty, devotion and intelligence are a reasonable guarantee that they will wisely serve the cause which is as dear to them as it is to others."

Vacant Lots.

Probably many have noticed the large possibilities of food-supply which have been going to waste in the vacant lots in our cities. These lose nothing in value while being loaned to the poor to cultivate them until the owners are ready to occupy them with buildings. For the past three summers the Vacant Lots Cultivation Association of Philadelphia has secured the use of many of these lots, now amounting to 72 acres,—plowed and harrowed them, divided them into quarter-acre gardens, and assigned them to applicants, representing last year 249 families, composed of 1495 persons. The yield from all these miniature farms last season amounted to $14,511, or nearly sixty dollars to a family. This harvest for the poor cost the Association about one-sixth that amount, or $2,650. The products raised were white potatoes ($3,864), sweet potatoes ($196), cabbage ($2,895), turnips ($1744), tomatoes ($4263), besides corn, celery, beans, and a variety of other vegetables.

Their report, which has just come to hand, remarks that "the fact that one wants a garden is proof that he needs it and is willing to work. This charity is designed to encourage the work-habit among the destitute. It takes the place in a way, of the agricultural training-school, in which those most in need of instruction are taught farming in the most practical way, at a very slight cost to the community. It opens up to those most in need of fresh air, change of scene and release from care, a health resort, where all these blessings are found, coupled with pleasant remunerative work, developing strength of body and mind."

The work has had a marked effect upon many of the gardeners from a moral standpoint,—turning one man, whose case is described, from drunken to sober and industrious habits. "Our industrial system is crowding out the old and weak. To those unfortunate classes who can find no place in the regular system even in prosperous times, vacant lot farming affords relief on honorable terms."

Those who are interested in helping the needy to help themselves may relieve a sense of duty through the Treasurer of the Association, N. B. Crenshaw, at Broad and Chestnut Streets.

Also all, "without money and without price," are invited to cultivate their vacant lots of time. Of this kind, an unimproved unspiritual silent meeting is one of the saddest of vacant lots,—to be surpassed in desolateness only by a "service" full of stated vocal exercises uncalled for by the Spirit.

The Nerves Mistaken for the Spirit.

In recent medical reports on the action of music in diseases, its field of operation is limited solely to the nervous system.

Accordingly the working of music is physiological, sensuous, and so emotional, rather than spiritual. "Every soldier," says the physician quoted, "will testify to the inspiring influence of music in war. This, scientifically considered, means simply that sound-vibrations act directly upon the nerves."

And now another article recently published commends the burning of incense in worship on the same principle. "Under the power of an eight-foot organ pipe," the writer says, "many a man has mistaken the shaking of his diaphram for the trembling of his soul." And he commends the deceit. And he is consistent enough when he says, "If we drop incense because of its vague sensuous influence, we must also abolish music for the same reason." "Music comes next to odors in the power of emotional association and reminiscence." "Incense is as legitimate an aid to devotion as genuflections, pipe-organs, or stained glass windows." "The sense of smell, the most powerful in its effect on the emotions, should not be left out of the ritual, the main purpose of which is to arouse the emotional nature."

We have before contended that all such expedients for worship belong to the same principle, through whatever of the five senses nervous exhilaration or charming may be brought in from the outward. Whereas the Father, on the other hand, seeketh such worship as is "in spirit," not in nerves: "in truth," and not in illusions. His direct grace is sufficient for us, and the waiting on the discoveries of the Spirit of Truth is means of grace enough for the worship which He seeks for and inspires. Carnal stimulations, however refined, are carnal still, and are of that spurious inspiration so easily and so widely mistaken for the genuine quickening of the Holy Spirit. Wine through the mouth, odors in the nostrils; images, light and colors through the eyes, cater to the same emotions as those which music induces through the ears, and are as devotedly used and useable for vice, for wars, for theatres as for churches—a carnality sometimes of lower and sometimes higher refinement.

What we object to is the mistaking of emotions, whether grossly or artistically manufactured, for inspiration. Divine inspiration, will, indeed, bring forth emotions of its own begetting, and let us not be ashamed of any of them. There is ground to fear we are not open enough to emotions of the Spirit's moving. If they are of his putting forth, it is unsafe, it is unhealthy to suppress them, except from extravagance. Let us try the spirits, whether they are of God, or of human machinery or sensation. Let us worship in spirit and in Truth. This demands the silence of all flesh, not its exhilaration, intoxication, or sensuous illusions. Let us be "not drunk with wine, but filled with the Spirit," by receiving and obeying his manifestations.

A Voice Crying in the Wilderness.—Is not the present a moment in which there is a loud call for the re-statement of those spiritual ideas to which John Woolman devoted his life? If we are silent will not the stones cry out, and may we not incur the woe that descends on those who build the tombs of the prophets, yet do not as they taught? . . . Undoubtedly the times are dark. The poets and prophets of the century have departed. Statesmen with lower ideals fill the places but lately occupied by greater men. "Rights are being asserted with a sort of cynical insistence, the rights of the strong, the right of pleasure, the right of credit; selfishness clothes itself with the pomp of militarism, and talks of glory when it thinks of the markets. Ignorance puts on the sacred garments of religion and talks of spiritual things while it fights for material things. A horrible and wonderful thing happens in the land. The soldier is allied with the money-seeker and the priest with the materialist . . amid decimating and inglorious wars, amid civil strife and distress, the God-spirit will again wrestle with the world spirit."*

*Canon Barnett.

It is times like the present which test the spiritual virility of individuals and of denominations.—John S. Rowntree, in The (London) Friend.

Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

Further accounts received from the Doukhobortsi in the Northwest Territory continue to speak of the winter being less severe than usual, or it would have been much harder to obtain supplies. Two hundred men are reported out working on the railroads; health considered fair under the circumstances; some scurvy reported, but many do not consider themselves ill until it develops. Expenditures have been made for rice, oatmeal, condensed milk and some fruit. It is understood that donations of dried fruit are on the way from California, one letter states a carload, also clothing and a contribution of five hundred dollars from a relief committee. There is one woman reported to be in the hospital at Winnipeg, who has had a foot amputated. She has three daughters, the husbands of two of them in exile. Another case is described, in one of the villages, as having very sore feet and suffering all the time, her case being considered hopeless. Other cases of affliction in particular families, as they have become known, have enlisted sympathy from interested individuals, who have contributed to their relief.

The main food is flour of rather a low grade, and as some of their cows (and probably most of them) have become dry, condensed milk and fruit will be particularly acceptable. Whilst there is a great shortness of teams, as also of tools and materials for successful farming and mechanical operations, it is cause for thankfulness that sympathy has been awakened in different parts of the country, and whilst there are great privations yet to be endured, the contributions being made for the necessities of life are certainly ameliorating their condition.

One correspondent writes that "the women are kept busy spinning and knitting up the wool, which they can handle to perfection. There are quite a number, representing different nationalities, but none that can compete with the Doukhobors in manipulating their wool. You have all been very kind in looking after their wants. You have sent them quite a number of spinning wheels, and they all seem to be making good use of them. The Doukhobors spoke to me, asking if I could get some cattle for them to winter, as they had more hay than they required, so I got some for them, on condition that I would be responsible for them, and I was pleased to hear the cattle the Doukhobors got were the best wintered of any around here." J. S. Elkinton.

The genuinely Christian man has no occasion to either explain or apologize for being a Christian. His worthy life is recognized. Christians owe and admire it, and worldlings respect it. He who is "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," commends Christianity. Men know where he stands, and what he stands for. His character carries weight. His sincerity and integrity multiply his influence. His piety calls for imitation.—Presbyterian.

Then and Now.

By Howard A. Kelly, Professor in the Johns Hopk University.

It is now twenty-seven years since I beg my college life, a life which stretched o through eight years of good, hard work, fo at the classics and four at medicine. Duri the college period, and after it, and again, pecially in these latter years as a teacher, I ha always been most profoundly interested as student of human nature and of medicine, trying to find out what ailed the world ab me. Why is it, as I have grown older, I ha come to find out that there is so much mis and unhappiness in the world? Why is it t each successive generation of young men be to run the life race that is set before them, of vigor, of fine enthusiasm, and with a deter nation to accomplish great things, and th one by one, drop back into the same indifferen and the same routine as was done by those w preceded them, the fire and all the enthusia gone, content in the end to make a good liv and to take good care of themselves.

I well recall my own class, as fine a lot fellows as you could wish to see, shouting " forever" daily in the assembly room until were hoarse, and each one certain beyond a adventure that, with our advent into the affa of the world, the golden era was about to da We each knew individually that we oursel were destined to do some great deed, and each looked, too, with secret admiration u his fellows, picturing in our minds the gr future which lay before each one.

A quarter of a century has elapsed, and w is the outcome? Untimely death has clai not a few of the dear boys (boys ever in spit the added years), and those of us who sur have entered upon life's duties, just as fathers did before us; good, faithful work been done, but we have failed to bring al those startling changes which we had fo hoped would make "77" renowned fore and a sad little stone in the old college wall, memorative of ivy day, and a blighted ivy p below it, seem emblematic of our shatt hopes. What is the reason of the failure? was it a failure, after all? Was it then im sible to realize those great aspirations w thrilled us as we entered life's arena? T are the questions to which I will briefly ad myself in this short letter to the college of a younger generation, and in my re shall have to adopt the personal indivi standpoint.

I would say of my own life that I have lost something and I have found something have lost that which I at first esteemed g for I discovered as I went on that it was, all, but a bubble, a glittering semblance jewel, evanescent and temporal. But, wonc to relate, I have found in its place somet infinitely more precious, eternal, a posse which increases in value day by day, lend reality and a value to life in all its rela far beyond all possible anticipation of my years.

Let me look at my life a little more cl What have I actually lost? I think the los be pretty well covered by one word which to figure largely in our college debates chapel speeches, a word which covered th great qualification in a man, which marke out for success, and that word is "ambi

My own daily life (if I may be excused for continuing the personal part of the narrative) is as full as that of any man I know, but I found long since that, as I allowed the pressure of professional and worldly engagements to fill in every moment between rising and going to bed, the spirit would surely starve, so I made a rule, which I have since stuck to in spite of many temptations, not to read anything but my Bible after the evening meal, and never to read any newspapers or any other book than the Bible on First-day. I do not exclude real Bible helps, which always drive one back to the Bible, but I never spend time on simply devotional books. Since making this resolution, God, in his mercy, has shown me that this Book is an inexhaustible storehouse from which He dispenses rich stores of precious truths to his servants, as He pleases and as they are ready to receive them. I have found that faith in Jesus Christ is a wonderful foundation rock, upon which stands a marvelous superstructure. I have found that the Holy Ghost is a real, living, active [Spirit], whom Christians must know personally if they will grow in grace and knowledge.

I see wonderful truths relating to Christ in types and prophecies which I never dreamed of before, and "the blessed hope" has a new meaning. The messages of the epistles I once thought full of hyperbole, now glow with meaning, and so I might go on, and so, doubtless, God, in his great grace and goodness, will lead us all on through the ages of eternity, beholding new glories and new graces in his Son.

What more can I say to arrest the attention of young men?

Once my interest was in things which will pass away. Now I am a partaker of Him who made all these things. What are they compared to Him? He is Truth.

"And thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thy hands. They shall perish, but Thou remainest, and they shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed, but Thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail."

A Presbyterian on the Priesthood.—"With my whole heart I believe with Doctor Arnold, that the separating of the clergy from the people, as a separate caste, endowed with some mysterious and mystical functions, was the first and most fatal apostacy — a thing which more than anything else has paralyzed the power of Christianity in the world. Presbyterianism is and ought to be a positive protest, by asserting that the only priesthood on earth is the priesthood of every true believer, a priesthood in which the humblest layman shares equally with the highest clergyman.

"The truth it has to witness to is that every true believer, who is united by faith to the one Heavenly High Priest is the only priest on earth, that ministers are not priests of the congregation, but merely office-bearers and instructors in it, and they derive their functions from God in no other sense than the humblest layman derives his functions."—Principal Shairp.

If we are strong at home, we are strong all around; if there is weakness at home, strength is enfeebled everywhere.

New York's Fire Fighters.

In their every-day life and routine, as they lounge about their engine-stables, most firemen appear like very humdrum folk—as in truth they are, says a recent writer in Collier's Weekly. Their talk is the reverse of edifying, and if you ask them to tell of their own exploits they become monosyllabic, and presently break down altogether. As soon as the alarm-gong rings, however, they change into different beings. The heavy-witted, slow-moving fellow becomes alert and agile, and if you follow him to the scene of the fire you may arrive just in time to see him do deeds of wonderful dash and daring.

An incident that comes to my mind occurred at the burning of the American Horse Exchange, in New York, in the summer of 1896. It was a striking instance of the conduct of firemen at critical moments. The fire was a big affair, and five alarms were sent out. Near Broadway and Fifty-first Streets stood a tall piece of half-burned wall, about two stories high. At the foot of this swaying mass of masonry crouched a little group of firemen with a hose that jerked back and forth so violently under the strong pressure that they had to throw their whole strength against it to keep the streaming water playing into the roaring furnace before them. Back of them stood their foreman, with a hand on the line, giving orders how to direct the stream.

Suddenly a heavy crash came from behind the wall, and the whole mass lurched forward. Those of us who stood within the fire lines scattered in every direction. Glancing back I was horror-struck to see that the little group of firemen had made no effort to escape, but still crouched in the same place, as if awaiting their end. Then came the crash. The earth shook, and a red cloud of sparks flew up. We all felt that the little band of fire-fighters had met their doom. But when the dust and smoke cleared away and we returned, we were astounded to find them still there, crouching down to their work, with their captain directing operations as before. They had noted the wall as it fell, and, gauging its distance, had shifted the hose sidewise by a quick, concerted movement, so as to clear the wall, taking their chances from a falling beam or brick. Rather than desert the line at so critical a moment, they had hung together and faced death as one man. It was a stirring exhibition of discipline, trained judgment and nerve. The crowd outside of the fire lines burst into a cheer. Not one of the firemen turned his head.

For deeds like this promotions are made and medals are awarded. In truth, there are neither medals nor promotions enough to go around. Neither are all deeds of valor reported.

To commemorate deeds of bravery by firemen a book is kept at headquarters, known as the Roll of Merit, in which are recorded the names of all those who may have distinguished themselves in the discharge of their duties, together with a full record of the act by which they have become entitled to the honor of enrollment. This book, characteristically enough, has grown to the dimensions of an encyclopædia, the succeeding volumes of which slumber on the dust-covered shelves of the Secretary of the Fire Board.

I append ex-Chief Bonner's "Rules in Case of Fire:"

"Familiarize yourselves with the location of hall windows and natural escapes. Learn the location of exits to roofs of adjoining buildings. Learn the position of all stairways, particularly the top landing and scuttle to the roof. Should you hear cries of 'Fire!' and columns of smoke fill the rooms—above all, keep cool. Keep the doors of rooms shut. Open windows from the top. Wet a towel, stuff it in the mouth, breathe through it instead of the nose, so as not to inhale smoke. Stand at window and get benefit of outside air. If room fills with smoke, keep close to door and crawl along by the wall to the window. Do not jump unless the blaze behind is scorching you—not even then if the firemen, with scaling ladders, are coming up the building, or are near. Never go to the roof, unless as a last resort and you know there is escape from it to adjoining buildings. In big buildings fire always goes to the top. Do not jump through flame within a building without first covering the head with a blanket or heavy clothing and gauging the distance. Don't get excited, try to recall the means of exit, and if any firemen are in sight don't jump."

"THOU SHALT TEACH THEM UNTO THY CHILDREN."—The following extract from a sermon of a negro preacher, Club Ax Davis, is given for the sake, not of its style, but of its application to the committing of passages of Scripture to memory by children, whether they may understand them now or not:

"It ain't three weeks since I was out a cattle huntin', and I stopped at Bro. Harkey's, on Mud Creek, for dinner. He's a deacon in the Presbyterian Church, and, as true as I stand here, Sister Harkey had her little gal standin' before her with toes just even with the crack in the floor, and she put a question to her that was enough to break the child down. It was this: 'What are the benefits which, in this life, do either accompany or flow from justification, adoption and sanctification?" Then the child said the question all over, and hitched the answer to it like this: 'The benefits which, in this life, do either accompany or flow from justification, adoption, and sanctification, are assurance of God's love, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and perseverance therein to the end.' I just thought that child was the greatest wonder I'd ever seen in all my life. She tuk it right in, too, without balkin' or missin' the first word, and she spoke so sweet, and she looked so like a little angel, that before I know'd it, the tears was a runnin' down my cheeks as big as buckshot. I've seen the day when I could have mauled and split a thousan' rails quicker an' easier than I could larnt that question, and said it off like she did. Now, brethren, that child didn't understand or know the meaning of one word o' that. It was all I could do to take it in myself, but just let that Presbyterian young one grow up, and every word of the catechism will come back to her, and her character will stiffen up under her, and she'll have the backbone of the matter in her for life."

"WERE not Jehovah my Helper my soul had soon dwelt in the land that is silent! When I think that my foot is slipping, then thy goodness, O Jehovah, supports me. When cares crowd into my bosom, then thy comfortings cheer up my soul."—A Version of Psalms xciv: 17-19.

For "THE FRIEND."

THE GUESTS OF THE HEART.

By SARAH D. SEARS (written in time of quarantine.)

Our schoolmates, friends and kindred,
(Though some are far away)
As heart-guests ye are with us
And cheer us day by day.

A quarantine is resting
Upon our humble home,
But memory is not bondaged,
And thought is free to roam.

And richer still and sweeter,
Comes to our hearts unseen
A Holy Guest, whose coming
Can know no quarantine.

His willing, faithful servants
To us He kindly sends
To comfort and to aid us—
Our neighbors and our friends.

So many are the blessings
Sent by our Guest unseen,
That tendered hearts grow thankful
For days of quarantine.

And, when the siege is lifted,
I would that we may be
Each day more truly faithful,
With clearer vision see

That God, in love and wisdom,
His children watches o'er;
The paths our feet are treading
His feet have trod before;

If Marah's bitter waters
It must be ours to drink,
His love each draught will sweeten,
And "stand beside the brink."

In times of sore affliction,
In hours of trial deep,
His eye is watching o'er us;
His eye that knows no sleep.

His presence in the daytime
Can cheer the darkened room.
With such a guest, why need we Feel aught of dread or gloom?

He cometh in the night-time,
Beside the sick one's bed,
And oh, how bright the radiance
His presence there can shed!

How oft, when patient sufferers
Their long night vigils keep,
He comes to soothe and comfort
And give the loved one's sleep!

His coming and his presence
Can know no time or bound;
Wherever dwell his children
A heart-guest He is found.

Not just in lordly palace,
Not just in gilded dome;
But in the lowly cottage
And in the humblest home.

Amid the noise and tumult
Of crowded city marts,
Is felt that Sacred Presence,
The Guest of quiet hearts.

In loneliest mountain fastness
That human foot hath trod,
Still He is sweetly with us—
Our Father and our God.

IT is not so much the being exempt from faults, as the having overcome them, that is an advantage to us.—Jonathan Swift.

Reminiscences of the Life of William and De Dewees.

On the sixteenth day of Tenth Month, 1 my youngest sister was born. Of this ev my memory is only that of a child; so tha I continue this sketch it may be borne in n that I write only from oral information. was, I think, as early as 1830 that my fa felt it right for him to become companio [Jared] Patterson, a minister then in g esteem in Stillwater Monthly Meeting, O who was liberated by said meeting to att Baltimore and Philadelphia Yearly Meet and a part or all the meetings composing th This journey they purposed making on ho back. My father was considered well moun and they doubtless set their faces Zionw trusting that with Divine assistance they m be favored to return in peace of mind. father's noble beast became so debilitated f over-eating or drinking as to render it q unable to go forward. This placed my fa in a very tried situation, being a strange a strange land, with a slender purse. N ternative seemed left but to exchange the cently fine animal for anything that might pear likely to carry the traveller on his j ney. Pretty soon a jocular fellow came ward, offering to give a filly quite under for the crippled animal. The offer was cepted, and the strange pony proved to t well trained and gaited hackney, so active sure-footed as to require close scrutiny to tect her blindness. The journey was perfor and, so far as known to the writer, it was last time they two went out together.

Nothing more presents to my memory i my history reaches the tenth day of Fo Month, 1831, when occurred the birth of younger brother. The number in our fa circle was now the same as at the beginnin my sketch. When the infant child was a l past two years old my mother performe journey across the Allegheny Mountains visit dear ones remaining there. On this casion my father remained by the stuff. journey was performed in a carriage in c pany with Issachar and Edith Schofield, their son Jonathan. The event of moth arrival at home looms up in the memory of writer as one of the pleasantest happenings his life. My parents were diligent in t ness, serving the Lord, never allowing pecuniary interest over which they preside deter them from the attendance of relig meetings.

I am now come to the year 1834, in the tumn of which the first effort was made tow adding to their much needed house-room. separate apartment was erected of suffic dimensions to make a pleasant sitting r and sleeping apartments over it. On the proach of the winter of 1835 and '6, the portunity for suitable schooling for their dren pressed upon the sensitive minds of father and mother with such weight as t duce them to sacrifice the anticipated c forts of the new room and have it arran for a school. Some neighbors being desi to avail themselves of the proffered op tunity my parents took into their family t young women as boarders and scholars.

Of this school my eldest sister was teac and nothing is remembered to relate but families were expected to get together,

J. D's family and ours, and make up the xen and wagons, expecting to pay for l of our party soon made a stir in the ng community. But the family that oc-d the cabin that father intended for a were unable to move because of the sickness of the father. The family were nine in number, as was ours.

The house was made of hewn logs and might have been eighteen by twenty-two feet, raised to the height of one story, then drawn in with round poles and covered with boards split. The earth served for the floor. A huge smoke-stack made of well dressed stone occupied considerable space in the east end, one flue opening into the room, the other faced the east end and was not covered, and we had no tent. How such a mixed family (I say mixed, for the first night our wagoner was with us), managed to get rest and victuals, I leave to the decision of such as may incline to ponder over it.

My father's health was by this time much improved. Here my mother's sensitive feelings were deeply stirred at observing the rough treatment of the sick man by his wife. My mother desired the privilege of at least preparing some food for him, which on tasting he accepted as a great treat, and by the continuance of this changed diet so revived as to be able to move a short distance. My mother continued to send him victuals as long as he lived, and the writer was her errand boy. One evening as I approached the log cabin, the hardy little woman met me ere I reached the threshold, with the expression, "Mr. Ellis is dead." On my return, giving my mother this information, she calmly expressed, "I trust he is better off."

My father and mother had doubtless pondered well the situation, and ere the goods were removed from the wagon decided to put them up in another cabin that had been vacated, and workmen were at once set to pulling down the former one. The temporary roofing was removed, and other logs hewn sufficient to raise the walls to the height of two stories. This was a very considerable job, owing partly to the difficulty in procuring lumber for floors, etc. It was not until winter had barely set in that the new house was fit for use, but then it was considered one of the best family homes in those parts.

MORE FAITH.—I hear men everywhere praying for more faith; but when I listen to them carefully, and get at the real heart of their prayers, very often it is not more faith at all that they are wanting, but a change from faith to sight.

"What shall I do with sorrow that God has sent me?"

"Take it up and bear it, and get strength and blessing out of it."

"Ah, if I only knew what blessing there is in it, if I saw how it would help me, then I could bear it. What shall I do with this hard, hateful duty which Christ has laid right in my way?"

"Do it, and grow by doing it."

"Ah, yes; if I could only see that it would make me grow!"

In both these cases you do not see that what you are begging for is not more faith, although you think it is, but sight.

You want to see for yourself the blessing in the sorrow, the strength in the hard and hateful task.

Faith says not, "I see that it is good for me, and so God must have seen it;" but, "God sent it, and so it must be good for me."

Faith, walking in the dark with God, only prays Him to clasp its hand more closely; does not even ask Him for the lighting of the darkness so that the man may find the way himself. —Phillips Brooks.

For "The Friend."

A TRUE EXPERIENCE.

As I sat musing on my life,
The time that's past and gone
Came looming up before my gaze,
In vision clear and strong.

For I resolved when I was young
To lead a Christian life,
And as I raised my heart in prayer
My soul was filled with light.

But I grew careless and forgetful
Of the One who died for me,
Of the ignominious death He died,
That I might ransomed be.

But in the rush of passing life
Conviction came, and then
I saw the precious jewel,
The crowning diadem

Had passed from me unheeded—
How could I be so blind?
My soul was dark and tempest-tossed,
No comfort could I find.

And thus I wandered many years,
As on a raging sea;
Like a ship upon the ocean tide,
No rescue came to me.

Then dire disease did visit me,
And brought me very low.
Then how earnestly I longed
A Saviour's love to know.

For many weary days and nights
I pleaded not in vain:
For Jesus heard my humble cry,
And my sorrows did restrain.

I saw my Saviour in the sky,
His glory shone around;
I gazed in wonder at the sight—
My Redeemer I had found.

And in his hand a crown He held—
A crown so bright to see,
"Which freely unto thee I'll give If thou wilt follow me."

The adversary of my soul
Did then from me retreat,
And sank with dark and cowering form
Beneath my Saviour's feet.

He passed away in endless depths,
Both dark and deep and wide;
He could not rob me of my prize,
Nor keep me from my Guide.

I grasped the precious jewel,
Received and held it fast,
And pray it may with me remain
As long as time shall last.

'Tis sweet to know a Saviour's love
And feel his presence near;
When Christ is watching over us,
No danger need we fear.

Oh, wondrous love of Christ our Lord!
His mercy and his power
Can carry us past Satan's wiles
In trial's darkest hour.

MIRANDA PALMER.

REPENT ye therefore and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out. (Acts iii: 19.)

For "The Friend."

An intelligent faith, which has its source not in ourselves, but in the grace of God towards us, must always be counted as an essential part of the Christian's equipment; and the more freely we acknowledge the inward spring of this faith, and drink of it, and commend it to our companions, the less will we depend upon the authority of this or that man, and the closer will be our walk with Christ. The Society of Friends, beyond all others, disclaims human authority in spiritual regions; it views with distrust any approach to machinery in the conduct of Divine worship, any attempt to substitute perishable images and symbols for the unseen and eternal realities. But to maintain this position it cannot rely upon the simple "fiat" of its founder or of any one man or set of men; it appeals to an intelligent and reasonable exercise of faith, springing out of a heart touched by the love of God in Christ; it appeals to that witness in the heart of man which not only testifies to the grace of God, but which rebukes sin and leads to repentance and obedience; and it fortifies this appeal to an inward Light by a no less courageous appeal to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Covenant, which, in their expressed spirit, and not in any dead letter, are—"as Christ and the apostles called them and holy men of God called them—the words of God"* "They are a divinely authorized record of doctrines which we are bound as Christians to believe, and of moral principles which are to regulate our actions. Whatsoever any man says or does which is contrary to the Scriptures, though under profession of immediate guidance of the Spirit, must be reckoned and accounted a mere delusion"

Now, there is abundant internal evidence in these Scriptures to show that they were written by men of like passions with us, by men who were eminently in touch with the life around them, and who were struggling through its difficulties, its temptations, its failures and its disappointments, to rise into "the free and ample air" of a purer life and a larger hope. The Spirit of God fell upon kings and priests, rulers and slaves—upon herdsmen and shepherds and fishermen—upon physicians and tax gatherers and statesmen and students; and the result is found between the boards of our Bibles. Are we as a body sufficiently at home with these records, so as to be able amid all the discussions of the day, to hold them at their real value, neither too high nor too low? Are some of us putting them above their true place, looking more to them than to their Source; and others disposed to lose sight of their inestimable value as companions of our daily life? Are our young people so trained in their thought about the Bible as to be able, without stumbling, to read Robert Barclay's words, "They (the Scriptures) are only a declaration of the fountain, and not the fountain itself; therefore, they are not to be esteemed the principal ground of all truth and knowledge, nor yet the adequate primary rule of faith and manners . . . . subordinate to the Spirit from which they have all their excellency and certainty." Or are some who have been brought up in only a traditional belief about the Bible finding the whole ground slipping from beneath them because of the removal of things that are shaken, while they have no grasp on the things that cannot be shaken?

Now, have we not as Friends a duty to fulfill by inculcating the things we believe concerning the Scriptures, to show on what ground we stand, and why? Shall we not encourage our children to understand what the Bible really is, how it was written in different books and covering centuries of time? May we not be diligent in applying those ascertained truths which reverent Christian scholars of our day are putting before the world concerning these sacred writings, their authors known and unknown, and the times in which they lived? Let us not even appear to bind the Word of God nor to deny the possibility of revelation of new aspects of Divine truth from age to age. We recall the words of one of the most reverent and helpful teachers of our day, "He who has real faith in God will never be afraid of truth. Remember that God is able to take care of his truth, and which of us will venture to say that this [shaking which is now apparent] may not be [overruled as] part of the method of doing so?"

We ask that the generation to come, on whom will rest the problems and perplexities of their new day, may not falter or turn aside for want of those teachings in regard to the Bible, its origin in time and place, its human element, and its Divine inspiration, which shall by the blessing of the one Teacher, and as given only by his spiritual power mantling upon his servants, serve to strengthen and sustain that intelligent faith of which we have spoken, and to point men and women, through the message written by human hands in the olden time under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, to the one living God and his well-beloved Son our Saviour, Jesus Christ. "Let us search the Scriptures for ourselves. To the Christian the Old Testament comes with the solemn and repeated attestation of his Lord. As it is read in the light of the New, its meaning is unveiled, and the humble disciple is taught to discern the unity and mutual adaptation of the whole and the many-sidedness and harmony of its testimony to Christ. The great inspirer of Scripture is ever its true interpreter. He performs his office in condescending love, not by superseding our understanding, but by renewing and enlightening them. Where Christ presides idle speculation is hushed. His doctrine is learned in the doing of his will, and all knowledge ripens into a deeper and richer experience of his love."

George M. Warner.

*Epistle of George Fox and others to the Governor of Barbadoes, 1671.

"A Charge to Keep."—If we would glorify God in our bodies which are his, it is needful that we bear certain responsibilities. God is getting unto himself a people who can be relied on; to whom He can make His will known. He will write his law in our minds and hearts, as we are willing to be entrusted with responsibilities. God's true and willing workers do not go to a house of worship in a state of indifference. If we are tired in body, or weary in spirit, we can remain with God in secret prayer until we get the "quickening." Then He will "reward us openly." In public we can claim the anointing for service. When we are filled with the Holy Ghost, we also learn to be kept silent, (and labor in pr for others) "ready for the Master's use." us often read I Cor. 12th chap., and lea know our place in the body of Christ. W we esteem others more highly than ourse we still realize that our place is impor too! Much is depending upon our faithfu to God. When one disobeys God, the te Holy Spirit is grieved. But the good wo the Lord will go on; and if God can't use He will use some one that will obey. they will gain to their talents by practice those who are afraid to launch out and God and give the message, lose power.—E clical Visitor.

Education for the Duties of Life.

One of the practical "Queries" that is y read and answered in our meetings is, Whe our children are duly assisted in procu "sufficient education to fit them for the d of life?"

Doubtless one of the duties of life is viding ourselves and those dependent upo with food and raiment, shelter and war but neither Christian nor sociologist would sent that this is all.

To "glorify God in our own bodies an our spirits," too, both of which are his, work of far greater consequences. If we w follow in the footsteps of Him who said, this cause was I born, that I should bear ness to the Truth," we must know the T ourselves, and know also how the Lord w have us bear witness to his Truth.

In view of this fuller definition of the du of life, there may be some difference of o ion as to how much and what kind of educa is needed.

Language, literature, science and art ar deed very important in an education for ness, and greatly should they aid us in all duties of life, but they are not absolute es tials in either case.

To fit ourselves for duties, we must recogn appreciate and obey duty. This is a study, not named in the curriculum of schools. learned only in the "school of Christ." W out this deeper knowledge, that comes of ligious conviction and experience, no amo of mental training can fit us fully for the do of life.

Education that scorns the question of or that begets pride or indifference to the fare of others, or that contemplates no ob tive purpose, is not an honest preparation the "duties of life."

The boy who is ashamed to carry a bundl to clean a gutter or to do any honest l that occasion may require, or the girl wh too proud to bake and sweep and scrub, or selfish to wash the dishes for the servant o sionally, is not educated for the sweetest ties of life."

The boy who is "learning the business" his uncle, and who puts a worthy employe disadvantage in order to usurp his position the girl who rejoices in the misfortune of val, is not educated aright for the "duties life." Neither is the girl who reads and pa for pastime, yet refuses to help the Do Society because she "never did like to se

"By this Spirit the Christian knows that his sins are pardoned, and that he is a child of God. He knows that God will pardon him, because He has pardoned his sins. He knows this not only because the Bible says that He will forgive sin, but because the Spirit beareth witness with his spirit that he is a child of God. 'He that believeth on the Son hath the witness in himself.' 'God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father.'

"By this same light the Christian knows that there is a future life. He is not troubled about a future life. Science has not demonstrated the proposition, but he has 'tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come.' He has a foretaste. The apostle calls it 'an earnest of the promised possession.' He has already received a portion of the heavenly gift. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit.' It cannot be said that the Christian knows these things perfectly. 'We see through a glass darkly,' but we see. 'We know in part,' but we know. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be,' but it doth appear that we shall be."—The Advocate.

REAL COURTESY.—A young lady, spending a rainy evening at the house of an old gentleman, wanted a cab to take her home. Her host started off to fetch the cab.

"Do let the maid go," she said.

"My dear, the maid is also a woman," was the grave reply.

The man was the late George Higginbotham, Chief Justice of Victoria. His courtesy toward women was regardless of rank or personal attractiveness.

A man was trying to lead a heavy draught horse along the street. The animal refused to be led, and then the man made several ineffectual attempts to mount the refractory creature. At that moment the Chief Justice came along, and seeing the man's difficulty, extended his hand—as a mounting-block.

The man put his foot in the hand and mounted upon the horse's back, and the Chief Justice passed on.

Notes from Others.

In their prodigious efforts to win the world the churches have made the great mistake of conforming to the world.—A. J. Gordon.

Much is being said about an inspired Bible. We have that, what we need is more inspired men and women.—Zion's Watchman.

James Johnson in his "Century of Missions" says, "The heathen and Mohammedan population of the world is more by two hundred millions than it was one hundred years ago, while the (Christian) converts and their families do not amount to three millions. "While we rejoice in the work accomplished by modern missions, we mourn over the sad fact that the increase of the heathen is numerically seventy times greater than that of the converts during the century of missions."

GOOD LISTENING.—Much is said at the present day about the importance of good preaching. This is right, and perhaps the average preaching of today is as high as it has ever been. Not so much is said about good hearing, and yet this is, perhaps, just as important. Good preaching and poor hearing will fail in the best results. Good hearing and poor preaching will, perhaps, not be so barren in fruit. But good hearing and good preaching is the ideal to be aimed at. The habit of listening attentively is one that can be acquired with a little care. The best time to acquire it is in youthful years. Parents can do much to help in this matter. —Christian Observer.

According to the "Life-Story of A. J. Gordon," who labored for twenty-five years in a church in Boston, his ideal was that the administration of the Holy Spirit should there be devoutly recognized and practically realized. He sought, and with comparative success, to impress upon his people the fact that in the church as body of Christ, the Holy Spirit really though invisibly indwells; "that He is ready, if He finds a willing people, to oversee and administer all that pertains to the affairs of the body of Christ, and that, as his administration both demands and depends upon co-operation, there must be neither secular men nor secular methods introduced into the practical conduct of Christ's church, but the Spirit of God must be recognized and realized as the Divine Archbishop."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The report of the imports and exports of the United States for Second Month shows an increase of imports over Second Month, 1899, of $8,500,000, and of exports of $26,000,000.

The United States Senate has passed the Puerto Rican Relief Appropriation bill. The measure carries $2,095,000, the President being authorized to use that sum "for public education, public works and other Governmental and public purposes" in Puerto Rico.

The House has refused to concur in the amended bill.

On the 13th, the House adopted the conference report on the Financial bill by a vote of 166 yeas, 120 nays; present and not voting, 10. Nine Democrats voted in the affirmative.

Director Roberts, of the Mint Bureau, will take immediate steps to increase the stock of subsidiary silver coins under the currency act. It is proposed to coin about $20,000,000 in these small coins to meet the requirements of business. Under previous laws there was a restriction on the coinage of fractional silver, and in consequence the Mint was unable to meet the demand or to provide for the re-coinage of all worn and mutilated coins. Since the acquisition of the islands in the West Indies and the Orient the demand for fractional silver has increased and the stock usually carried by the Treasury has been reduced to a low figure, the amount held Third Month 1st being a little more than $5,000,000.

The coinage of $20,000,000 in subsidiary silver will undoubtedly furnish additional work for the Philadelphia Mint, and perhaps require the employes of that institution to work overtime.

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger, said recently:

A few days ago public attention was directed to the fact that a syndicate of American Bankers had arranged to take $25,000,000 of Russian railroad bonds, guaranteed by the Russian Government. A year or two ago a Mexican loan was floated here. This afternoon J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. gave notice that they were prepared to accept bids for the new British war loan, and said late in the day that they had already received many subscriptions. These events, and especially the last, are evidences of the widening field of American finance. New York is, indeed, becoming an international financial market when a new British loan is floated here simultaneously with London. No doubt many American capitalists will be glad to own some British consols, which are selling at a considerably lower price than the same class of American bonds, especially as the declaration of peace in South Africa would be apt to advance the consols. To-day Henry Clews made the suggestion that the new 2 per cent. Government bonds should be christened "U. S. consols," especially as they make so favorable a comparison with the English consols, which bears 2½ per cent. interest and are selling at 100⅞, whereas the "U. S. consols" are 2 per cents., are selling at 107, and are in considerable demand at that price. There can be no better barometer of the high credit of this nation than this showing. "No nation," he says, "has ever before been able to float a 2 per cent. bond at 100. This is certainly a prond schievement for this country."

The State Department has been notified that the Persian Government is about to send a Minister to Washington.

A topographical survey of the island of Puerto Rico, by Herbert Wilson, of the United States Geological Survey, presents some interesting facts at an interesting juncture in the affairs of that unhappy island. This survey deals primarily with the subject of irrigation, which is a matter of importance in the island, although it is by no means an arid region. Rains are abundant and the annual rainfall sufficient. The only necessity for irrigating works in Puerto Rico would be to secure a regular and measured use of water. It is estimated that the agriculture of the island would be vastly improved by such a system, and the conditions, according to the survey, are unequaled. A range of mountains extends the length of the island, the elevation varying from 1500 to 3000 feet. This range is broad and presents an ample area for catching the rainfall. Chairman Cooper, of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, states that he has been assured by gentlemen who are waiting for the civil and commercial status of Puerto Rico to be adjusted by Congress, when they will invest large amounts of capitul there, that good engineers have reported that an electric railroad can be operated around the entire coast of the island by the water power afforded by the streams from the mountains.

The northern half of the Colville Indian reservation will be thrown open for settlement about Fifth Month 1. It comprises a million and a half acres.

The Kentucky Legislature adjourned sine die on the 13th, after passing a bill appropriating $100,000 for the use of Governor Beckham in re-organizing the State militia. It is said the two claimants to the Governorship have agreed to make no aggressive move until after the Court of Appeals has made its decision in the case.

The New York Post Office did a business of $143,200,000 in 1899, an increase of 8 per cent. over 1898.

On the 13th inst. the New York Assembly by a vote of 117 to 9, passed the bill providing that a man and a woman may marry by drawing up a written contract signed by both parties stating the place of residence of each and the date and place of such marriage. This contract must be acknowledged in the manner required for the acknowledgment of a conveyance of real estate. It must be filed within six months with the county or town clerk. The Senate is yet to act upon the bill. It abolishes former common law marriages.

A remarkable natural phenomenon has followed the recent series of earthquakes that shook the southern end of California. One of the giant spurs of San Jacinto Peak has moved its millions of tons of earth and rock into the valley beneath, and where the valley was is now a yawning abyss. Seemingly it has sunk hundreds of feet into a subterranean cavern, which undoubtedly underlay this peak once 4000 feet above the sea level. There are jagged peaks of sandstone where hills were torn asunder, and standing precipices where mountains parted company.

The fishing industry in North Carolina yields an annual product of the value of over $1,000,000 at no cost to the State, as the Fish Commission pays its own expenses and turns $8000 to $10,000 into the State Treasury every year.

President James J. Hill, of the Great Northern Railway Company, who was recently in New York City, is enthusiastic over the increase of our Asiatic trade. "Asia," he says, "is an immense new market for this country. Not over one-third of the people of the world eat wheat. In England and America we consume on an average about twenty-two pecks, or five and a half bushels per inhabitant, per annum. If we can educate the 400,000,000 people in the Chinese Empire, for instance, to use our wheat, say to the extent of one peck per annum, it would open a market for 100,000,000 bushels a year. The increase in the consumption of our wheat and cotton in China and Japan is already so large that it has reached a point where the volume of business is only limited by transportation facilities to the Orient, and the prospect is that it will be very largely increased in the near future, as transportation facilities are furnished. These countries are also large buyers of our silver, with every prospect that the demand will increase. The Great Northern is now building two new steamers which will probably surpass any steamer in the world as regards tonnage capacity. Each of these steamers has a little less tonnage capacity than that of two Lucania's combined. This great tonnage will enable the steamers to carry large cargoes at cheap rates, and the cheaper we can ship our products to Asia the sooner will we extend our markets."

There were 580 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 69 more than the previous week and 60 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 301 were males and 279 females: 74 died of pneumonia; 64 of consumption; 46 of heart diseases; 26 of apoplexy; 26 of measles; 23 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 22 of old age; 22 of diphtheria; 17 of typhoid fever; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 16 of inanition; 15 of convulsions; 15 of cancer; 14 of bronchitis; 14 of nephritis; 11 of nræmia; 10 of paralysis; 9 of marasmus; 9 of Bright's disease, and 9 from casualties.

There is great anxiety in official circles at Constantinople regarding the Russian Government's refusal to modify its demands regarding railroad concessions in Asia Minor. The Turkish Government advises against submission.

The American Association at Shanghai has complained of the rigorous anti-foreign Chinese policy, and a United States warship will be despatched from Manila to aid in the preservation of order in the disturbed district of the Empire.

There were 583 victims of plague in the city of Bombay during the week ending Second Month 16th. More than 61,000,000 people in India are affected by the famine, and about 4,000,000 are in receipt of relief.

The University of Santiago, the head of the educational system of Chile, has from 1,200 to 1,500 students, and the professional schools are well kept up and well attended.

The Grand Canal, part of the Valley of Mexico drainage system, was opened on the 17th instant with much ceremony. The invited guests included President Diaz and his Cabinet, the Supreme Court Judges, members of the diplomatic corps and city officials.

A colony of 400 Missouri farmers is to be established in the valley of the Concho River, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico. The promoters of the colonization scheme have purchased 200,000 acres of rich valleys, and a few of the colonists have already arrived.

The construction of the Mexico, Cuernavaca and Pacific Railroad is being rapidly pushed forward toward the Pacific coast, over 2,000 men being employed in the grading and bridge camps. The Pacific terminus of the road will be the Port of Schuetenaco instead of Acapulco.

What is there in our meetings more is to us than all this, which we cannot ?

not the possibility of a fresh inspiration God taking shape, a fresh flame being , and a fresh consciousness of Divine s making way for itself in the hearts the lips of those who have come to-? And it is no mysterious possibility of ising that we are here looking for, but nifestation of the in-dwelling Spirit in we trust? And if we feel this possibility nore real and more precious to us than ids to devotion," we shall see that for l realization of it we must not only begin ence in our meetings, but that the whole g must be arranged on that basis, so iere may be perfect freedom for the g of the Divine Spirit, and for one spir-anifestation to follow on another with-erruption outside. We cannot stop at f-way houses. We must have perfect n and perfect equality each one, if it e, opening their hearts directly to the influence, and also to that witness to it y their fellow-worshippers.

lare not cling to the past, nor trust to f the future. We must get down to e present facts, and find out the possi- that are open to us here and now.

ce, then, provides that pause in the f life which is necessary if each soul is account of itself and to learn of God. o, we believe, the most helpful medium t sympathy of heart with heart, and rfect freedom for the manifestation of the Divine will which should precede expression, and which can alone ensure united worship. Finally, it is in itself an expression, at least an acknowledgment of truth and feeling too deep and too mysterious for words. Surely the more we contemplate what we can grasp of the Divine, of that Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness, that love revealed to us in Christ and in our own experience, that mystery of the past and future which hems us around, the more we shall feel the inadequacy and imperfection of words. They are but "language flung out at the object of our consciousness," and in the giving up of the attempt to define, a nearer approach is of things than could ever be arrived at by the channel of words alone.

Our silence, then, has this final function—to be an acknowledgment for us of man's littleness in presence of the Infinite, of man's dependence on the Divine Greatness, and of the impossibility of putting into words all that we feel in presence of that "High and Holy One who inhabiteth eternity."

There is nothing that can be substituted for silence. Words may do much—let them by all means do everything they can—but it is useless to suppose their power will be the same as that of silence, or have the same kind of helpfulness. Our fellow-Christians know and feel this, and confess sometimes to a desire for more silence in their modes of worship, and to a consciousness of power in silent worship not to be found elsewhere. It has, in fact, often been strikingly shown that, when strangers have been helped or impressed in our Meetings for Worship, it has not been so much by anything that has been said as by the solemn, living silence and the true Christ-like spirit that they have felt pervading the whole gathering.

There is a beautiful incident in the life of Francis of Assisi, in which we are told of his meeting with Louis (IX) of France. The latter had travelled far for the purpose; they expected much joy in the interchange of thought and expression, and to hear from each other's lips their common faith and love. When they found themselves face to face, the great realities, in the presence of which they both lived and breathed, proved too strong and too wonderful to be spoken of in words; they met and they parted in a feeling too deep for expression.

Does not this beautiful incident give us a vivid example of the silent fellowship of heart with heart for which our meetings for worship may be the opportunity, and which would be in itself an immense source of strength to ourselves and a powerful witness to others that, of a truth, God was with us? It is not a possibility to be lightly exchanged for any other, however helpful or attractive, but on the other hand we do not of course wish in anywise to minimize the helpfulness of ministry. We have liberty, we hope, for any expression that will assist in worship; and our belief and confidence is, that, if those present or even a proportion of them come in the attitude of mind we have described, they will feel in the consciousness of fellowship with each other and with God, such an "overflow of heart" as will "give the lips true speech," and the words spontaneously spoken will be words that not only convey the feeling of the speaker's own heart, but prove a channel for the united worship of the congregation. It need not necessarily be the wise or the noble whose lips are chosen for such ministry to others; "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings" strength is sometimes ordained, and the simplest or most broken phrases, coming from the full heart of the humble or uneducated, may strike a chord of deeper or more lofty tone than the congregation could have reached in any other way.—Extract from an article in "Present Day Papers," by M. Catharine Albright.

. . . . Without a laborious investigation of the opinions of the various denominations of Christians, but not without sacrifices, hindrances and discouragements by little and little, not rashly, but after mature deliberation, in simple obedience to apprehended duty, I attended the religious meetings of Friends. To me, solemn and reverential was that stillness, that silence, which seemed to hush every thought. I believe, that in this still calm, there is a renewal of spiritual strength to be known; yea! an enlargement of spiritual understanding, in communion with the Father of Spirits, which surely is true, spiritual worship. Thus, as an individual, I was led step by step, and found no difficulty in comprehending the ground and consistency of adopting plainness of speech, behaviour and apparel; all seemed consonant with apostolic counsel, evangelic doctrine, and the example of the early Christian converts.

A corruption of language and of manners has crept in and is adopted by many Christian professors in the present day. The Society of Friends having seen this, and being gathered in early times as a "people turned to a pure language." I marvel not at their setting a cautious guard against innovations.

AN INSTANCE OF THE GROWING LEAVEN OF FRIENDS' DOCTRINE.—Our faith in the Christ [whom the Scriptures] reveal rests, I believe, on a more impregnable foundation than historic tradition—even on the inward witness of a spiritual presence here and now, which we can realize more profoundly than when men looked on the face and listened to the voice of Jesus of Nazareth—the inward witness to the presence of that redeeming, purifying, hallowing spirit that was incarnate in Him, and that is still and forever living not only for us, but in us, and to all who open their spirits to its life-giving power.—Principal Caird on "The Fundamental Ideas of Christianity."

Why Deny Christ?

"Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?"

Ye rebellious ones, dead in trespasses and sin, what have ye to offer that is as an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast?

Has anyone received wrong by believing the record God gave of his Son? Who was the first one to attempt to overthrow the Kingdom of Christ?

Who entered Paradise and enticed Adam to unbelief, but he who had himself been cast down by his own assuming and rebellious nature?

Why did he assail Christ with all his stratagem at the most opportune moment to induce Him to exercise his power for selfish purposes? Perhaps, because God had taken upon himself human nature, and that human nature had been put to a severe test by a forty days' fast. Did he not think to prevail against God's own plan of redemption, by alluring the Son of God through the pangs of hunger to minister to his own comfort, and leave to man himself the fallen estate of man?

Christ therefore could not have fulfilled his mission here on earth had he yielded to temptation himself. He could not have succored those who were tempted. He left the celestial realms to elevate the creature man to the estate of his Creator. Man had been given the power of his own will, above all created things, subject only to the requirements of his Creator. But the tempter reasoned with him against the decrees of God, and man willing to throw off restraint and become wise in himself, yielded to the temptation. Because the devil had said, "Ye shall not surely die. Ye shall become as gods, knowing good from evil." Man was surrounded with all that could minister to his estate, and supply all his needs, but God had required of him subjection. Though he then enjoyed communion with God, he preferred to know it all himself,—was enticed of the enemy. "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed." The artifice of evil is ever glossed over with a semblance of good. The natural man is ever ready to make himself wise in his own conceit, and even to reply against God. But behold the condescending goodness of God, who knew what man's way might be when He created him, and also provided for him a ransom through himself. With a fair knowlege of the abuse man in sin would make of the liberty of his will, he took upon himself to redeem him from the penalty of the broken law. As Adam believed a lie and disobeyed God, so it is with men; yet, with no prospect of bettering themselves they will not believe the record God has given of his Son. Is there anything strange or marvelous about the fact that God, Almighty in power, unerring in wisdom, should clothe himself with flesh and become one with his creatures?

Heb. i: 1, 2, 3., "God who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also He made the worlds; who being the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high."

Vain man, who can raise the puny arm of rebellion against the Omniscient Creator, and scoff at his plans! Some even dare to believe themselves too wise to accept such a flimsy theory. They scoff at the idea of obeying God through fear. Their standard of excellence is too high to be subservient to fear, and they are good because it is noble and right to do so. Alas, for such delusion! covering themselves with the rags of self righteousness. Could such behold themselves with one ray from the effulgence of supernal glory and Truth to discern the vanity, deceit and corruption which is festering in their hearts unto eternal death, they would cry out like Job, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself in dust and ashes."

We love God because He first loved us, and gave himself for us while we were yet sinners. We believe God, and through this faith, we receive adoption by his Holy Spirit, which fills us with joy unspeakable and full of glory, begetting in us a fear. It is not a servile fear, but it is a fear to grieve his Holy Spirit. A fear to becloud the glory of his presence, the source of all our Joy and peace. For in his presence is fullness of joy, and at his right hand are pleasures forever more. It is a fear like unto an espoused Virgin to the only ideal of perfection, the only object of a pure and concentrated love, on whose smiles of approbation her happiness depends. Is there anything degrading about such a fear? It is such a love that bringeth "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," and "shall keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

Though Christ took upon himself our infirmities, and bear our sins, became a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief and was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin,—He felt our pains, our griefs and anguish; and though He suffered, the just for the unjust, still He was not subject to the power of death because He had not sinned. Neither could his body see corruption. He laid down his life for our sake. He arose again for our justification, and because He lives we shall live, because He lives within us. Let everyone therefore that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

Let those who deny the perfection of the Godhead prove what they assert, "Take away from God's Truth" and have nothing but confusion. Denying the Son is denying God, the Father also.

For "The Friend."

Samples of the Past.

Some extracts from a letter of Samuel Crisp, who had been an Episcopalian clergyman, to one of his near relatives, after he had embraced the principles of Friends, about the year 1708 :

"My Dear Friend : I received a letter from thee the week before last, which was sent by thy uncle Bolton. There were a great many kind expressions in it, and in thy sister Clopton's likewise. I acknowledge myself much obliged to you both, and to the whole family, for many repeated kindnesses. The news thou hast heard of my late change is really true. I cannot conceal it, for it is what I glory in. Neither was it any prospect of temporal advantage that induced me to it, but a sincere love to the Truth and pure regard to my own soul. Neither can I be sufficiently thankful to God that He let me live to see this glorious day and did not cut me off in the midst of my sins and provocations against Him. He is long-suffering to us-wards, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. He hath brought me off from the forms and shadows of religion, and let me see in a more illustrious manner what is the life and substance of it, as He found me in some degree faithful to that measure of light and knowledge He had bestowed on me while I was in communion with the Church of England. Therefore, He was pleased of late, as I humbly waited upon Him, to make known to me greater and deeper mysteries of his kingdom, and I can truly say that I find by daily experience, as I keep low and retired into that pure gift which He hath planted within me, things are every day more cleared up to me, and Truth shines more and more over the kingdom of darkness. I was made to lament the errors of my past life, and was desirous to attain a more excellent degree of holiness than I had discovered in the Church of England. In this religious retirement God knew the breathings of my soul, which was grieved and worried with the burden of my sins, for though I had strictly conformed myself to the orders and ceremonies of that church, and had kept myself from running into any great or scandalous enormities, the fear of the Lord preserving me, yet still I had not that rest and satisfaction in myself which I desired and greatly longed for. I found, when I had examined my state and condition Godward that things were not right with me.

"As for a sober and plausible conversation in the eye of the world, I knew that was a very easy attainment. A good natural temper, with the advantages of a liberal education, will quickly furnish a man with abilities for that, so that he shall be looked upon as a saint and very spiritual, when, perhaps, in chains of darkness, in the gall of bitterness, and in the very bond of iniquity. If this sort of righteousness would have done, perhaps I might have made as fair pretensions that way as some others, but, alas, I quickly saw the emptiness and unsatisfactoriness of those things, and that such a covering will not protect or hide us from the wrath of the Almighty in the day of judgment. 'Tis not a man's natural temper, nor his education that makes him a good Christian. This is not the righteousness which the Gospel calls for, nor is this the Truth in the inward parts which God requires. I think I made a little progress in a holy life, and, through God's assistance, weakened some of my spiritual enemies, while I lived in communion with the national church, as I was zealous and fervent, and ceased not my earnest supplication to Him in private that He would show me something more excellent, that I might get a complete victory over my lusts and passions, and perfect righteousness before Him, for I found a great many shortcomings and weaknesses daily attending me, and though I made frequent resolutions, still temptation was too strong for me, so I had often, like the Apostle, to complain in the bitterness of soul, 'O, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Who shall set me free and give me strength to triumph over sin, the world and the devil, that I may in everything please God, and there may not be the least thought, word or motion, gesture or action but what is exactly agreeable to his most holy will as if I saw Him standing before me! Oh, Divine life! Oh, that I could always stand here! Here is no sorrow, no repentance, but here is true peace. Here we are fitted and ready for every good word and work. Here the sweetness which arises from an humble, mortified life, which was sweet to my taste is felt, which delighted me more than all the pleasures and treasures of earth. Whilst I lived in London, in that private, retired manner I have spoken of, walking humbly in the sight of God and reflecting upon my past life, as I had occasion to be one day at a bookseller's shop, I happened to cast my eye on Barclay's Works, and having heard that he was a man of account among the Quakers, I had a mind to see what their principles were and what defense they could make for themselves, for sure, thought I, these people are not so silly and ridiculous as some would make us believe. I took Barclay home with me, and soon read enough to convince me of my own blindness and ignorance in the things of God. I found, as I read in that low and humble state in which I was in, a light to break in upon my mind, which did greatly refresh and comfort me, for, indeed, I was then, and had been for a considerable time, very hungry and thirsty after righteousness, and therefore I received the Truth with all readiness of mind—it was balm to my soul. This author laid things down so plainly and opened the Scriptures so clearly to me that, without standing to cavil or raise argument or objection, or consult with flesh and blood, I resigned myself to God, and, weeping for joy, I often thanked Him, with tears in my eyes, for his visitations of love and that I had found such to treasure, and that He looked towards me when my soul cried after Him. I was now fully satisfied which way I ought to go, and to what body of people I should join myself. So I immediately left the Church of England, and went to Grace-Church-Street-Meeting. After I had read Barclay I read some other books of that kind, amongst which was a very excellent one, called, 'No Cross, No Crown.'

"Thus I continued reading and frequenting meetings for several weeks together, but did not let any one know what I was about. The first man I conversed with was George Whitehead. This was some time after I began reading Barclay and attending Friends' meetings. By him I was introduced into more acquaintance with their principles, and the further I went the more I liked their plainness and simplicity. They do not use ceremonies and salutations like others, but shake hands freely, and converse together as brothers and sisters that are sprung from the same royal seed, and who are thus made kings and priests to God. Oh, the love, the sweetness and tenderness of affection I have seen among this people! 'By this,' says Christ, 'shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' 'Put on, therefore,' says the Apostle (as the elect of God, holy and beloved), 'bowels of mercy, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering.'

"Thus, my dear friend, I have given thee an account of my proceedings in this affair. As to my bodily state, if thou desires to know what it is, I may acquaint thee that I have my health as well as ever, and I bless God I have food and raiment sufficient for me, so that I am in want of no outward thing. I have the necessaries and conveniences of life liberally bestowed. Let us not burden ourselves with taking care for the vanities and superfluities of it. Let us possess our vessels in sanctification, and as we bring our minds into perfect subjection to the whole will of God, so let us bring our body to the most simple and natural way of living, being content with the fewest things, never striving to gratify our wanton appetites, neither follow the customs and humors of men, but study how we can contract our earthly cares, that we may bring most glory to God, and most health and most true peace to our souls, and do most service for Truth. And if this be our aim, certainly a very small portion of the things of this world will suffice us. Seeing we are Christians we should therefore earnestly pursue those things which bring us nearest to God.

"Thou knowest, my dear friend, that religion is a very serious thing and that repentance is a great work, and that one precious immortal soul is of more worth than ten thousand perishing worlds, with all the pomp and glory. Therefore let us take courage and be valiant for the Truth upon earth. Let us not content ourselves with a name and profession of Godliness. Let us come to the life and power of it. Let us not despond of getting the victory. We have a little strength for God, let us be faithful to Him, and He will give us more strength, so we shall see the enemy of our soul's peace fall before us and nothing to be impossible to us. Let us remember to pray for one another in our hearts with all fervency, that we may stand perfect in the whole will of God. Amen, saith my soul!

"I am thy most affectionate friend,

SAMUEL CRISP."

From an ancient copy of Sewel's History.

LET HIM SERVE.—The most obvious lesson in Christ's teaching is that there is no happiness in having and getting anything, but only in giving; and half the world is on the wrong scent in the pursuit of happiness. They think it consists in having and getting and being served by others; but it consists in giving and serving others. He that would be great among you, said Christ, let him serve; he that would be happy, let him remember that there is but one way—it is more blessed, it is more happy, to give than to receive.—Selected.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

I thought I had plenty of faith,
For the work that was left me to do,
I believed what the blessed book saith
And felt it unfailingly true.
Its promises went to my heart
With a clearness admitting no doubt,
And I said this is surely the part,
I must look to and follow throughout.

So I rested my study and trust
On what I could reason and do,
Without thinking that smaller than dust
Were all the best things that I knew.
But when the dear Master came in
And laid his sweet hand on my heart:
"Inquiring daughter, thou must now begin
With all thy own wisdom to part.

"Thou must open thy spirit to me
And dwell in my covenant grace.
All the idols around thee I see
Must be torn from their every place.
For the heart where my presence can dwell,
Whether highest or low in degree,
Must surely be willing to sell
All its treasure that comes not from me.

"I will give thee my cross and my love
To make thee more certainly mine:
And if thou wouldst meet me above
All else thou wilt have to resign."
Then He cast o'er my languishing soul
A measure of light from his throne,
A gleam which I could not control,
But longed more entirely to own.

And He said, "Tis from me thou must draw
All thy treasures, for silver and gold
Are before me as nothing but straw,
Which will pass as a dream that is told;
It is not any works thou canst do,
It is not in a clearness thy own,
But my Spirit must wash thee anew
With the inward baptism alone.

"Then down at my feet thou must lay
All thy gifts, tho' so precious to thee;
Thou must walk in my heavenly way,
And worship no lover but me.
Thou must close up thy heart's inner door
To all things that honor me not,
Then my blessings I surely will pour
On thy happy and sanctified lot."

YOU may hold up your lantern before the man who was born blind till the end of life, and it will not cause him to see. But let Christ open his eyes, and then hold up your light, and He will not need you to lead Him by the hand. This is the way in which sinners are to be saved. No mere man can save them by any moral or spiritual influence of his own. Yet, as co-workers with Christ, his followers are required to use all the appointed means of salvation, in the faith that they will be blessed of God. God's people are required to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, just because it is God that worketh in them to will and to do of his own good pleasure. How pleasant is the thought that in our own feebleness we have the Almighty One working in us, and the All-wise One directing and managing all for his own ends! When men work under Him and work with Him how can they ever fail? A thousand plans of their own may fail, but not one of his ever yet failed.—Christian Instructor.

Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

BY JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

We have authentic information that our g propriation for seeds is likely to be suppl mented by the Canadian Government to th amount requisite for supplying enough for th ground they will be able to prepare for plan ing. Vouchers have also been produced fo the money expended for provisions.

The Commissioner of Immigration at Winn peg, under date of 16th instant, writes:

"I was very much gratified to receive you kindly letter of the first instant, and I assu you that the cheering words and expressio therein contained are a source of help and su tenance to me in the sometimes trying positio in which I am placed. I am sure I do n know how I should have been able to get alo with these people without the assistance, fina cial and otherwise, that has been rendered the Friends in Philadelphia, as well as those England. Their advice at all times has be right along practical lines, and had the Dou hobors been advised by none others than t Friends and government officials, I feel su that their progress would have been much mo rapid during the last year, and their spiritu welfare at least as well looked after. I belie that if we have a good summer, so that t Doukhobors may have good crops, these peop will be in fairly good shape next fall to suppo themselves through the winter. They are slow people to start, but I believe once th get fairly on their feet, and get to understa the ways of the country, they will accumula property, and will be very well satisfied wi their surroundings."

William F. McCreary enclosed with his l ter the following report from H. Harley, t land agent at Swan River:

"The Doukhobors at Thunder Hill are g ting along well. They are getting in a go supply of flour (three car-loads), a car-load salt, some spades, hoes and tools for spri work. There are 170 men, 6 boys and 4 wom now at work at John Sinnel's camp at Fishe Siding.

"Charles McDougall asked me to get h some men to work in his tie-camp. I sent h 75 men, and he is paying them one dollar p day and board. The railway contractors a anxious to secure the Doukhobors in th camps as workmen. The men of this colo are more independent and self-reliant. So of these men bought a team of good hors and harness. Other men from one villa bought fifty sacks of flour for one village, a men from two other villages bought fifty sac for each of their villages. Another Doukhob brought a load of fish to town and exchang it for oats. Five men went up to the Woo River and bought five cows for their famili Another came and bought a plow and twe bushels of oats for spring work. Others bri hay and wood to town for sale.

"I have just one year's acquaintance w these people. In healthfulness and appearan they have greatly improved. They are fe ing more independent, and are getting alo well. They are preparing to get in a good s ply of fish from the Swan River, which flo through their villages, and will put away good many in salt for summer use. lan Verigin is a man who proved an agree- l companion to William Bellows and myself e traveling through the North Colonies in Sixth Month of last year. After being out t a company of Doukhobors at work on the oad, he writes :

We managed to get through a certain int of work down at Finmark, but not as n as we should have liked to have done. ground became frozen from one to three deep and more, and what was left was much hard clay. The contractor offered to sell ynamite, and gave us some to try. But the mite only seemed to blow holes through frozen clay, not to break it up. We would have made more than about a dollar a at it, I should think, and the price of was raised again, flour $3.25 a sack, but- 35 cents, cheese 25 cents a pound, sugar ents. We waited about a fortnight for work to be measured and our money to be but finally left two men behind to receive accounts and money, and came away. It a fairly long walk to the station, about ty-five miles, and a good many were pretty knocked up with it. But we made it a easier by hauling some of our baggage ttle sleighs, which we had made for our- es. Now, accept all our best wishes for and yours, hoping that you are all alive well, as we are. Reminiscences of the Life of William and Debby Dewees.

Here we entered upon the scenes of new country life in good earnest, it being the spot chosen by our father, in which our mother fully acquiesced. It was considered to be three miles to meeting, and no road but the old trail of the red men, and we had but one span of horses. But the duty of attending meeting was paramount to all else with my father and mother; and according to the custom of those times two generally rode one horse, we boys making the trip on foot. To complete the object in view, that of showing the inconvenience and trial to which the early settlers were subjected, I must be allowed to relate that in the summer of 1836, the horses of our neighbor, J. D., that moved out from near Barnesville, Ohio, got out of the lot and wandered off in the forest and while the owner was hunting for them meeting day came in course. Mary Doudna being very much concerned for the safe return of her husband and horses, nevertheless was desirous to get to meeting, and perhaps knowing that my sisters were not situated so as to go, sent over (our houses being not far apart), to see if she could have some assistance in getting to the place of worship. My father and mother sent her word to start in time to reach the summit of a great hill, and they would soon overtake and get her up behind my mother. But when they reached the place their friend was not there. Father and mother journeyed anxiously on, hoping that at each turn the object of their anxiety would appear. But on reaching the meeting, she was not there.

My mother used to relate that she went to her usual place of sitting, under feeling of great anxiety, and when the meeting appeared gathered and Mary Doudna not there, she thought it would not do, and she could not sit without letting it be known that Mary Doudna was lost in the great woods. My mother left her place in the meeting and went to the door. Just at that interval arrived the late Harmon Rhodes and wife, having the lost Friend on behind Elizabeth. My mother reckoned that never hearts that were none akin felt more dear to each other. That feeling had existed long before, and continued to the end of their days. Not far from her home Mary Doudna had taken a wrong path and was met by Harmon and Elizabeth Rhodes. The lost animals were overtaken by their pursuer and brought back. They were evidently intent on getting back to their former home, but a considerable river intervening, they had not taken courage to ford or swim it.

My sister next to the eldest was married in Third Month of 1837, it being among the first marriages accomplished at the meeting of Friends of Chesterfield, Ohio. She and her husband made settlement in the primeval forest, not very distant from my father's. The surroundings might not have been good, for her delicate constitution. Prior to the advent of this marriage, my father with the help of my elder brothers had prepared logs and poles for the erection of a cabin to enclose the other fireplace in the smokestack already mentioned. Kind neighbors came at once to assist, and it was done in a hurry. A large brick oven was also made in a convenient place. In this oven many a fine lot of bread and pies was baked after those consumed at the marriage feast of James Doudna and Sarah Dewees.

From this time until the year of 1839 nothing special is now remembered, only that we all worked hard, each doing his or her part. We boys took most delight in clearing the timber from the hills and valleys. It was perhaps directly after my father's return from attending the Second Month Quarterly Meeting of Stillwater that he informed his family at the usual Bible reading, that the late Joseph Edgerton had been liberated for an extensive religious visit to the meetings in the East, the northeast United States and in Canada, and that he felt it his duty to bear him company.

In the prospect of this long and distant separation my father and mother were mutual helpers, each encouraging the other in resignation to the good Master's will. In view of so long a journey, my father's wardrobe must needs have some additional pieces added and a horse had to be purchased for one of the team, for the journey was to be performed by private conveyance, as the attendance of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was an object of special interest. My father made his way to the home of J. Edgerton, where the outfit was completed, and they left there whilst yet a few days in the Third Month remained ; and when at some distance from the city of Philadelphia my father took sick and J. Edgerton felt obliged to journey on alone. As soon as my father's strength and freedom from disease would admit, he availed himself of the public conveyance then in use, and reached the city of Philadelphia near the same time of his friend's arrival. They were mutually glad thus to meet.

Leaving my father, here let me recount some of the afflictions that befel our bereaved mother. At this time my eldest brother then living was past twenty-one years of age. What specifications, or whether any were made with him I cannot tell, but this I know—he remained at home and worked very hard, helping our mother in every way he could. The prospect for a corn crop was a new plot of ground from which the underbrush and small trees had been removed during the winter previous. But many chunks and small logs were to be made in heaps to burn. The weather being fine, the moon giving light, my elder brother concluded one evening that we boys would spend an hour or two preparing these for burning. We had not been long engaged in this way when my brother, next elder than I, lifted over-severely, spraining the diaphragm of his slender body disabling him for many months. About this time my married sister, to whom allusion has been made, becoming more feeble, and her husband being completely crippled in both hands from felons, were moved in with us. My sister's case being now well developed consumption of the lungs, baffled every effort to arrest its progress. In a few months her husband recovered, except some deformity of fingers.

Of all these things my father was informed as often as could well be. But as he had set his hand to the plow, it was not wisdom to look back over much. It may now be presumed that my father and J. Edgerton are far north in the State of Maine, when from accounts received he felt that it was not likely that his dear child would survive until the accomplishment of the visit they went out to perform.

Or trying the fleece as Gideon did, my father found liberty to leave his friend, J. Edgerton and return to his afflicted family.

In making this homeward journey my father travelled by public conveyance and had for companion the late Daniel Wheeler. On reaching Mount Pleasant, Ohio, where the Yearly Meeting of Friends was held at that time, my father met Friends that had gone up from Chesterfield, Morgan County, Ohio, who could tell my father that his daughter was buried ere they left home. My sister filled one of the early made graves in that cemetery. My father came on home and spent a few days with us and then returned to join his friend in whatever service might be required of them. At that early day the controversy to which has been given the distinguishing titles of Gurney and Wilbur, were so agitating that William Dewees and Joseph Edgerton were justly suspected for being favorably impressed with the latter's views. Their prospect of further religious labor was closed, and they returned home in time for the Eleventh Month Quarterly Meeting of Stillwater, Ohio.

World's Largest Farm.

Situated in Northwestern Canada, and Contains 100 Square Miles.

It is a fact not generally known to the public, though well understood to the grain trade of the Northwest, that in the new and far Canadian Northwest, in a province whose very name is a synonym for desolation, in Assiniboia, 1000 miles to the north and west from the head of Lake Superior, are situated some of the largest and most successful wheat farms in the world. One of them, the Bell Farm, is without much doubt the largest connected block of land devoted to the raising of wheat to be found on the globe. This farm is owned by a syndicate of Englishmen, who have made it a sort of staking out ground for their younger sons, in so far as they have been able, and have subsequently wondered why their profits were no greater, though the yield of grain was so large, forgetting that these same young sons had to be provided for, and that salary lists mounted up.

It is named after Major Bell, the military manager of the estate, and has an area of 10 miles square, or 100 square miles, of which 45,000 acres, or about three-quarters, are under cultivation. There is also the Brassey Farm, owned by Lord Brassey, Governor of Australia, and the Sunbeam, owned by the Scottish-American syndicate, besides many others of less importance, and a stock farm of the Bell corporation, nearly as large as its wheat acreage. These farms are in a country which a few years ago was the last stalking ground of the buffalo, and where the relics of buffaloes and of Indian battles are still thick on the ground. A few miles southerly from Regina is an alkali plain, sixty miles across, that is covered with bones of buffaloes and Indians, the latter from the results of the last fierce battle of the Crows and the Blackfeet, not many years ago. All through this country piles of buffalo bones, some of them 500 to 1000 feet long, and perhaps 100 feet wide, and as high as a man could reach, have been gathered together and shipped East to fertilizing works.

In this district, where for hundreds of miles the train passes no house nor tilled soil, where there are millions and millions of acres apparently as good as those that are yielding thirty or forty bushels of wheat to the acre, where these lands can be bought for from $2 to $3 an acre, with the best of rail facilities, the Bell Farm people have been able to sell thousands of acres this summer at $8 to $10 an acre, and in one case the purchaser was subsequently enabled to turn his purchase of 640 acres at $25 an acre to an incoming farmer. This latter price, though it seems very high, when the vast stretches of arable and unoccupied land all around are considered, is not so high but that it permits good interest on the investment, year after year, by wheat farming.

The problems of farming in these great plains that stretch northwesterly 2500 miles from the head of Lake Superior, into a latitude that further east is a region of cold so intense that scarcely any vegetation will grow, have been long in solution, and have ruined many a man who has struggled against them. The soil is, generally speaking, a heavy, black loam, and the rainfall is very little, sometimes amounting to but a few light showers during an entire summer. It has been found necessary to so handle this soil as to preserve the moisture and to keep all the water that comes from the melting snows of the long, cold winters, and to do this a new method of soil culture has been inaugurated. Fall plowing so common and so much desired in the prairies of the Dakotas and Western Minnesota, is said to be worse than no plowing at all, and nothing is done to lands in crop after the harvesting. A third of the land under cultivation is allowed to lie fallow all the time, so that but two-thirds is in crop in any one season. By such farming methods Northwestern farmers are able to raise crops of from thirty to forty bushels of hard Scotch Fife wheat to the acre. The average yield in the Red River Valley of the Dakotas and Minnesota is about fourteen to fifteen bushels, and the average throughout the United States is not far from eleven bushels. Conditions as to soil and sometimes as to the moisture are the same in the Red River Valley as they are in the Saskatchewan Valley, but the farmers of Dakota and Western Minnesota would consider it suicidal to follow any such methods as these; in fact, they are not adopted anywhere else.

Such a farm as the Bell, with 45,000 to 50,000 acres under cultivation, and two-thirds of this immense land in crop every year, yielding at the rate of thirty bushels to the acre, gives a crop of from 750,000 to 900,000 bushels of grain. But this crop is nearly 1000 miles from navigation on Lake Superior, where the wheat of the Canadian lands comes in direct competition for the export and Eastern markets with that of the Northwestern prairies of the United States, the one yield at Fort William, the lake terminus of the Canadian Pacific, the other at Duluth, the lake terminus of the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern. It costs 15 to 16 cents a bushel to get this Canadian wheat on the ship at Port William, for the 1000 mile haul. It costs 8 to 10 cents to get the wheat of the Dakota farmer from his fields to Duluth, 250 to 350 miles. The Canadian Pacific is engaged in developing the country through which it runs, and it is willing to bear a larger share of the burden than its American competito But this fall a strange condition has prevai and is yet continuing. Wheat is worth wit 6 to 7 cents as much on these farms, 1(miles beyond the jumping off place, as it is Duluth, where buyers for the world's food congregated. These far off farmers are getting actually more money for their gr than are those of the famed Red River Vall 250 miles from one of the chief markets the world. The demand from mills in West Canada, those of the Ogilvies and others, their success in selling flour in both Eur and the antipodes, has had much to do w this condition.

In these hypoborean regions, along the fi first parallel, the cold is not far different fr that of the prairies to the south of the Am ican line. The thermometer sometimes g to 40 and 50 degrees below zero, but it d not stay there, and this cold is not felt m than 20 to 30 sometimes enjoyed in Minnes Cattle do not run out free all winter, but hor do, and come out in the spring fat and har having fed through the cold months on dried grasses of the prairies that they h been able to reach by pawing off the sn The grasses seem to have no nourishment they stand dried and wiry over the surfa but they have been the native food for buffaloes for countless years. Two hund and fifty miles further north, away up on Upper Saskatchewan, the prairies are sett exclusively by cattlemen, who have their r ches covering thousands of square miles. T are the only inhabitants, as it is their wish be, for these cattlemen are unsociable fell in their business life, and do not care for close companionship of farmers and tow men.

The cattle that graze in the Province Saskatchewan are driven to the Canadian cific at its terminus at Prince Albert, or t main line, near Regina, or they are trailed 300 or 400 miles over prairies, whose paths are those made by the wild cattle years ago, and kept clear now by these ca men and their drives to the terminus of Manitoba and Northwestern Road, at Yorl the foot of the great Beaver Hills. For y to come the future of the ranch cattle ness of the northern portion of the Amer continent will be in this region, where bu grass, plenty of water and wooded ri room for millions of head, and no intru small farmers to fence off the water holes cut the feed, offer attractions that the tana and Dakota plains are rapidly lo The big ranchmen are leaving these latter tricts, and most of them are going to T but the rational course is to the north that way will be the next great mover say those in the business.

The quantity of land open for settleme this region cannot be understood by an who has not travelled over these prairie after day, week after week, and seen sun set in level prairies and rise in level ries morning after morning without ch and still without sameness.—New York Tri

"Swear Not at All."

Recently, having to appear before a State cer with several others to make affidavit, after several had taken the oath, my name ng called, I informed the judge that I af- ned, and in giving the affirmation he made n oath. I corrected him, and declared the ds of the affirmation, which he accepted, ing there was no difference.

I gave him my reason why I differed with , that it was a matter of conscience with and contrary to Scripture.

ne of the number, a stranger to me, reach- to shake hands, with tears rising in his s, said, "My father often gave his reasons r he affirmed in about the same language ou have, in refusing to take the oath, and alize now there is more in refusing to take oath than I ever did before."

t another time, as a witness to a will in city, I changed the form of oath to affir- ion. After a short silence the judge asked as a Friend or Quaker. He said his mother a Friend minister when living, and as good oman as the state of Maine could afford.

replied, "Thy mother was a Quaker, for in se days Friends of that Yearly Meeting did appoint any but Quakers to the ministry he Society."

ANDREW ROBERTS.

ORTLAND, Oregon, Third Month 7th, 1900.

PAUL AND WOMEN.—There is a vulgar view ong thoughtless people that Paul was op- ed to women. We maintain that Paul taught divinely appointed station of the women, ch secures her highest good and greatest e elevation, that denies her no natural right acquired privilege which would promote welfare. Paul says (1 Cor. vii: 3), "Let husband render unto the wife due benevo- ce, and likewise also the wife unto the hus- d." Is not this just advice? "Husbands, e your wives, even as Christ also loved the rch and gave himself for it" (Eph. v: 25); o ought men to love their wives as their bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth self" (Eph. v: 28); "Husbands, love your es, and be not bitter against them" (Col. 19). Paul enjoins proper treatment of sis- —"The younger as sisters, with all purity" Timothy v: 2).

These instructions as to how to treat a wife sister in the church cannot be excelled. restrictions Paul places on women are olesome and wise. At Corinth, the women re so inquiring that they would interrupt preacher in the midst of his sermon. Paul, evident allusion to this error, commanded ir women to keep silence in the churches; if they would inquire into something they ired to know, to question their husbands at me, or to ask the preacher about it pri- ely. He forbade the women to teach, in h a sense as to usurp authority over the ; he teaches that modest reserve which or- naments the life of the women. He never degrades her, always seeks her purity, her cultivation, the ornamentation of her life with good works, her chaste purity and proper government of her children in the home.—Christian Conservator.

MORE THAN MAN.—No history can ever furnish such a contrast as that between the humble origin of the life of Christ and its after impress upon the world. Born of poor and comparatively ignorant parents, in a stable, in an obscure quarter of a Palestine village, ignored and unheeded by the whole world, except one little family, he received only a niggardly education, and worked at the trade of a carpenter till thirty years of age. Then he enlisted a dozen humble followers from the lower strata of society, and preached during three years over a comparatively small territory, his early popularity, like that of most reformers, greatly waning, until he was put to death as a felon. He left only a few scraps of sermons reported by his followers, but not a word in his own handwriting, no photograph or even pen-picture of his personal appearance. He left not even an organization, for that was perfected by his followers after his death. Now, instead of his name being consigned to oblivion, see what has come out of it. The book that chronicles his life and death and undying ideas is printed at the rate of over a hundred copies a minute. More lives of Christ have been published during the last few years than during all the preceding centuries. The majority of books from the teeming press discuss his life. Every church and hospital and missionary society and reformatory and charitable institution is a monument to Him. It is only in lands where his testimony is known and his gospel preached that life and liberty and property are secure. Witnesses in our courts are pledged to truth on his Testament. Burns said, "No man can tether time," but Christ has tethered and thrown it and branded it. His cradle was the water-shed of history. It cleft time as a warrior his enemy, for every day millions of letters, notes, mortgages, checks and newspapers must all be dated from his birth.—Christian Instuctor.

THE MINER'S SON.—The recent terrible accident in West Virginia that entombed many coal miners, recalls the pathetic story of the English boy who met a similar fate:

In an English coal mine a youth about fifteen years of age was working beside his father, who was a pious man and governed and educated his family according to the doctrine of God. The father was in the habit of carrying with him a small pocket Bible, and the son imitated his father in this.

One day they were working together in a newly-opened section of the mine, and the father had just stepped aside to procure a tool, when the arch above suddenly fell between them, so that the father supposed his child to be crushed. He ran towards the place, and called to his son, who at length responded from under a dense mass of earth and coal.

"My son," cried the father, "are you living?"

"Yes, father, but my legs are under a rock."

"Where is your lamp, my son?"

"It is still burning, father."

"What are you doing, my dear son?"

"I am reading my Bible, father, and the Lord strengthens me." These were the last words of the brave boy.

Young people do not like to think of death, but isn't it worth while to be able to meet it as peacefully as did this miner's son?

GOD links us to himself that He may loose us from our sins.

Notes from Others.

HE THAT REGARDETH THE CLOUDS SHALL NOT REAP" (Eccl. xi: 4.)—A Friend has forwarded to us a copy of Frances R. Havergal's reasons for going to meeting on rainy days, with a suggestion that some of them may be applicable to our members. We adapt a few of her expressions to such:

"My presence is more needful on days when there are few than on those days when the house is crowded.

"Whatever station I hold in the church, my example must influence others. If I stay away, why may not they?

"On any important business rainy weather does not keep me at home, and church attendance is, in God's sight, very important.

"Those who stay away because it is too warm or too cold or too rainy frequently absent themselves on fair days. I must not take a step in that direction.

"Though my excuses satisfy myself, they still must undergo God's scrutiny; and they must be well grounded to do that.

"There is a special promise that where two or three meet together in God's name He will be in the midst of them.

"An avoidable absence from the church is an infallible evidence of spiritual decay. Disciples first follow Christ at a distance, and then, like Peter, do not know Him.

"My faith is to be shown by my self-denying Christian life, and not by the rise or fall of the thermometer.

Such yielding to surmountable difficulties prepares for yielding to those merely imaginary, until thousands never enter a place of worship, and yet think they have good reason for such neglect."

WORLDLINESS IN THE CHURCH.—We are willing to print the following outline (sent by a Friend) of an address by "Father Ignatius," the British evangelist monk who visited this country a few years ago. As we have no desire to join in arraigning any selected one of the several churches on charges of worldliness, at least till our own hands are clean of it, we represent in blank the special church which he addressed:

If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore, the world hateth you (John xv: 19).

First he explained what the ——— Church is and what worldliness is, to show that the two could not, by any law of God or the Church, assimilate. He said there was a distinct line between the Church and worldliness, and it was a red line. It was the blood of Jesus Christ which washed people of the sins of worldliness and made them pure, so they might be in the world, but not of it.

He said the curse of the Church to-day was that it was filled with worldly people. The clergyman who attended the ball, the theatre, the dance party, knew no more of Christ's religion than a stone, and he needed conversion. He was sorry to say there were many such men in the pulpit of the ——— Church. It was not strange, with such ministers, that the people gave themselves up to the frivolities and vanities of the world, instead of seeking, finding and receiving the infinite love of Jesus, which satisfies the heart. Continuing, he said:

"But the ——— Church is not peculiar in this respect. The Methodist, the Baptist, the Presbyterian and even the Quakers were becoming just as worldly. It is time this humbug religion is broken up and driven from God's sanctuaries. In its place should come the true religion of Jesus, which makes men and women bear witness to their loving Redeemer every day of the week.

"When a person appears at the altar of the ——— Church for confirmation, he or she must renounce the pomp of the world. But I am told some bishops confirm persons who have not become converted. More shame to the bishop. He is a traitor to the church. I say that bishop who will confirm an unconverted person is a heathen. He should be driven from the church.

"How is it with parents who train their children to worship the pleasures of worldliness, the ball, the theatre, the dance, fashion, etiquette and all the other vanities of the world without so much as a thought for the welfare of the soul. To such I say you are sowing the seeds of religious humbug in your children's hearts, and the curse of God is upon you. If you find that you have a family of infidels, rationalists and agnostics you have only yourselves to blame."

In conclusion, he said the worldliness in the church was doing infinitely greater harm to the religion of Jesus Christ than all of the world outside.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES—The United States Senate, on the 23d inst., adopted the conference report on the Puerto Rican Relief bill by a vote of 35 to 15, practically a strict party expression. No Democrat voted for the report.

On the 24th, the House, after a brief and spirited debate, agreed to the conference report on the Puerto Rican Relief bill, the vote being 135 to 87. The bill was later in the day approved by the President.

It is estimated at the War Department that 25,000 men will be given immediate employment in public works in Puerto Rico under the operation of the Relief Appropriation act.

The United States Senate is struggling over the Tariff and Civil Government bill for Puerto Rico, with apparently irreconcilable views of the Republican majority. Several prominent senators insist on free trade with the island.

The Internal Revenue collections during Second Month amounted to $20,809,665, an increase over the corresponding month of 1899 of $1,160,659.

The total expenditures by the United States Government during the war with Spain, and as a result of it up to Third Month 26th, are $355,000,000.

The amount of bonds received at the Treasury Department for exchange for the new 2 per cents. was, on the 26th inst., $154,144,950, of which $14,667,100 was from individuals and institutions other than national banks.

Wolmarans, Fischer and Wessels, the peace envoys from the Boer forces, after visiting two or three European capitals, will go to New York, by way of Antwerp. It is understood at The Hague that they are invested with large powers, and are prepared to agree to anything looking to intervention.

A despatch from Washington says: "No investigation by the Census Office has aroused a more active and sympathetic interest than that relating to land reclamation by irrigation," says Hydrographer Newell, in charge of irrigation in both the Census Office and the Geological survey. "The East is quite as much alive to the importance of the subject as the West. Its manufacturers and jobbers see in the growing West a market of great absorbing capacity. The Canadians have set an example to the United States in the business like way in which they have gone about the problem of the Public domain. They also have vast tracts of arid land lying east of the Rocky Mountains and north of Montana. In spite of a relatively low temperature, they have demonstrated the success of irrigation in a broad and practical manner.

"Instead of allowing development to proceed in haphazard way, they drew a lesson from failures and mistakes on this side of the boundary, and first made an accurate survey to show the location and character of the irrigable lands, the sources of supply from which these lands can be watered and the possibilities of regulating the flow of streams by reservoirs."

Wireless Telegraphic communication will be established between five of the Hawaiian Islands by an American company. The distance over which communication will be established will vary from eight to sixty-one miles.

A free medical dispensary has been opened in Chinatown, San Francisco.

William H. Crocker, of San Francisco, has offered to defray the expense of sending out a party from the Lick Observatory to observe the total eclipse of the sun on Fifth Month 28th.

One cause assigned for the high price of paper is that mills across the Atlantic produced an unsatisfactory product last year, making an unprecedented demand in Europe for American paper.

There were 637 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 57 more than the previous week and 106 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 325 were males and 312 females: 111 died of pneumonia; 70 of consumption; 48 of heart diseases; 27 of convulsions; 26 of apoplexy; 22 of old age; 21 of diphtheria; 17 of measles; 17 of cancer; 15 of nephritis; 13 of inanition; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of bronchitis; 12 of congestion of the lungs; 12 of marasmus; 11 of influenza; 11 from casualties; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 from congestion of the brain, and 9 from septicæmia.

FOREIGN.—The British War Office makes public a despatch stating that Lord Kitchener has occupied the town of Prieska without opposition on the part of the Boers. President Steyn, of the Orange Free State, has issued a proclamation that all who sign declarations not to fight against the Republic shall be shot.

South African advices show that the Free Staters are surrendering and the British are making preparations for the invasion of the Transvaal. The Boers, however, have destroyed several railway bridges over the Modder River, and are said to be gathering their forces strongly at Kroonstad, in the northern part of the Free State, to oppose the British advance into the South African Republic. The burghers are also in considerable force in the Biggarsberg range, where they may make a stand.

A correspondent at Bloemfontein says: "Yesterday Paul Kruger issued a proclamation annexing the Free State to the Transvaal. President Steyn immediately issued a counter proclamation declaring the Free State intact."

If There Be Any Praise, Think on It.

We grow by what we feed on, or we may get ılth or diseases by the nature of our food. When a large variety seemed let down from aven for Peter to eat, and he was scrupulous out some that was presented, he was in-ıcted not to depreciate what God had eansed.

In food for thought which God hath cleansed, arge bill of fare is set before us by the ostle Paul. Things not common or unclean, ŧ wholesome and improving to think on, or ve the mind feed on, are these: "Whatsoever ings are true, whatsoever things are honest, ıatsoever things are just, whatsoever things e pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatso-er things are of good report; if there be any rtue, and if there be any praise" (Phil. iv : 8). be thinking on such subjects is good for the ul.

Many are prone to be thinking on whatsoever ings are the opposites of all these, and they base their minds accordingly. They cannot el at home with those whose minds are feed-g on the virtues and the praiseworthy things. Ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table ıd of the table of devils" (1 Cor. x : 21).

This last word we quote with an eye to its puted literal sense, that of "slanderer," or accuser of the brethren"—the spirit of de-ghting not to see "if there be any praise" in man or universe, but whatever there may be blame. This gloating over whatever is amiss others produces very uncompanionable char-cters. They are left to wonder why they are voided by that part of society which prefers think, and, accordingly, to talk, on whatso-ver there is to praise. They are not without ieir friendships. But how unsound is any riendship whose bond is a feeding together n the same unsound meat—the unsound parts f others' life; a bond of unity which gendereth darkness and mutual distrust, and fosters a dislike of "the love of love and hatred of hate."

"This I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment, that ye may approve the things that are excellent" (Phil. i: 10). The teachers of youth or of men, if they would minister to the uplift and reform of naughty characters, are not the scolders, but the encouragers. They find out something praiseworthy to develop, and by using that feature for all it is worth, often overcome much of evil with good, instead of denouncing the bad into worse. No indiscriminate flattery this, which speaks the truth in love both ways, and its reproof in love gets respect for its love known in praise.

But our present concern is for the character rather than the influence of the praiser and the blamer. Which do we intuitively regard as the more noble, the habit of admiration, or of contempt? Both need training. There is some use for the latter—as against sin, but never against the sinner. There is large use for the gift of admiration, which, though it may make its mistakes, can never grow too large for the glory which shall be revealed to the pure in heart. "Praise is comely for the upright," and the Holy One himself inhabiteth the praises of his people (Ps. xxii: 3).

But it is on the banks of deliverance that we learn the true gift of praise. No man knows how rightly to think on what there is to praise till he is in right harmony with the will and Spirit of his God, being reconciled to Him by the death of his Son; who tasted death, the wages of sin, for us, that we might live lives of righteousness and praise to Him for so great deliverance, when witnessed. His praise continually in our mouth or heart leaves no taste for personal denunciations or complainings. And a sense of the sympathy of our loving High Priest outrivals all that sympathy of human hearts, to bid for which we first began the habit of complaining of fellow-beings. So out of the same mouth there shall not proceed blessing and blaming, but only blessing.

So fearfully and wonderfully are our bodies made, that even right reason would indicate that the undevout anatomist is irrational. When a foremost one among the skilled surgeons of our land can declare to students his simple and undoubting allegiance to the gospel, it ought not to be so remarkable an instance as it is. Such a testimony we inserted week before last. A word or two should have been bracketed as ours, not his.

The "Learned Blacksmith" on our Civil War.

[The following letter from Elihu Burritt is properly followed by the tract ("Christians, Obey your Captain"), to which it relates.—ED.]

"NEW BRITAIN, Conn., Jan. 23d, 1862.

"E. MARIS, M. D.

"My Dear Sir:—I have inadvertently allowed your note of the 21st ult., and its interesting enclosure to remain unanswered to the present moment, which I greatly regret. The little tract entitled, "Christians, Obey your Captain," is an excellent exposition and application of the spirit and precepts of the Christian religion in regard to war. If they could only be brought to bear upon the conscience of the Christian community, they would be effective. But apparently the whole nation has gone into this war as if it were an exception from all other conflicts ever waged—as if it were holy or commanded of God. Ministers of all denominations and professing Christians of all sects, are as earnest for the vigorous prosecution of it as any other class of community. All these blessed and beautiful truths they insist, apply solely to individuals in their deportment and disposition to each other, not to governments, nations or large communities in their dealings with each other. If we could only bridge over this chasm, and make the world feel that our Saviour addressed these peace-breathing words to Governments as well as individuals, war would not be tolerated. I am glad that here and there one dares to hold up the pure standard of gospel truth against the flood-tide of this war-spirit which seems to cover the whole continent. I fear few, very few of once zealous advocates of peace have been able to stand against this tremendous movement. I have felt almost alone, isolated and silent in this crisis. I fear our American Peace Society has committed itself to a sanction of the war, and that it will hardly be able to recover solid ground on which to stand hereafter. I hope the Society of Friends have generally kept their foot-hold, and not been carried into the current, although I fear many among them have yielded. It is cheering to me to see such a testimony raised as that you sent me. If you should see [the authoress], I wish you would thank her for me for such a proof of her faith in the cause and principles of peace, at a time that truly tries men's souls.

"I have endeavored to put out some drops of oil on the troubled waters, but they produce no perceptible effect. I am confident if the compensated emancipation plan had been adopted by our Government this war would never have desolated the land. Now that the country is involved in it, I am trying to get a hearing for a plan of adjustment and Reunion, a mere statement of which I now enclose to you. I have written a lecture on the subject, but doubt if I can get a hearing for it. Behind these black clouds there is a sun, above this war-cursed world there is a God. So let us all hope on! Yours truly,

"ELIHU BURRITT."

Christians, Obey Your Captain.

BY MARY K. PASSMORE.

Reader, art thou a Christian? Art thou hoping and trusting that when the great and terrible day of judgment shall come, thou wilt be found pardoned through the atoning blood of the Redeemer of men?

If then thou would have Him confess thee before his Father which is in heaven, He has declared, thou must confess Him before men. (Matt. x: 32, 33.)

If thou wouldst be a Christian, thou must be Christ-like. Take not the maxims of the world as the rule of duty, but the commandments of the "Captain of thy Salvation." Let not the spirit of the world fill thy heart, but that Holy Spirit that redeemeth from the world.

Christianity is not a garb, to be thrown off at occasion; it is a pervading life; its advent was sung by angels—"glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will to men," and its Divine Founder announced that great principle of love which was to mark its rule in men. "But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you" (Matt. v: 44). Can we be his disciples if we trample these commandments under foot? Can we love Him and yet refuse our obedience?

Now when the tramp of assembling forces is heard through the length and breadth of our land, shall the clamor of the old law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy," drown the still small voice, "the faithful and true witness," in the soul? Oh that all who desire to follow Christ, would learn to obey his voice; then would they be his, and in the peculiar keeping of Him who has all power in heaven and in earth. Shall not He who rescued Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego from the burning fiery furnace, because they were faithful to Him, rescue a whole nation if they be also faithful? But faith and disobedience cannot go hand-in-hand. And obedience must be the obedience of faith, to avail anything. Now that it has to withstand a rushing current of popular feeling, the influence of a formal obedience may be washed swiftly away; while that whose power is the Truth, will stand in the eternal strength of truth, and gather to its source.

If we obey the injunctions of Christ, who laid down his very life for his enemies, we have great duties to perform. Who are our enemies? Who are they that curse us, that hate us, that would despitefully use us and persecute us? Alas! do we not feel that this is the spirit of our brethren in national bonds? the children of one mother country—the immortal children of the one Heavenly Parent—all hastening to one great judgment there to receive with us the reward of their deeds?

We must meet that Spirit, and if we are truly Christians we have no choice how we shall meet it. We need not look around on wrong doing or wrong suffering, on seeming necessity or national need: one duty above all others is ours; we have only to look singly to the Captain of our Salvation, and obey his orders. They are plain to all the world—"Love them," "bless them," "do good to them," "pray for them." Ah stubborn, ireful human heart, what a work is here! Thy Captain was crucified of evil men, crying, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do; and shalt not thou implore his Spirit to enable thee to drink of the cup He drank of?

Many thousands are pressing forward, ready to offer up life in the service of their country; too often in perfect recklessness of their undying souls. Art thou less willing to offer up thy life in thy Redeemer's cause? He may give thee his weapons and his armor, and use thee for the establishment of his kingdom of peace here on earth; or by thy "death" thou mayest be called to "glorify God." If so be, is it more to lay down thy life for thy Maker, than for thy country? If it be in his service and by his will, all is well; "a better country that is an heavenly" is the inheritance of all his faithful followers.

Yet it is not for want of love to our country that we must "obey God rather than man," but in true love to it. For there is no way of serving one's country so sure, so unmistakable, as by serving Him who holds its destiny in his hands. Do not ask what obedience can do for us in this awful crisis. "Prayers and tears come up before Him." Rest then in the boundlessness of Omnipotence, remembering that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will. It is his will his servants must labor to attain and not their own. And a great work is indeed before them. No passive idleness, no folding of the hands together, no weak repining. It is not enough that they "depart from evil," they must also "do good." Though "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal," they are "mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds . . and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ" (2 Cor. x: 4, 5).

Thus shall the glorious day be hastened, when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." How shall it ever come to nations, but by its spread in individuals? How shall the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ overcome its enemies, while its professing subjects rebel against its unalterable laws!

"Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps: who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not; but committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously" (1 Peter ii: 21, 22, 23).

LIVING ELOQUENTLY.—Speaking eloquently is the gift of a few, living eloquently is within the reach of all. Our lives can utter wonderful things in witness of our Master. William the Silent of lip was William the Eloquent of life. Those who are, to their own dismay, faltering and dumb in the prayer-meeting, may give forth in their daily life words of power and of praise. Indeed, life fervor is an essential element in all eloquence. Who would be won by the strongest appeal of the man he believed to be a hypocrite? Life eloquence is, after all, what counts for most. Well is it if we be gifted with the power of speaking to the point, but above all things is the message brought to the understandings of men by those who "with their lives express the holy Gos they profess."—*S. Reminiscences of the Life of William and Deb Dewees.

In moving from Belmont County, Ohio, Washington County, it is my present thoug that my father and mother did not real what they very much desired, which was a b tered condition for schooling their childr But these difficulties were met with the det mination to do the best they could. One of t log cabins already alluded to as being on t tract of land was moved to a more conveni place and fitted up for a school-house. A tea er was employed, and as many boarders w taken in as our house room could accomm date. A few of the well-disposed neighbo non-members of the Society of Friends, usua attended that school whenever in session. T preference was mainly on account of their miration of the eldest daughter of my pare as teacher. In this way it is believed that influence of my father and mother was felt good.

Nothing of special interest is now rem bered until I come to the year of 1842, twen third of Tenth Month. If, in writing the tory of that day and many succeeding ones, personal pronoun occurs more frequently t is pleasing to the critic's ear, it is of neces rather than choice, because I write of t which no other eyes beheld, and shall tell what no other tongue can tell, no other h can write. Though one elder brother still vives, he is so enfeebled with the infirmitie age as to be entirely unequal to such a t On the twenty-third of Tenth Month, 18 great was the affliction of my father's ho and I only am left alone to tell it.

On that memorable First-day morning, younger brother, then in the twelfth yea his age, and I, were riding on horseback in public road that crossed our father's h when the colts we were on appeared to t fright at a carriage coming in the rear, tho at quite a distance. Brother directly told that he could hold his no longer. Seeing my totally unable to render any assistance, ha enough to do to control my own, I bid stick to her and let her run, and she did maddened speed, and when twenty rods f the inlet to the barn, came up with our ca but was so infuriated as to have no regar her own safety, and ran with her breast ag the broad side of a cow, dashing it to the gr with such violence as to break its horn l from the skull. The filly turned a somers at full length. My brother was dashed t ground with great violence, and for an ins the three lay side by side. I dismounted, gi my colt a hurried hitching, and sprang t brother to help him up. But he was as hu as death, and blood was streaming from face. My screams attracted the attentio my older brothers, who at that moment placed the team and carriage in positio our parents and others to get in to go to m ing. My brothers came quickly. I wen great haste to the office of the late Dr. J Heustis, who seeing my condition, only as "Where shall I go?" And off he went a top of his speed, and perhaps the same tance was never ridden in less time, excep ofessional racers on a well-prepared track. brief examination developed the fact that sistance was necessary, and a messenger was spatched for the late Dr. George Michener. It seems in place here to say that, in a few nutes, reaction of the system of the apparitly dead boy took place. The blood that had tered the stomach was ejected. His sensiity was perfect. He told the bystanders that was so hurt that he must surely die, and de each a last farewell. But instead of death, asmodic delirium set in. The doctors were accustomed to such a scene, unprepared with table instruments, and of the use of chloro-rm they probably had not heard. The boy's ntal powers were gone into delirium, his ysical force to unnatural strength and vioce, so that it required all the strong hands at could get hold on him to keep the patient ficiently quiet for the surgeons to work. In s my father played his part, holding one of child's hands in each of his for more than e hours. A break in the scalp of the patient gan near the under part of one ear, crossing eyebrow, thence to the centre of the forehead, thence upward and backward till the wn was reached. The part thus encircled s entirely stripped, the scalp being pressed vn over the ear, and on the most prominent nt the skull was broken and pressed in on brain. Hence the delirium. The doctors re at their wit's end. His skull must be reved, and it was necessary to remove a porn of the unbroken bone ere that could be ne. No instrument was at hand, but a house penter that was on the spot brought forrd a very fine tennant-saw, with which the cessary cutting away was done. The strip skull removed was two inches in length by in breadth, the length being from front to ck. No break was made in the membrane rering of the brain. A plate of silver was pared to supply the place of the removed ll, but owing to the impracticability of sering it in place, its application was abaned. The scalp was necessarily shorn, in der to clear it of gore and other dirt. When e surgeons were ready to replace the removed lp it was, they said, as cold and lifeless as er it could be. There was no other covering that one-third of the head, so they brought n place by much pulling and stretching, sering it with several firm stitches. What the sequence might be they could not tell, but w their work of more than five hours' weari-ne effort was done. The further care must left to interested relatives and friends, ex-pt professional calls to see how the patient . No abatement in the suffering, only as ture became completely exhausted. Then, ain, the throes as of death, with screams of ony, were repeated, until death drew near to e relief. On the evening of the fourth day m the first the surgeons came, bringing each professional friend that wanted to see the nderful case. They examined the sufferer, d were of one mind, and thought proper to form my father and mother that their united gment was that, about the turn of the night, eir little boy would die. As midnight came d went, he passed into the dark valley of ath, and sank into what appeared everlasting ep. Still those having charge could perceive at he breathed.

The following morning being a bright, clear one, the sun shone in at his chamber window. It seemed as if the Sun of Righteousness arose with it. The child's eyes were opened, and he appeared as one aroused from refreshing sleep. He gazed upon those present, and was understood to pronounce the name of a cousin that he had not seen for several years. My readers cannot easily imagine the joy of my father's house. Yet we hardly dared to think it would last. But there was never after this an abortive freak of the mind, no more agonizing pain. He presently desired some victuals, and in a few days walked about the house. In due time the scalp, that had been so long detached and cold, began healing. The hair grew all over alike, and ere the winter was half past my little brother accompanied me to school. If any should wish to know what the treatment was, I will here set it down, viz: The bark of the elm tree steeped in cold water and laid on the head.

In this great affliction my father and mother stood side by side, and had the company and sympathy of all their surviving children. My father's already feeble constitution received in this a shock never to be overcome. My mother was followed through her remaining years with palpitation of the heart. My father went no more extensive journeys from home, but was diligent in doing what he could for the support of his family and for the good of the cause of Truth.

THE CAT IN THE BAG.—Little Arabella Frost was almost asleep. Her curly head was nestled on the soft pillow of her brass cot, and the dark lashes rested on her pink cheek. Almost asleep, but not quite— the little ears were still open, and she heard mother say to big brother Joe, "Then the cat is out of the bag."

"What cat, mother?" asked Arabella, sleepily, without opening her eyes.

"Never mind, baby; go to sleep," said the mother.

"What did they put the cat in the bag for?" Arabella asked herself. "It must be a wild cat." Just then she saw the bag—it was empty. She saw the cat—it looked very wild. It seemed to be biting and scratching many people, and in a great fright Arabella screamed and—woke up!

You see, she had gone off to sleep, and dreamed about the cat getting out of the bag, and mother had to take her on her lap to get the little girl quiet again.

Then mother told her that "Letting the cat out of the bag" meant telling a thing that ought not to be told, and that a story was sometimes just like the cat she had dreamed about—it hurt people when it ran about.

"If you hear anything ugly about your little playmates, darling," said her mother, "remember what the cat did when she got out, and tie your bag as tight as you can."

KNOWING that she had lived an exemplary Christian life, a visitor said: "I presume you are resting in a well-spent life." "Oh, yes," she whispered; "I am resting in a well-spent life, but not in my life, but in Christ's." A dying Christian, when reminded of the good he had accomplished, replied, "I think of my sins as all in one pile, and my good deeds as in another, and then I flee from both to Christ."

"Boy Wanted."

Roland stopped and looked at the above sign. It hung outside a large cutlery establishment, next to a store where there had been a big fire. He had made up his mind that he was old enough to look for work, and try to relieve mother. Should he go in? He hesitated, then, with all the courage he could command, went inside. He was sent back to a room where men on high stools were writing in big books, too busy to notice him, but a tall gentleman did, and questioned him so fast he could hardly answer.

"What kind of work do you expect to do? Don't know. Most boys do. Never worked out before. Suppose you think it's all play? Well," pointing to some steps, "go down there, and the man at the foot will tell you what to do."

Roland went down, and found half a dozen boys at work, with their sleeves rolled up, cleaning and polishing knives. The man at the foot of the steps looked up and said:

"Come to try your hand? Well, three have just left in disgust. Doesn't seem to be boy's work, somehow, but it's got to be done. You see," he said, picking up some knives and scissors and showing spots of rust on them, the water that saved our building the other night injured some of our finest goods. If you want to try your hand at cleaning I'll show you how. We pay by the dozen."

"'Tisn't fair," said one of the boys; "some have more rust on than others."

"If you don't like our terms you needn't work for us," said the foreman, and the boy, muttering that he wanted to be errand boy, and see something of life, left, while Roland went to work with a will. As he finished each piece he held it up, examined it critically, and wondered if mother would think it well done.

When the hour for closing came, the gentleman who had sent him down stairs appeared, and looking around at the boys, said:

"Well?"

"There is the boy we want," said the foreman, pointing to Roland. "He will take pride in doing anything you give him to do. He has been well trained."

Again the tall man spoke quickly:

"That's what we want. 'Boy Wanted' doesn't mean any kind of boy. Mother know you came? No? Well, take her your first wages, and tell her there's a place open to you here. Then put your arms around her neck, and thank her for teaching you to be thorough. If more boys were thorough, more boys would succeed in life."

"I guess, mother," said Roland, when he told her about it, "it was because I tried to do everything as you would like it. I forgot I was doing it because there was a 'Boy Wanted.'"

THE INFLUENCE OF ONE MAN.—In a fraternity hall, some weeks ago, a score of young men were talking loudly and vehemently about an action of the college faculty, which all thought was an infringement upon their rights. Speech after speech was made, invectives grew as they passed from mouth to mouth, and threats came fast. Finally, one little fellow, beckoning the rest to be silent, said:

"It has just occurred to me that we call ourselves gentlemen. We do not look it now. For myself I am ashamed."

After a moment's pause another said:

"So am I, old fellow; if we cannot endure the new law we can at least be polite in remonstrance."

Five minutes later the hall was empty, the insubordination in the college having died a peaceful death through the manly influence of one.—Christian Instructor.

Not Nursing a National Grievance.

A former attache of the Carlisle Indian Training School, Jenny F. Ericson, now engaged in education work at San Juan, Porto Rico, wrote an interesting and very temperate letter some months ago in behalf of the people of her native land, the Finns, in which she showed that, notwithstanding the recent harsh measures directed against them by the Russian Government, in violation of the solemn pledges of autonomy under their free constitution, made when Finland became a grand duchy of Russia, in 1809, this oppressed people had suffered the wrong in a restrained, Christian spirit. There had been no talk of armed rebellion, or of organizing bands of "patriots," but, instead, "they have learned that what is needed mostly now is strength, moral strength, and more light for the nation. Earnest labor in that direction is also progressively going on, and in connection with it the largest leading papers are most seriously advocating still more temperance work among the masses, as being one of the fundamental things to upbuild the people."

The grievances, in brief, complained of are: The order making obligatory the Russ language in all the schools of the Department, including the University of Helsingfors; the old Finnish coins to be put out of circulation, to be replaced by those of the Empire; the land system to be changed in a way that, it is claimed, means direct spoliation; the young men to be compelled to serve five years in the army, instead of three, as heretofore; and, withal, the imposition of onerous taxes to meet the additional outlay.

In a recent letter from Porto Rico, J. F. E. says of her people: "Yes, they are a patient kind of sufferers, but, just for that reason, I am sure they will come through all right in the end. Things look very dark there for the present, but I trust in our God. He will not let the enemy go too far, He will help in his time."

Referring then to a peace subject in her new island home, she adds: "We were seriously threatened to have the whole institution turned into a military one. But the man at the head of it, our principal [making himself badly known], was dishonorably discharged, and has left, fortunately. So the danger is over and the young minds at peace again."

In a communication, printed early this year in the Union Signal, the same writer, alluding to an article in a Washington paper from a present resident of the island, on "Porto Rico's Needs," gives her personal view that there are some things it pointedly does not need, to wit: Bucket shops, houses of immorality, and saloons. Having given some instances of drunken and disorderly conduct on the part of American soldiers, "scenes of debauchery and drunkenness disgusting in the extreme and a disgrace to American rule," she concludes: "Think of our being judged as a people by such exhibitions on the streets of San Juan! And the worst of it is, they are not rare. The officials, both civilian and military, are generally men of ability and character, but some of the odium of the wrongs committed here rests on every American resident, or, rather, they are held responsible, in the minds of the former authorities of the island for these things."

BY JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

Letters have been received from different villages, in response to the address sent out by the Committee of Philadelphia Friends, expressing emphatically their gratitude for the assistance that had been rendered them. From the translation of one signed by Simon Ribun, village Vosnesenie, secretary of the committee of the North Colony, the following is extracted:

"We had the happiness to receive the dear letter to us, sent by you of Second Month 14th of this year. We are very much pleased with your letter which we received, for which we are heartily and feelingly grateful for your instruction, as it is truth. We are thankful to the good people who have delivered us from bondage and brought us to this country. We are happy, not being in fear of oppression. Not a soul of the Northern Colonies desires leaving the free land of Canada. We are praying unto God our Lord that He may not deprive us of his heavenly mercy, and send us good crops this coming year, to enable us, a little at least, to gain strength and energy and cease to feed on the toil of others. Of course this depends on the will of God.

"We received through the committee of the Southern Colony 41 spinning wheels for our Northern District, as well as other articles. May the Lord bless you for all the kind deeds you have bestowed upon us. We greet you all, dear brothers and sisters, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Committee of the Northern Colony of the Christian Society of the Universal Brotherhood, as well as all our brothers and sisters."

Another letter, signed by Peter ——— on behalf of the village Terpenie (Patience), reads:

"To our Brother Friends, 12th March, 1900: From your brothers of the Christian Society of the Universal Brotherhood. The living and all those who remember, are praying unto our Lord Jesus Christ. He showed us the path to his salvation, and has inspired us with faith and strength. He is the Light of the world. Our Lord is high above all nations, and his glory over all the world. By his charity and grace we are spending our lives peaceably, thanking God our Lord, and praising Him for his abundant mercy on us, as well as on all his followers. We believe there are many good people in the world who are following his steps. Beloved brothers and sisters, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, we send you our hearty greeting and our fervent love. May God and Jesus Christ send to you peace and blessing and more and more unto you and your children, joys, consolation and peace to your souls.

A correspondent in Winnipeg notes the re- ption of quite a number of donations from stant points, to be dispensed at her discre- n. She speaks of having furnished one vil- ge with a cow, and has forwarded condensed lk to another village that had no cow. She so states that 1800 pounds of dried fruit and s have been sent to the Prince Albert dis- ct, and the shipping list has been received the two carloads of dried fruit mentioned a previous report, with a prospect of as much re being on the way. These, with other con- butions, alleviate, but it still requires vigi- ce to keep the new settlers from suffering want of proper nourishment and clothing. In regard to various rumors that have come us from time to time, of endeavors being de by interested parties in California to in- ce them to migrate to that State, it does not ear to have had the sanction of the Douk- ors. The American Negro.

"Nothing succeeds like success." It is pleasant to have lent a hand to something that does succeed. Whatever success has been attained by the American Negro, to it have Friends early and often contributed.

Said a turbaned cook about her Quaker mistress: "These Quaker ladies they do plant their words so sweet, but they gets out of us a heap of work."

The cook was right—therein lay the secret of the success. Not a slave, not an humble dependent have they made the Negro, but an earnest toiler and self-respecting self-supporter.

As such he has had a share of success. His unrequited years of patieut suffering labor, his innate longing to be free, roused a nation to his help and broke his bonds.

And now, when with hands that are his own, he can—

"Breast the wave of circumstance
And grapple with his evil chance,"

he sometimes proves at what good value he is held.

Not long ago a Negro orator told a Philadelphia audience how the best tax paying Negroes of Georgia, by common consent, met in Atlanta, to defeat a proposed ballot law which unfairly discriminated against their race, and how, taking the members of the Legislature by the hand, they utterly killed the bill, through soft persuasions and the force of their own recognized worth.

This well known orator also told how the Negroes determined to emigrate in a body from a certain country of Georgia, to be rid of abuse by the whites, and how the whites, in consternation prevailed on them to stay. But alas! this fervid orator, further told, that a way had been found to throw into jail the particular Negro who incited his fellows to emigrate.

Did we say, alas? We will not say it. For defeats, struggles, trials, temptations as overcome, are but rounds of the ladder by which we climb to strength and victory.

Still, early and often should Friends help the Negro to climb; still often remember the words—"Bear ye one another's burdens."—On behalf of Friends' Freedman Association.

THAT we are successful against one form of temptation is no assurance that temptation will not come to us again in the same form or in a variety of forms. The devil leaves one after a defeat, but it is only for a season, and usually a very brief season at that.

A SCOTCH POEM ON "STERLING STUFF."

I wouldna gie a copper plack
For ony man that turns his back
On duty clear;
I wouldna take his word or note,
I wouldna trust him for a groat,
Nor lift an oar in ony boat
That he might steer.

When things are just as things should be
And fortune gies a man a plea,
Where'er he be,
It isna hard to understand
How he may walk through house and land
Wi' cheerin' face and open hand Continually.

But when i' spite o' work and care,
A man must loss and failure bear,
He merits praise
Who will not to misfortune bow,
Wha cocks his bonnet on his brow,
And fights and fights, he kens na how,
Through lang, hard days.

I wauldna gie an auld bawbee
For ony man that I could see
What disna hold
The sweetness o' his mither's name,
The kindness o' his brother's claim,
The honor o' a woman's fame,
For mair than gold.

But gie him praise, whose love is pain,
Wha wronged forgives and loves again,
And though he grieves,
Lets not the dear one from his care,
But loves on mair, and mair, and mair,
And bides his time wi' hope and prayer
And still believes.

Comments on Ministers.

A Letter from John Letchworth to Thomas Kite, found Among the Papers of the Late William Kite.

EAST FALLOWFIELD, First Month 4th, 1817.

Dear Thomas:—A rainy morning, after such very fine weather as we have had for some time past, makes things look gloomy, and this gloom is not lessened by sickness of three in my family. . . . . .

In this situation a desire arises to communicate one's ideas to an absent friend. This has, in some measure, been the case this morning, and the language of Jeremiah to his scribe revived so forcibly that I feel a freedom to mention it: "Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not." This, thou wilt remember, was said at a time when the Prophet saw the captivity that awaited the Jews, and after the Israelites were in bondage.

I have not heard, but suppose by this time thou art admitted into the [Meeting of Ministers and Elders.] If it be not so, never mind, be patient. "Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not." If thou art admitted, what, then, is before thee? To become a great minister? "Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not."

I often hear tell of great ministers, and unless I deceive myself, hear it without envy. Now shall we for a moment consider what it is that constitutes a great minister, in order to see whether this attainment is within our reach, and if it be, why not aim at it? Surely one would think it as well to have a good name as a bad one, to be a good workman as a poor one. Now what criterion shall we go by? By what rule shall we judge? Common fame is the rule in courts to judge of a man's character, but in this instance, it should seem, we ought to confine it to members of our own Society. And why? Because this people profess to be led and guided by the Spirit of Truth. Well, be it so. Hear what is said: "Such a one spoke largely, I think not less than an hour and a half or two hours. He is a great minister." "Well, for my part, I must confess my head was not sufficient to contain all. I was glad when he sat down. I even thought that the few words dropped by the other Friend carried as much weight with them as all the other put together." "I don't like your popper," says a third. Again, "Such a one is a great minister; and she has a most beautiful delivery. Her voice is quite musical." "Well, now, I thought when I heard her, what a pity it was that there had not been some good elder with her in her early setting out, to have prevented her singing, instead of preaching." "Well, I admire at this. How dost thou admire the delivery of such a one?" "Why, I think he delivers himself in a very clear, distinct, intelligible, manly manner." "Well, now, I think he seems to read his sermon over like a boy saying his lesson."

Thus, Thomas, have I given a short specimen of the many observations which are made on ministers in our Society, and by members, too! From what I have said it must appear evident that he who seeks greatness from the source of his fellow-members' good judgment, will find he is entering a labyrinth, from which it will be hard to extricate himself—nay, it may end in irremediable woe. But there is a path, a path of safety, and this is the path of clear, plain duty. As this is kept in, and we journey forward, although we may be stripped and wounded by those thieves and robbers, although the priest and the Levite may look on and pass us by on the other side and make no observations at all, yet, when the good Samaritan comes along he will pour in the wine and the oil, bind up our wounds and set us upon his Beast. Thus it will be done unto the man or woman whom the King delighteth to honor, and I believe it is those he delighted to honor who seek the honor that cometh from Him and not from man, whose breath was in his nostrils. Therefore: "Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not," but be of good cheer. So saith thy loving uncle,

JOHN LETCHWORTH.

RICHARD CLARIDGE, 1699, in stating the belief of Friends on the subject of justification, says: "By the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ without us, we truly repenting and believing, are, through the mercy of God, justified from the imputations of sins and transgressions that are past, as though they had never been committed, and by the mighty work of Christ within us, the power, nature and habits of sin are destroyed, that as sin once reigned unto death, even so now grace reigneth, through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ, our Lord. And all this is effected, not by a bare or naked act of faith separate from obedience, but in the obedience of faith, Christ being the author of eternal salvation to none but those that obey Him."

"It is easier to talk and work for Christ than to give ourselves to Him. It is easier to offer God a few activities than to give Him a heart."

MANIFESTO OF THE BRITISH COMMITTEE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRUSADE OF PEACE ADDRESSED AT THE TIME OF THE HAGUE CONFERENCE TO THE CONTINENTAL PRESS.

On the eve of the meeting of the Conference called by the Czar of Russia, for the purpose of seeking by means of international discussion the most effectual method of ensuring to all peoples the benefits of a real and durable peace, and above all, of putting an end to the progressive development of the present armamaments, we, the undersigned British editors, venture to address our fellow workers throughout Europe on the relationship of the press to this great movement. Feeling the responsibility which rests upon the press as the most powerful influence in the formation of public opinion, we are desirous, not only of doing what we can to influence the people of our own country in favor of his imperial majesty's proposals, but of securing the co-operation of our fellow editors in other countries in the same work. We do not doubt that you will agree with us in feeling that the enormous power of the press ought to be directed to the reconciliation of the different peoples of the world, the furtherance of their common interests, and the support of any measure that promises a general lightening of their burdens. All the best traditions of our profession point to the duty which this occasion imposes upon it, that popular movement in support of the ideas contained in the Czar's message, which has evoked almost unanimous support among the British people, has been initiated also in several Continental countries, and will spread through the length and breadth of Europe, if the press will take the lead. In the international crusade of peace, men and women of various nationalities, classes, parties and creeds, have agreed to unite in a demand which they believe means gain for all and loss for none. The international organization is in course of development, and we feel assured that it needs only the co-operation of the press to produce an irresistible demonstration of goodwill and good sense.

"Gentlemen.—On the eve of the Hague conference you addressed an appeal to your colleagues of the press in all Europe, in which you reminded them of the grave responsibility resting on the press as a moral power wielding the strongest influence on public opinion, and summoning their co-operation in the work of securing to all peoples the benefits of a real and lasting peace. Strong in the knowledge of being the leaders of public opinion in a country where it is sovereign, you solemnly proclaimed that international organization is already developed, and only needed the aid of the press to make it complete.

May I thank the Society of Friends in Hereford and Radnor, for your kindness in expressing your kind sympathy with me in my poor efforts to arouse the people to a sense of Christian duty. We face an unwilling audience just now, to which the muzzle is more handy than reason. Wherefore we have to bide our time till the better mind of the nation begins to stir, and we become aware of the infinite mischief which the present war fury is doing to the permanent credit and good of our country, at home and abroad. One ought to preach on, "What is a man profited if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" as we, by incessant grasping, seem likely to do.—Letter from the Dean of Durham to Clerk of Hereford and Radnor Monthly Meeting, England.

Notes from Others.

The sermon of a Christian minister is nothing and worse than nothing, if it be not filled with the spirit of the Gospel, says the New York Observer.

There appeared recently in the Independent an article on the "Freedom of Hearing." The substance of the article was about this: The church belongs to the people; the minister is hired by the people; therefore, the minister should preach what the people wish to hear; he should scratch the "itching ears" of the hearers.

In the course of recent remarks on "The Automatic Judgment Seat in Man," N. D. Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, a professed Presbyterian, said:

"The Confession of Faith says that certain men and angels are foreordained to everlasting death, being particularly and unchangeably designed and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished, and every young man who enters the Presbyterian Church has to solemnly swear to believe and teach this frightful view. And every attempt to revise and expel that statement from the Creed has been successfully combatted by a majority that wishes to retain the doctrine.

"It would seem as if a man would prefer to be burned at the stake rather than hold or assert or charge such infinite cruelty upon the all merciful and all loving God. The day the scholastics wrote that chapter in the Confession of Faith they got the devil confused with God."

While we sympathize with his abjuring the doctrine of foreordination, as Calvanism holds it, we deem it would be no persecution, but only honesty to their doctrine on the part of Presbyterians to disown one who has separated himself from it, and only honesty in him to resign a membership to whose conditions he cannot be true.

A. F. von Tobel, of Edge Hill, Pa., is said to have caused quite a sensation by public remarks, in which he said: "The Church, I believe, boasts too much of its past. Its victories when measured by what the Church ought to have done could almost be looked upon as defeats. We look at our edifices and congratulate ourselves at our grand institutions and say: 'See what we have wrought!' But when we look at the millions still in the darkness of heathendom and the millions more in a worse darkness than that which spreads over India, China or Africa, we hang our heads in shame.

"The Church is attacking little unfortified hamlets of the enemy and allowing the great strongholds of the devil to remain unmolested. Do we call this victory?

"But through the Church we go back to the individual. It is in the life of the individual members of the Church that we find the cause of our comparative defeat. The electric current is sent only along the insulated wire. Bring it in contact with the earth in several places and the power is soon spent. The only way the Church is ever to win a victory in which heaven will rejoice is by insulation from the world.

"Let every member of the Church of God ask the question: 'What would the Church be if composed of members all such as I?'"

The Secretary of State and the Spanish Minister in Washington have signed a protocol extending for six months the time allowed Spanish residents in the Philippines to elect whether they shall remain Spanish subjects or adopt the nationality of the territory in which they reside.

The Secretary of War has created a new military "Division of the Pacific," embracing all of the Philippine Islands, under the command of General Otis. It will be sub-divided in four departments—Northern Luzon, under General MacArthur; Southern Luzon, under General Bates; the Viscayas, under General Hughes, and Mindanao and Jolo, under General Kobbe.

The duties of the new Philippine Commission were discussed very fully at a Cabinet meeting. The little chat between the President and his advisers in the White House will probably be the law for 12,000,000 Filipinos for a year or two to come. It was agreed that the Commission will have entire responsibility for the temporary civil legislation for the islands until Congress stops debating and passes a law of some kind. The Governor General is to be the Executive of the Philippine Government, and will execute the laws made by the Commission. The latter body, by the agreement reached, is to be supreme and final as to all laws necessary for the government of the islands, except in extremely important cases. Then there must be recourse to the advice and direction of the President. The Commission is expected to draft a code and set up the entire civil government of the islands. It will be some time before this is done, as the President asks that the Commission look the islands all over by tours in a body throughout the archipelago. Then when they understand all the conditions they are to take their pens in hand and go to writing the laws. As soon as the Commission has determined on a policy, each member of the Commission will be assigned to one of the four military departments into which the islands have been divided by Secretary Root, and there he will look after the legislative affairs of the people under him. Thus one man will be making laws for about 3,000,000 people, of almost infinite diversity of intelligence, race, language and industrial conditions.

After a voyage, the longest on record, from Cebu, P. I., to Boston, the British steel four masted bark Ancona was towed across Massachusetts Bay, Third Month 29th. She is laden with 18,300 bales of hemp, the largest cargo of the kind shipped to this country. The Ancona sailed Eighth Month 5th, and her long voyage occasioned anxiety and reinsurance at Lloyd's, London. The rate advanced until she was spoken near the equator in the Atlantic. She was next heard from the Barbadoes, where she put in to replenish her depleted stock of provisions, resuming her passage Second Month 23d. For the past week she has been off the coast endeavoring to reach Boston.

Since the Ancona left Cebu with her enormous cargo hemp has doubled in value, and at present is quoted at 15½ cents per pound. This means a big profit for the owners. The total valuation of the vessel's cargo is placed at $800,000.

Exports from the United States to Asia and Oceanica have trebled since 1894. In that calendar year we sent $30,729,262 to the section named. In 1899 (Twelfth Month estimated) we shipped upwards of $90,000,000.

A. R. Peacock, Vice-President and General Sales Agent of the Carnegie Steel Company, who made a record breaking run across the continent, arrived in Pittsburg Third Month 30th, making the journey from Los Angeles to that city, 2731 miles, in seventy-five hours and four minutes.

The lowering of the railroad grain rate from Chicago to New York to 10 cents has resulted in about 75 per cent. of the grain in Chicago being contracted for by rail. This will release a considerable portion of the Chicago grain fleet and make it available for the 20,000,000 bushels of wheat which will be ready for shipment from Duluth by the opening of navigation.

The scheme, originated by Sir Thomas Lipton, for supplying good food to the poor at the lowest possible cost came into active operation in the opening of the Alexandra Trust Dining Rooms, of London. The undertaking was inaugurated by Sir Thomas Lipton placing in the hands of the Princess of Wales, who had from the first taken a deep personal interest in the project, a large sum of money for its development. Three well ventilated dining-rooms, each comfortably accommodating 500 people, occupy separate floors. On either side of the spacious entrance hall is a small office, at which the customer obtains a ticket to be exchanged at the buffet for the meal ordered—breakfast, dinner or tea. The cooking is done by steam on so extensive a scale that a ton and a half of potatoes can be cooked in an hour, and 2,000 dinners are always ready. A bakehouse is attached to the building, the kneading being performed by electricity. The result of so much efficient organization is that a three course dinner of excellent quality is to be obtained for four and a half pence, this being the highest charge on the menu. It must be borne in mind that the Alexandra dining-rooms are by no means to be considered in the light of a charitable undertaking. The prices have been calculated with an allowance for profit, and 10,000 being the anticipated daily average of customers served, a return of 3 per cent. on the capital is expected. The profits are in any case to be devoted towards extension and improvement.

The Letter and the Life.

ne depressing weakness and encumbrance ur system—and probably of any system—en and women not anointed with the spirit
h the system was meant to conserve.
o say nothing of inconsistent members, we two kinds of consistent members, those are faithful to the system, and those who faithful also to the principle intended to be odied.
ow, the system was made for the principle, not the principle for the system. True istency with the system must consist in ifulness to its inner life and spirit. Such ifulness will make a conformity to the out-l system that has value, for it is living.
the body without the spirit is dead—if the r killeth—nothing can be born of it. Only spirit can make it alive. True faithfulness ne spirit, then, evolves its own consistent is. As the forms are fitted to conserve and itate the free course of their genuine spirit, cially between men as members one of anr, they are themselves conserved by the e spirit. A literal conformity to the forms not create the spirit, yet may keep open annel for its freer course. But there is a ger line, past which a literal conformity will ch the spirit, namely, where it stands as ubstitute.
uch substitution men are most naturally ne to adopt. More men can be usually be d faithful to a system than to its principle.
y get the credit of consistency, neverthe—indeed, probably more—but it is of the ace kind, the letter which can spell spirit out living it, having a form of the life, t denying the power thereof." So, as a
, we look for the churches of Christendom ch are the most outward in their observes, to be the largest in numbers, and the t inward and spiritual to be among the llest.

While an outward consistency is valuable for the sake of serving and conserving the operation of its inward life, yet our anxiety must be placed on the revival of its creative and quickening spirit, which, as it comes into dominion, will be the true perpetuator of its own testimonies. But a lapse into the dominion of the system without the life is a precursor of death, or else of revolution. Here or there we have seen sufficient warnings of both.

We believe there is a signal place on earth for our system of principles, doctrines, testimonies and modes of proceeding adapted to them. But what our welfare loudly calls for is an individual yearning, exercise and travail that this goodly heritage may be revisited and refilled with the baptism of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. It is idle for the membership to look every man to his neighbor and every man to his brother, saying, "Know the Lord," while deaf to the voice which says, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me!" Let the one anxiety of each he to pray, "Lord, is it I? I have need to be baptized of Thee!"

Two Classes of Forms.

By some readers of the above remarks the Society of Friends may be bantered with an alleged inconsistency, as of protesting against all forms in religion, and at the same time clinging very closely to forms of our own.

The criticism lacks right discrimination. We never have abjured all forms, but only those which come between the soul and God, interfering in that living intercourse of true worship for which it is the place of Friends to testify.

There are two principal classes of forms in religion, namely:

1. Forms of worship, or modes designed for men's expression of themselves towards God. The lifting up of our hearts to Him is necessary, but no mode of our doing it is necessary to "God, who knoweth the hearts." While every expression of man in the flesh assumes some mode, yet there is no evidence that the Searcher of hearts requires a set mode in order to understand us. So, as He seeks such as worship Him in Spirit and in Truth, we would discard the form as He does.

2. Forms of testimony, or modes through which men express themselves to men. These are necessary to human beings, who cannot understand our meanings without recognized forms of outward expression.

Of the first class, or forms of worship, it may be said that, though the Searcher of hearts knows every motion of our hearts' worship without outward words from us, and though He has in the Scriptures of the New Dispensation insisted on no stated forms of worship for his Church and people, yet do not men need them for themselves, even if He does not?

We believe that He who by his Spirit speaks immediately to our condition, provides immediately for a man's need of expression in the unstudied cry, testimony or message of the heart which He prompts. But what we object to is men's providing it for other men in his place—prescribing stated or uniform exercises and set modes for worship, irrespective of what may be the Spirit's direction on each occasion. He alone, the Head over all things to his Church, sees what expression the soul of the speaker or the hearer needs, and to those who truly wait upon Him He will provide exercises of his own bringing forth. So while all language must be cast in some form of expression, we would not by stated and prescribed forms preclude the freedom and dominion of the Spirit.

The case is different where the Society has to express its standing testimony to men. It is men to whom testimonies of Truth and for Truth are directed and addressed. It is men that need definite standards of expression which shall be uniformly distinctive, and not wavering with an uncertain sound or aspect. It is men to whom unvarying custom of testimony teaches the meaning of its language and lesson, and it is men to whom a shifting and changeable form of testimony dissipates or stultifies its meaning. Therefore we set a value on long recognized forms of testimony, to conserve them for the good of the readers of them; and we set as little value as possible on forms of worship which we believe the Father of Spirits does not need in order to understand us, nor in order to communicate grace to us, since his inspiration and life are immediately imparted,—or imparted sometimes through an instrumentality, as He may for the time being immediately choose and livingly use one. To put the distinction briefly—For worship we deny the necessity of forms towards God; but for testimony we own them towards men.

But as every act of obedience is an act of worship, and our testimonies are not living and true save as acts of obedience, they are involved with all those works of faith and duties of daily living which belong to worship. While there may be thus an indirect danger of resting in these outward things as forms of worship instead of in the life of worship, it would not be Quakerism, but carnality and superstition that would make the danger. For "they that are after the Spirit do mind the things of the Spirit."

Master Bullock's Boys.

As guest at a banquet of Massachusetts legislators one evening last week, I discovered three very chummy fellows, whom I knew well. Their explanation for their great friendship was, "We are Master Bullock's boys. All in the same class."

Samuel J. Bullock, principal of the Bunker Hill School, was a pupil of mine once upon a time, hence my interest in the story of Representative Tarbox, Barbour and Roberts. The Bunker Hill School is now located among the blue-bloods. These boys were not ambitious for specially prosperous lives. One of them, according to his own story, was decidedly inclined to be reckless. Steadily Master Bullock's presence and words improved them, and the year in his room developed manliness and purpose. The reckless one, however, took to the sea, went to the West Indies, then shipped to the East Indies, and upon his return went up to the old school. S. J. Bullock sat down with him and said, "Are you making the most of yourself? It always seemed to me that you had in you the making of more of a man than I fear you are making of yourself." The young man went out of Bullock's presence with the determination that he would show his teacher that he had indeed the making of more of a man than he was. Similarly and incidentally each of the others was inspired by Master Bullock. These three Representatives are honored by their neighbors, and are successful and useful men. They said, "We three fellows are going over to see Bullock soon, and we propose to have him come over to the State House and take a seat on the floor some day."

This is merely a sample of the influence of a multitude of schoolmasters all over this broad land. The character of the man, his interest in the boys and girls, his incidental direction of their thought and purpose is of infinite moment to America. May the day never come when the schoolmaster is so absorbed over the petty details of devices, methods, courses of study and other affairs that he has not time and strength to focus his interest on the character and aspirations of his boys.

One man like Samuel J. Bullock, and there are many of them, is worth more to the State than many men in business, professional and political life, who labor primarily for their own success and glory. He is content to be unknown to fame so long as his boys go out into the world's activities to win success and honor. It is but natural that I take pride in such a record of one who was once a pupil of mine in the normal school. What a chain of influences life is.—Editor of the Journal of Education.

"ONE of the most fundamental truths of Quakerism, and we might just as well say of Christianity, as it is taught in the New Testament, is the teaching that the living Spirit works directly upon the human spirit, and guides the individual in all things he should do or say."

Reminiscences of the Life of William and Debby Dewees.

In the Twelfth Month of 1844 my eldest brother married, and settled temporarily in Westmoreland County, Pa. In the early part of the year 1846 Friends of our part were wont to send a quantity of produce to Ireland to tide her people over the destitution caused by the failure of the potato crop the previous year. My father made several barrels to hold the contributions, which were chiefly of corn and beans. In the Tenth Month of 1847 another son was married at a meeting of Friends, now extant, at St. Clairsville, Belmont County, Ohio. Mainly on account of feebleness, my father and mother were not present on either of these interesting occasions. For the latter a tenement was prepared on the farm and near by the parental abode.

In the Eleventh Month, 1848, my parents had the privilege of giving an entertainment for the marriage of their first-born to a Friend in good standing. This marriage was solemnized in a meeting of the Society of Friends at Chesterfield, Morgan County, Ohio.

My parents continued mostly able to go to meeting. Father, preferring to drive, generally had a full load. In the First Month of 1850, the road being rough, after attending the Monthly Meeting on Seventh-day, my parents stayed over at the house of a Friend, not far from the place of worship, after which they came home. My father, evidently very poorly, but being disinclined to complain, sat in his accustomed place near the open wood-fire, assuming his wonted cheerfulness. Before retiring for the night he accepted some proffered remedies that were always kept within easy reach.

The following morning it was evident that his strength was failing, with inability to discharge the phlegm, even by the most violent coughing. The lungs were losing their vitality and breathing was laborious. In the after part of the day, with his consent, his choice friend and doctor, Isaac Heustis, was called, who, after examination, advised some remedies, saying that he believed the patient was no worse than he had frequently seen him. In the evening, at the usual time, he desired that all might retire, but a neighbor, having called to see how my father did and watch a part of the night, he and I felt best satisfied to sit quietly by the embers on the hearth until the turn of the night, at which time I went softly to my father's room, which he taking notice of, desired that all might be at rest. Returning to my friend, I proposed that, as my father wished, we would retire. Ere reaching our allotted place, I noticed a catch in my father's breathing, and turning quickly that way, perceived that death had seized his victim. This was another great shock to my mother's sensitive feelings.

Interment was made in the cemetery belonging to the Society of Friends at Chesterfield, Morgan County, Ohio, not far from the tomb that was made for his daughter, when he was far distant helping to publish the glad tidings of the Gospel.

From this time, through this sketch, my mother may be considered as standing al the head of the family, having three unm children and a foster son and daughter at with her. I believe, not saying overmuch we were equal objects of her care and tude.

My father left a will constituting my brother and sister his executors. Our leg visement was, that the latter, having as another name, was disqualified. My siste settled, with her husband, in a distant p the State, my brother in the State of Pe vania. Each was informed of the ci stances we were placed under. Coals of Fire.

Nellie stood by the kitchen table watching nma make a cake. It was a bright, clear rning, and almost any other time Nellie ld have been outdoors at play, but she was y much interested in something mamma was ng, so she preferred to stay in the kitchen watch her.

Mamma had been making gingerbread cakes, just now she was decorating a most re- rkable gingerbread soldier. He was a very ce looking soldier, with his features plainly ned in pink and white icing, and a row of tons down the front of his coat, with epau- that gave him a very martial air.

"Oh! oh! he's just beau-tiful!" exclaimed lie, in delight, as mamma put on the finish- touches. "Oh, isn's he a splendid coal of ?"

Mamma laughed, as if she thought the sol- was a very funny coal of fire, but she knew at Nellie meant. Yesterday the little girl come home from school in tears to tell her nma how hard she had been working to get examples done that afternoon that she ht have all next day to herself, and just n she got them finished, with the answers correct, her deskmate rubbed a wet sponge r the slate and spoiled her work.

Wasn't it too mean for anything?" she said, rily. "I do think Mary Neil is just the nest, hate—"

Hush, dear," said mamma, gently.

Well, mamma, it's every word of it true," sted Nellie. "And I'm just going to pay back, so I am. I wish I knew of some ."

Perhaps I can help you," said mamma.

Nellie forgot to cry, in her amazement, and she stared at her mother with wide open eyes. She could scarcely believe her ears. Was her mother actually going to help her revenge herself upon Mary for her unkind act?

But mamma's next words made her meaning plain. It was not in the way that Nellie had expected that she was going to help her.

"Suppose you try the effect of 'coals of fire?'" suggested mamma.

"I'd like to if they were real, live, burning coals," she answered; "but I know you don't mean that. You mean that I must do something kind to her; but, indeed, mamma, it wouldn't do her any good. She's always teasing me, and it wouldn't make her a bit better to be kind to her."

"Have you ever tried it," asked mamma.

"No," answered Nellie.

"Then suppose you try, just once."

"Well, I'll try, but I know just what it will amount to," answered Nellie, very positively.

"I'll tell you what would be a nice coal," she exclaimed, after a minute's thought. "Won't you make me a lovely gingerbread cake to give her, like the ones you always make us on Saturday? She hasn't got any mother, you know, and her aunt never makes her anything nice."

So mamma made the gingerbread soldier the next morning when she was doing her baking, and Nellie was actually anxious for school morning to come that she might see Mary's surprise when she should give it to her. She was surprised to find how her angry feelings were fast disappearing, and when she carefully wrapped up her soldier and started off to school, she watched for Mary as eagerly as if she had been her best friend.

When she reached the school-house she found that Mary was already there, putting her desk in order. Nellie slipped quietly up behind her and put the soldier in her hands.

Mary gave an exclamation of delighted surprise, and then looked around to see who had given her the cake.

"Don't you like it?" said Nellie, smiling brightly. "My mamma made it on purpose for me to give you."

For a moment Mary did not answer, then she threw her arms around Nellie's neck.

"I'm just ashamed to take it, after I have been so mean to you," she whispered. "But I won't ever, ever tease you again as long as I live."

Nellie returned her embrace warmly, delighted at the results of the "coals of fire," and the two little girls soon became warm friends, instead of quarreling and finding fault with each other as they had been in the habit of doing.

I wish that every little boy and girl could be persuaded to try Nellie's plan when they have a grievance against any of their little companions, and I am sure that they will find it the best way.—Early Dew.

Selections from the Letters and Memoranda of Robert Milhous.

My dear father was favored to feel true resignation to this great bereavement, which came in the evening of his days, and his spirit seemed in a very humble, child-like state, earnestly seeking to be made entirely ready, when the summons should come to him. His physical health was pretty good for one of his age, but it was evident that his strength was failing. In the fall of 1895 he was very feeble, so much so that it hardly seemed prudent for him to look toward attending our Yearly Meeting. He had never been absent from one of these yearly gatherings since my recollection. As the time drew near, he felt best satisfied to go, although it seemed to outward appearance that he was not able for the fatigue of the trip. He attended two or three meetings, when he was taken more poorly, having a slight paralytic stroke, which affected him both physically and mentally. For several days he was in a very critical condition, and his physician thought it quite uncertain about his being able to return home. But he rallied somewhat, and we were truly thankful that he was once more permitted to reach that spot, so dear to both of us. Before we left the neighborhood of Barnesville, he attended the meeting at Ridge and was much favored in testimony, although his mind was quite clouded in regard to the ordinary affairs of life. After reaching home, he continued to labor under the same difficulty for five or six weeks, although we could notice a slight improvement. Finally the cloud seemed to be lifted, almost at once, and his mental faculties ever after remained bright and clear, until a very few minutes before he passed away. He seemed indeed to grow brighter and brighter, I trust, "until the perfect day."

On the twelfth of First Month he was at our little meeting for the last time. That day, in the afternoon, he wrote the following letter to a dear niece, which was the last letter he wrote, with the exception of a few lines to his nephew and niece, Barclay and Hannah Smith, at whose home he was very tenderly cared for while so ill, when he was at Barnesville:

"My Dear Niece, H. V.:—Thy very acceptable letter came to our hands a few days ago, and was read with comfort and much interest, and it has rested on my mind much since the reading of it to try once more to pen a few lines, in a fresh feeling of that love, I trust which desires the welfare of all, but perhaps I might admit more particularly, those who are my most near connections as to kindred. It seems increasingly a task for me to write as age advances, and the solemn feeling often comes over my mind, when writing to a relative or dear friend, that this may be my last to thee (whoever it might be), and so at the present, as thou may understand that should my life be prolonged until the fifteenth of Fourth Month next, I should be eighty-five years old. It really, at times, seems marvellous in my eyes, that my life and my natural faculties have been preserved as well as they are through so many bereavements and deep trials, known only to Him who beholds us, just as we are, and knoweth all our down sittings and our uprisings, and is acquainted with all our ways. But, dear one, I hope I do not claim or convey to thy mind that I am complaining of these trials and deep provings, but hope they have proven as a means of causing more earnestly to cleave unto Him who has all power in heaven and earth, and who, I have cause to believe, has hitherto borne me up above the billows which have at seasons seemed to threaten to overwhelm me. O, may I be enabled to continue to look still unto Him, and to cast all my care upon Him, as unto a faithful Creator, unto the end, is the fervent desire of my heart. Poor and unworthy and unfit as I feel myself to be, it seems to be laid upon me, from time to time, to labor publicly for the eternal welfare of my fellow-beings, and to-day, at our little meeting, I thought I was again called upon to bear witness to that religion which is of the power of God unto salvation, through our Lord Jesus Christ, the propiatory sacrifice for our sins, in which I felt peace. . . I have no doubt, dear Hannah, but thou hast, as well as myself, had to pass through sore trials, in which I have sympathized with thee, but I feel that all that I can do for thy help and comfort is to commend thee to the care and protection and keeping of the unslumbering Shepherd of his people, 'whom to know is life eternal.' And my desire is for my poor self and for thee, that we may be favored, day by day, to experience the great work of redemption, going on to completion, that we may be cleansed from every defilement of sin and clothed upon with the 'white robe, which is the righteousness of the saints.' I feel comforted in the hope and belief, that thou wilt be favored to know the Lord to be thy refuge, and that underneath are the everlasting arms, and let me encourage thee to take fresh courage, and put thy whole trust in the Lord, 'in whom is everlasting strength.' . . It would seem a great comfort once more, to mingle with all my dear brother's children, but this I cannot expect to enjoy. With love to thyself and all thy household, I remain thy affectionate uncle, ROBERT MILHOUS."

The next day after writing this letter, my dear father was taken with severe pain, and for several days he suffered much. Some relief was obtained by medical treatment, so that for awhile I had a hope of his partial restoration to health, but from the beginning he did not think it would be so. There seemed a general giving way of the entire physical system, and finally partial paralysis and heart failure. He passed quietly away on the evening of the Eighth of Second Month, 1896, leaving with us the precious assurance that he was safely gathered home, "as a shock of corn cometh in its season."

I noted down some of the expressions which from time to time were uttered during his illness. On the second of Second Month, after I had read a chapter in the Bible, as was our custom, he said to me, "Last night I was favored to feel an evidence, as I thought a clear evidence, that I had been cared for, all my life long, even to this day, and that all my sins and transgressions had been blotted out, my many sins and transgressions, and an assurance was given me that He would not "leave me in the time of old age, nor forsake me when my strength faileth." And in my measure, I was enabled to intercede for thee, that He would take care of thee. And I believe it will be so. Therefore, cast all thy care upon Him, committing thyself unto Him as unto a faithful Creator."

He then repeated the passage in Revelations, "Blessed and holy is he who hath part in the first resurrection; over such the second death hath no power." Also said, "Is it possible that my name, even mine, is written in heaven?" At one time he said, "If I could only know as happy a close as I trust thy dear mother experienced, and the other dear one gone before, I could pass away so peacefully. "When the belief was expressed that it would be so, and he was asked if he did not feel that the dear Saviour was near, or words to that effect, he replied that he hoped so, at times, and had sometimes felt that perhaps there was no condemnation.

On the fifth of the month, while sitting with me by the fireside, after a season of quiet, he said, "Well, there has been a little fresh evidence revived to hope that help has been extended by the Holy One, after this season of sore conflict—it has been a season of sore conflict—a little fresh evidence to hope that help has been extended. As for thee, my hope remains unchanged that thee will be supported to the end. There needs to be a deepening in the root of Divine life, not only in our own little band, but among professing Christians everywhere."

When speaking of the need of being very careful in regard to removals, he said that poor and unworthy as he felt himself to be, he had been best satisfied to remain here, or had felt that this was his place, at our little meeting, or to that effect. At times he was under great exercise, and the sensible feeling of comfort would be withdrawn for a season, but it was evident to those around him, that he was supported through all these dispensations and enabled to bear his sufferings, which were great at times, with composure and patience. The day before his death, a number of his friends and neighbors being in an adjoining room, he requested that they all might come into his room, and after they were quietly seated, he wished to have the one hundred and third psalm read. After the reading, as he sat in his chair, he spoke very impressively to the company, relating the circumstance which made such an impression on his mind, when travelling on religious service in Indiana, an account of which is given in the proper place in this memoranda (the necessity of the passport, in order to pass through the gates of the city.) It is my earnest wish not to violate the dying request of my dear father, that nothing whatever of a flattering nature should be written concerning him. Through mercy and redeeming love I believe that he was enabled to finish his course with joy, and to Him alone who enabled him all the praise be given.

SLOTH SPIRITUAL.

"In diligence not slothful" (Rom. xii: 11, R. V.)

Sloth hath its body and its soul,
Like every human good and ill;
And so composed, must needs affect the whole
Of his career who weds it with his will.

But how can man elect such bane?
How can he will such consort vile,
Unchained by instant dread of mortal pain;
Uncharmed by hope of heavenly good the while?

Ah, man is blind. That wilful night
Which erst in Eden quenched his bliss,
That fearful darkness still obstructs his sight,
And sinks the foolish heart in its abyss.

For sloth is not mere quietude,
Since quietude is peace; and sloth
Is strife—a barren strife, which seeks for good
In outward things, for life mistaking growth.

'Tis true, there must be strife: true wealth
Must needs be won: else slothful snares
Were not, or were unknown. The road to health
And every joy, is over conquered cares.

But sloth, the angel of the foe,
Diverts the eye from force to form,
And, whether seeming prompt or seeming slow,
Succeeds by guile the watchless heart to storm.

Oh, heavenly Light, be thou my guide!
May I thy teaching swiftly heed,
And, learning to detect the shells which hide
All germs of sloth, be diligent indeed.

Baptism.

A Vindication of Christians who Reject Water Baptism on Scripture Grounds.

By James H. Moon, Fallsington, Bucks Co., Pa.

We have a godly and reverent esteem for the Holy Scriptures. Our lives as well as our doctrines must stand Scripture test. Otherwise we are not followers of Christ, not fully Christians. According to Scripture, which is very plain, we believe our Saviour never baptized with water nor did He command others to do so; but He did baptize with Holy Spirit and qualified others also. He never commanded nor intended these two baptisms to be united. Baptism of Holy Spirit without water is Christian baptism. Water baptism was a shadow or symbol of Christian baptism. Christian baptism came in fulness at Pentecost.

Since Pentecost, water baptism with many other ceremonies, has been permitted in condescension to human weakness. We do not judge Jewish Christians who yet adhere to circumcision. We do not deny that water baptism may yet be good for some; but our Saviour's teaching on the Mount and elsewhere suggests how He would have us confess Him in ways more acceptable.

THE COMMISSION.

Did Christ command his apostles to baptize with water? If He gave such command, extending to all nations and all time, every evangelist must have known it and have testified to it; for they with Peter all bear testimony to Christ's promised baptism of the Holy Spirit, and could not overlook such an important command as this.

Let us search the New Testament and see what it says. We find that the four evangelists and Peter each render Christ's command to his apostles in very different language. Matthew's version is the favorite with formalists, and is generally adduced to support water baptism, although no water is mentioned. Was any water intended to be understood? We cannot assume that in Matthew our Saviour's words are quoted verbatim, and that Mark, Luke, John and Peter are all in error or less reliable. We rather suggest that each writer expressed in his own language what he understood to be Christ's command to his apostles and that these records all agree in substance. Let us seek that interpretation which harmonizes them all.

Matt. xxviii: 19

John i: 33

According to John, Christ sent his apostles as his Father had sent him, and he it was who should baptize with the Holy Spirit. John never intimates that they were sent to baptize with water. John's silence is evidence that they had no such commission. There can be no baptism in the commission other than baptism of the Holy Spirit, according to John's record as we have it.

According to Luke, Christ commanded his apostles to preach among all nations repentance and remission of sin in his name, with power from on high. Luke records no mention of baptism only as power from on high; nothing which implies a command to baptize with water. If there was such command, Luke surely knew it. He tells us about Christ's own baptism of the Holy Spirit and his command to preach among all nations, why don't he tell us about this command to baptize with water? Is it not plainly because there was no such command? According to foot note in our revised version and other authority, Mark's record at this point may not have been preserved as Mark left it, so we omit it, although we see nothing to conflict with the other four records.

Luke xxiv: 47

Luke iii: 16
Luke xxiv: 47

According to Matthew, Christ commanded his apostles to "go teach all nations, baptizing them [not in the name but] into the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit." He commanded them to baptize into the divinity; not in water.

Matt. xxviii: 19 (R.V.)

This harmonizes all the evangelists with both Peter and Paul. That the apostles never did baptize with water in the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit is confirming evidence that to their understanding Christ never gave such a command. According to Peter, Christ commanded his apostles to preach to the people; he mentions no command to baptize. Peter did preach to the people, and the Holy Spirit fell upon them as it had fallen upon others of them in the beginning at Pentecost. Then Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He said, "John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit."

Acts x: 24

Acts xi: 16

Here Peter was made instrumental in baptizing with the Holy Spirit through gospel preaching, and he recognized this as the same baptism which his Lord had promised should supersede John's water baptism, and the same as that which fell upon them eight years before in beginning at Pentecost; and the baptism at Pentecost he said was that which the prophet Joel foretold should be poured out upon all flesh. Can anything be plainer than that these are all one and the same baptism: The baptism of the commission recorded in Matthew; the one baptism of the gospel, Christian baptism, and that there is no water in it. Because Peter and others continued to baptize with water is no evidence to the pronounced it necessary to abstain from tain meats. They insisted that Paul sh adhere to circumcision. They refused to with Gentiles. With such Jewish proclivi how could they abandon water baptism. S evidently realized that John's water bap had ended at Pentecost, but they were not pared to drop it entirely, so they sough perpetuate it by using the formula "In name of Jesus, Lord or Christ."

They claimed no Divine authority for formula and baptism, and the disciples of w to-day mostly discard it. Baptism with formula, "In the name of Father, Son, Holy Spirit" is not to be considered in nection with the apostles, as they never it, never mentioned it, and evidently n heard of it. It came in as a lone afterthou The great diversity in form of expression by each of the four evangelists and Pete defining Christ's commission to his apostl evidence clear and positive that they un stood Him to prescribe no formula for bapt It is confirmation that they so understood they adhered to no one set formula.

"In his name," as Christ is quoted by I and in substance by Mark, and Peter, always implies in, or with his spirit or power. N common name given which mortals may u In this name or power Christ commanded apostles to preach. "Into the name of Fa Son, and Holy Spirit," as Mat alone quotes Christ's comm has the same implication; not a mere nam formula which human lips may sound. T peat these words as a formula in conne with baptism is to substitute the voice of for the power of God.

William Forster Home, Tennessee.

The William Foster Home, at Friends Tenn., is known to some Friends in the by reputation, but others have, perhaps, heard of it. It is a boarding home for attending Friends' Academy at that plac tablished and managed by an associati women Friends of Philadelphia and vic In 1870, Rebecca W. Allinson, a valued ter of Burlington, N. J., paid a religious to Eastern Tennessee, accompanied by beth H. Farnum and Marmaduke C. and W. Cope, of Philadelphia. The South was suffering from the effects of the recent war, and that section shared largely in th eral poverty and depression. In visitin families of Friends in the mountain dis the sympathy of these Friends was arous the children, especially the girls, whose o tunities both for school instruction an learning the finer household arts, were limited. After their return they call gether a number of women Friends, to co what could be done to help them. The was the formation of "The Associati Women Friends for Promoting Educat Tennessee." The name was subseq changed to "The William Forster Hom ciation." It was decided to establish a in Friendsville, where girls from the c ending the Academy could have Christian herly care and training, and by doing the rk of the house in the intervals of school, rn practically good housewifery. Liberal scriptions were made, a house rented, later chased, simply but comfortably furnished, Anna Collins, of Burlington, whose husband been appointed principal of the Academy, engaged as matron. A committee of nen Friends in Friendsville was also formed assist in the management. The Home was ned in the autumn of 1870, and it has since e quietly on its course, with several differ- matrons and with a varying number of in- tes, at one time as many as twenty, but this sed uncomfortable crowding. Alterations e been made in the house from time to e, and its present capacity is sixteen. Dur- recent years of financial depression, the nber has seldom exceeded nine, and some- es has fallen short of that. The family in- nce has been distinctly religious, and the ining in domestic labors as well as in social enities, has been valuable. Preference has ays been given to Friends in admissions, many others have shared the benefits and tefully acknowledge their obligations. For ie years admission was free, but, later, at suggestion of the Resident Committee, a all board was charged. The Association paid f the board for a limited number who could pay for themselves. Several hundred girls e been inmates, some for several years. ny now occupy useful and respectable posi- ns as heads of families, teachers, etc.

The financial support of the Home is derived irely from voluntary contributions. These, the beginning, were abundant, but from ath and other causes, they have much dimin- ed, and for some years the liberal gifts of e president of the Association, in addition to regular subscriptions, alone enabled it to ep up its work. Her death, in 1898, cut off s resource, and compelled a change of ar- ngements. The payment of board by the sociation was discontinued, those only being ceived who could pay. Early in 1899, the tron who had efficiently served for five years, s prostrated by illness and obliged to leave r post. A substitute was found for the re- ainder of the term, and at the opening last tumn, Elma Bailey, of Richmond, Ind., en- ed upon the position with fair prospects ; t, in a few weeks, she was taken ill, and died Tenth Month. A Friend residing in the vil- e took charge until the winter vacation, and the first of this year a new matron, Olive Jenkins, also from Richmond, was installed, d has been doing well. The principal of the ademy, Jesse H. Moore, has kindly assisted advice and influence.

These circumstances have lessened the num- of inmates and increased expenses during s year, so that there is urgent need of fur- r help. The subscriptions at present are ostly entirely from Philadelphia and its vi- nity. The Association now appeals to Friends ewhere to consider whether they can aid it. e Home has been an influence for good, and s believed that it may continue to be so, es- cially if its means can be increased. Pa- tic appeals are sometimes made for help to icate the children of poor Friends. Friends Tennessee are generally in very moderate cumstances, and they have lately had some extra demands upon them in this direction, so that much cannot reasonably be expected of them. The cost of sustaining a girl in the Home is $5 per month, $45 for the nine months of the school year. If any kindly disposed Friend would like to provide for such support, the help would be gratefully received, and might bring a blessing to giver and recipient. Contributions for this object, or for the general purposes of the Home, may be sent to the Treasurer, Alice Lewis, 134 N. Church Street, West Chester, Pa., and will be promptly acknowledged.

Letter From J. Bevan Braithwaite in Response to Our Interest in the Doukhobors.

312 Camden Road, London, N. England,
Third Month 26th, 1900.

To the Editor of the Philadelphia Friend.

ESTEEMED FRIEND :—

I have read with much satisfaction the address to the Doukhobors, under the name of "The Christian Community of the Universal Brotherhood" recently issued in Philadelphia by the Committee of the Representatives of the Society of Friends to aid the Doukhobors, and signed by our dear Friends Samuel Morris, Jonathan E. Rhoads, Joseph S. Elkinton and several other Friends.

I rejoice that it has been put into the hearts of Friends in your Yearly Meeting to issue such an address and to labor in other ways for the help and blessing of these dear suffering brethren in Christ who are so nobly bearing their practical testimony to the paramount obligation of the commands of our Lord and Saviour, and to the blessedness of simple obedience to Him in all things.

The service to which Friends of your Yearly Meeting have thus providentially led is truly a service in harmony with the prayer of the Apostle—"Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." And may we not thankfully believe that He who has called you into it, designs in his tender mercy not only to bless these dear Christian brethren for whom you have been interested, but also in his abounding goodness to multiply his mercies to yourselves in the outpouring of his renewed spiritual blessing upon your Yearly Meeting—a result which will fill many hearts with praise.

My own feelings cannot be better expressed than in the following extract from a letter addressed by William Penn "to the Friends of God in the city of Bristol (England), to be read among them when assembled to wait upon the Lord," dated Wormingburst, the 24th of the 12th Month, 1681, which may be especially commended as a seasonable watchword in the present day to his Friends in the city and state which he founded :

"Great is God's work on the earth. Be universal in your spirits, and keep out of all straitness and narrowness. Look to God's great and glorious kingdom and its prosperity. Our time is not our own, nor are we our own. God hath bought us with a price, not to serve ourselves, but to glorify Him in body, soul and spirit. . . .

"Wherefore, as the flock of God, and family and household of faith, walk with your loins girded, being sober, hoping to the end for the grace and kindness which shall be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ, to whom you and yours are committed. His precious spirit minister unto you and his own life be shed abroad plenteously among you, that you may be kept blameless to the end."*

Believe me to be, with love,
Thy Sincere Friend,
J. BEVAN BRAITHWAITE.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF DESPAIR.—Infidelity is the philosophy of despair. In this world of sin and woe no one can be truly happy who has not a friend in Him who is able and willing to heal the broken hearted and speak peace to the sorrowing and to the afflicted. H. L. Hastings, of Boston, well exhibits, in his pamphlet entitled "Nuts for Skeptics to Crack," the insufficiency of unbelief to impart strength to overcome the ills of life. Hastings quotes from Voltaire a testimony as to the emptiness of life. Few men have had more earthly honors showered upon them than had Voltaire, yet the following are his words, as quoted by Hastings: "In man there is more wretchedness than in all animals put together. He loves life, and yet he knows that he must die. If he enjoys a transient good, he suffers various evils, and is at last devoured by worms. This knowledge is his fatal prerogative; other animals have it not. The bulk of mankind are nothing more than a crowd of wretches equally criminal and unfortunate, and the globe contains carcasses rather than men. I tremble at the review of this dreadful picture, to find that it contains a complaint against Providence itself, and I wish I had never been born."

"A PERFECT Quaker is an instrument of the Spirit, not a creature of habit, nor a creature of impulse, but a soul centered in God, moved by his living Spirit, and fashioned after the Son."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 5th instant an order was issued by the Postoffice for the largest single shipment of ordinary postage stamps ever made in the history of the office. The shipment was to take place on the 13th instant, when 53,304,200 stamps, of the value of $965,267, were to be sent to 1,306 postoffices throughout the country.

The United States Senate on the 3rd instant brought to a close the debate on the Puerto Rican Tariff and Civil Government bill, and, after rejecting all but committee amendments, passed the measure by a vote of 40 to 31.

The total amount of bonds received up to the 9th inst. at the United States Treasury for exchange for the new 2 per cents, is $226,970,600, of which $29,252,150 was received from individuals and institutions other than national banks.

There is no native of the State of Nebraska among its Representatives in either branch of Congress, notwithstanding the fact that Nebraska became a State thirty-three years ago, and was the twenty-fourth admitted into the Union.

The number of newspapers and periodicals in the United States has increased from 5871 in 1870 to 21,178 in 1899.

The estimated value of the industrial product of the United States for the past year is $7,500,000, or more than $100 for each inhabitant.

Mineral production in the United States this year will reach a value of nearly $1,000,000,000.

The New York World says: "The initial sale of a little lot of 2,000,000 tons of Alabama coal to Europe via New Orleans is merely the first trickle of a stream in its natural bed. At Pittsburg a single tow takes 1,200,000 tons of the sooty cargo to the mouth of the Mississippi. The Eastern seaboard will get its share of the trade by the new railroads recently reorganized into shape for business, and there is practically no limit in the future development of this "infant industry" of exporting soft coal. Germany cannot supply her own demands. England is short of coal. Every step in colonial expansion and naval activity and world power rivalry means more coal consumption, and the only source of supply with a surplus seems to be in the United States. In the matter of meeting this essential of imperialism we seem to hold the key of the situation."

It is reported from Washington that General Otis has been ordered home from the Philippines, and that General MacArthur will succeed to the military command. The civil government of the islands will be largely in the hands of the Taft Commission.

The deficit in Puerto Rico finances for the past six months amounted to $155,091.

Despatches from Ponce and San Juan, Puerto Rico, announced that hundreds of sick and starving people have flocked into those cities from the country districts in search of relief.

The Kentucky Court of Appeals has decided that Beckham, Democrat, is Governor of that State. Four Democrats and two Republicans agree in this conclusion, and one Republican dissents. The case is soon expected to go to the United States Supreme Court.

Conditions are highly prosperous in Kansas. During the past year only one bank in the State failed. Nearly all the banking institutions earned large dividends. Forty of them paid dividends of 27.9 per cent., and the general average of earnings was over 20 per cent.

The orange shipments from Southern California for the season of 1899-1900 are estimated at 15,000 carloads, with a market value to the growers of about $7,500,000.

Torrential rains in Texas, which began on the night of the 4th instant, culminated on the 7th in disastrous floods in the Colorado, Brazos and other rivers. The great dam in the Colorado, at Austin, gave way, letting loose a vast volume of water which wrecked the light and power plant, drowned eight workmen and did a vast amount of damage to property. It is thought that between thirty and forty lives in all were lost as a result of the disaster.

European goldfinches, which were first introduced into Central Park, New York, in 1878, are now seen there in large numbers. Starlings were brought over in 1890 to the park, and have spread through the upper part of the city.

There were 732 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 59 more than the previous week and 148 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 363 were males and 369 females; 119 were under one year of age: 144 died of pnuemonia; 66 of consumption; 55 of heart diseases; 42 of influenza; 25 of convulsions; 25 of apoplexy; 24 of bronchitis; 22 of diphtheria; 22 of old age; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 19 of measles; 16 of inanition; 15 of marasmus; 14 of nephritis; 14 of congestion of the lungs; 13 of cancer; 11 of debility; 11 of Bright's disease; 10 of uræmia, and 9 from casualties.

Cable despatches from South Africa tell of sharp fighting on Fourth Month 2nd, in the neighborhood of Mafeking. A sortie was made by the besieged garrison, and Plumer's cavalry attacked the Boers; but both attacks were repulsed, with considerable British losses in killed and captured, the casualties including several officers. The burghers' losses are said to be small.

The British War Office made public a despatch from Lord Roberts on the 6th, announcing the capture of fifty-four Boers and the killing of General Villebois Mareuil, the chief of the staff of the Boer army, and also the loss of five companies of British Infantry, near Bethany, thirty miles south of Bloemfontein, after a sharp fight.

London cable advices from South Africa state that Lord Roberts's army in and around Bloemfontein is unable to move for lack of horses and supplies, and that the garrison is seriously menaced by the Boers, who are massed only eighteen miles away, where they still control the water works.

Two-thirds of the ship building of the world is done by the British.

Ninety-three cases of the bubonic plague and twenty-nine deaths from the disease have occurred at Sydney.

A despatch from the city of Mexico, dated Fourth Mo. 4th, says: "Government officials are taking interest in the newly inaugurated temperance movement, and the Board of Health is giving encouragement to the temperance workers, for the vice of alcoholism is reported to be growing here. The mortuary statistics in Mexico every year show more and more deaths from cerebral congestion due to the use of alcohol, and the Government is alarmed at the results of the increased consumption of ardent spirits, declared by Mexican journalists to be the prime cause of four-fifths of the crimes and the most appalling poverty in this city.

"— Field, an American temperance worker, has issued a book in Spanish, dealing with the drink evil, which will be used as a text book here and in other Latin-American countries. President Diaz is known to be in cordial sympathy with the temperance movement. Various members of the Cabinet have expressed themselves as pleased with the work in behalf of practical temperance."

Stoves of the Bolivian Indians are curious things. A hole is dug in the ground about eighteen inches deep and a foot square, and over this is built a roof of clay, with holes of different sizes to receive the various cooking pots. Roasting is done on spits passed through the holes.

A Vancouver, B. C., despatch of Fourth Month 6th, states that seventy-seven men were buried by an avalanche in the Veronesenvil district of Echigo, Japan, according to ship's advices received on that day. When the snow was removed from the houses occupied by the unfortunates only three were found alive.

The sealing steamer Iceland has arrived at St. John's, N. F., on the 3rd inst., with 20,500 seals. She is the most heavily laden of all the ships that have yet arrived. She had a narrow escape from foundering on Third Month 29th, during a fierce gale, owing to the fact that she was carrying 2000 seals on deck. She had to run back among the floes for shelter. Otherwise she would have down.

The steamers Vanguard, with 27,000 seals; the Ra with 19,000 seals, and the Algerine, with 15,000, arrived at St. John's, N. F.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The sessions of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting the present year were preceded, on Seventh- the 14th instant, by the Meeting of Min- rs and Elders, under a feeling of dependence he Father of all sure mercies and supplica- for his redeeming, preserving and anointing er. "Sanctify them through thy Truth ; Word is Truth." Such is the intercession he Head of the Church for all who are ered into his name and service. The same endence on his sanctifying word for the ority of every Gospel exercise was en- ed, lest the preacher be guilty of idle words, which he must give account. Not merely those who labor is the Divine blessing y, but likewise for those who mourn. And blessing of being comforted when it is He comforts, transcends the sorrow of the rning by a far more exceeding and eternal ght of glory. The blessing of emptiness of is in its humility and in the infilling is Spirit and of the sufficiency which is Him. Our meetings for Divine worship "held in the power of God" only as his er is waited for and waited upon. The same ing on the pointings of his light is essen- to knowing our right place in the field from to day—whether this meeting or that ld be the place of our calling. Age and mity, unless insuperable, are not sufficient elease the dedicated disciple from pressing ugh his hindrances to reach his place of ic worship, nor did the prospect of martyr- , or of physical violence, or of imprison- t, deter our early Friends from such faith- ess. The reward of peace will surely follow constancy of those who have done what could. The gifts and callings of the aged, f such as have been long in the service are the gifts to be regarded as of light account, littled as something behind modern thought enlightenment. A little that living experi- hath learned or the great price hath pur- chased, far outweighs the treasures of much- gathered and borrowed knowledge. The world by wisdom knew not God at any period hith- erto, save in the revelation of his Son ; and it is no new thing that, in its own wisdom, it is ag- nostic now, or that a movement pushed to an extreme—as in a self-assumption of the effect of the atonement—should be reacting now, as appears abroad, in the increasing tendency towards Unitarianism. But, though sin may yet abound, it was believed grace is much more abounding, and the abundant grace, in its on- flow, is sufficient to overcome our souls' ene- mies. And though the enemy come in as a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will continue to lift up a standard against Him. Let them who rejoice to do his will desire the best gifts and covet to prophecy. In the exercise of this gift, small evidence of the required emptiness of self is found in allusions made by the speaker to himself. "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord." A pure message from Him will contain the least possible mixture of the creature, and a clean self-effacement is a true condition of knowing nothing before our hearers but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, and of a preaching that is in demonstration of the Spirit and of power.

Such fragments, gathered from far more abundant food as of the Lord's table, may sug- gest a little of the communion of the Spirit vouchsafed, in the comfort of which the meet- ing adjourned to its mid-week sitting.

Second-day.—During a period of silent wait- ing on the great Head of the Church voices were raised in supplication and aspiration that the Divine blessing might crown the deliber- ations and service of the week.

Sixty-three of the sixty-six representatives answered to their names.

The reading of the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings for the past year set forth an address which that body forwarded in Fifth Month last to the representatives of the United States Government in the Hague Conference which, at the instance of the Emperor of Rus- sia was held last Summer on the subject of disarmament and the maintenance of interna- tional peace. The meeting's recommendation of the principle of arbitration and the estab- lishment of a permanent tribunal for cases of difference was appreciatively responded to in a letter from the Secretary of the Commission, with an assurance that their "best efforts will be directed towards the noble ends which your address so eloquently sets forth." It is a comfort that this aim was not only encouraged by Friends, but so well kept to and practically arranged for by the representatives who were addressed.

The destitute situation of the lately colon- ized Doukhobortsi, and the prospect of a large portion of them perishing during the winter unless timely help should be afforded, early engaged the care of the meeting, which gave its earnest encouragement to the committee to provide against so serious a prospect. At their call a large meeting was held in Arch Street Meeting-house, the result of which was a systematic collection of means of relief throughout the subordinate meetings, which raised the total amount gathered by Friends of this Yearly Meeting in cash to $30,460, and in food, clothing and other articles to $5,265. Their interesting report when spread upon our columns will afford a convenient re-capitula- tion of our help rendered toward that people, suitable for historic reference. A salutary and encouraging epistle addressed to them by the Committee was also recorded ; and the two separate visits made during the year, each by two interested Friends, to the settlements of the Doukhobors in the Northwestern Terri- tory were matters of sincere interest.

The trustees of the Charleston Fund had aided three Monthly Meetings in different parts of the country in the repairs of meeting houses.

The Book Committee had issued from the store at 304 Arch Street, 1774 volumes and 3068 pamphlets. Those gratuitously disposed of amounted to $309.86. The volumes and pamphlets now on hand are $8,235.88 in value.

"It is greatly to be desired that young men and women of our Yearly Meeting should em- brace opportunities to spread our writing among others. The prevalence of a military spirit in our country would indicate the desir- ability of the distribution of such works as 'Dymond on War,' and the pamphlets issued by the Yearly Meeting on that subject, and our important doctrinal works on the Ministry, worship, and ritualistic practices are worthy of some sacrifice of time and means to bring before the attention of professing Christians."

Under the legacy of Charles L. Willits, about 2386 copies of the "African Friend" have been sent to Liberia and 2723 to the Southern States monthly. Two hundred and thirty volumes of a moral and religious character have also been sent to Liberia,—at an outlay of $446.65. En- couraging letters in response show that the agents of the concern have not labored in vain.

The inhabitants of our beloved country who profess the religion of Jesus Christ were addressed in a timely expostulation which was entitled "A Plea for Peace." Much interest was shown by young and old of the Yearly Meeting in the preparation of this document, and in the desire to have it go forth in an effective form. Their practical suggestions were deemed helpful, and the Meeting for Sufferings was authorized and encouraged to issue it accordingly.

In the Women's Meeting five Queries were read, and summaries of the answers to them considered. The meeting was reminded that the queries had a personal bearing and in them all were called to self-examination. The testimony that "They cast anchor and waited," and other lively exercises, were fraught with matter of impressive import.

(To be concluded).

For "The Friend."

"Worldliness in the Church."

While the purpose of speaking or writing should be for good, and from a pure prompting, yet it is true that this will often lead to the exposing of faults, in ourselves and in those with whom we are connected, as well as in others, which we would gladly hide or strive to excuse were it not for the love of Truth's prosperity. Yet it is cause of regret, that while many of us are willing to acknowledge to the Truth, and that there is need for words of reproof and warning from rightly exercised minds, that so few, even of these who are sensible of this, so hear, or so read, or so to lay it to heart, as to profit thereby. This proves, as some have said in days gone by, that though it is easy to slide into error, or to turn aside from Truth's way, yet it is hard to fallen nature to give place to humble acknowledgment and the removal and amendment of what is amiss.

These remarks have arisen by seeing an article in the number of The Friend Fourth Month 31st, headed "Worldliness in the Church," which no doubt met the witness for Truth in many of its readers. And as this is a subject which has exercised the mind of the present writer for some years, he also was glad to see it somewhat properly brought to notice thus publicly to a people whom it most should touch, they being the successors in profession of a people who, far beyond most, if not all other religious professors, claimed to bear, and for a time did bear a consistent testimony against the spirit of the world, by an humble self-denying walk, being redeemed from and thus raised above the love of it.

Particularly satisfactory (or sorrowfully approved) were these words of the editor "at least till our own hands are clean;" while he felt prudently to express his unwillingness, as it seems to name the particular denomination named in that article. The reading of it has revived a few remarks which came to my hearing some time back, causing a feeling of sorrow, two of which I will name, hoping they will be a benefit to some who desire to see wrong things put away from among us, which have in this direction so gradually slidden in, that we hardly realize where we are. The first instance is that of a couple of Mennonites who attended a Friends' Quarterly Meeting, to whom, feeling to hope they had met with something which would be of use to them, I said, after meeting, "How did you like the meeting?" The woman answered, "It would be nice to be a Friend; one could wear all the silks and finery they had a mind to." This was said in a deriding way, as this people are careful, though many of them are wealthy, to avoid needless cost, and show of grandeur, in furniture, clothing, etc.

The other is that of one of the ministers of that same people, who had in the course of his travels and duties been entertained at the house of one of our foremost wealthy Friends, who no doubt is very exemplary in most if not all other respects. He was queried of by one of his fellow members, after he had been at this Friend's place, concerning his visit. He answered, "It was the toniest place I ever was at." Many among us will excuse such in the rich, for we have been silenced by, "They can afford it." But this is a mistake, for these upon whom the Master has bestowed (if it is through his blessing) such abundant means should be an example of non-extravagance and simplicity. For in such it would be an example, indeed. J. D.

The Relation of Friends' Boarding Schools to their Religious Society.

(Passages from an article in Present Day Papers.)

"Jerusalem was destroyed because the education of the children was neglected."—The Talmud.

"There are those who object that to advocate the support of Friends' schools is to perpetuate the evils of sectarianism. A narrow policy of exclusive education is held to be inconsistent with the broad catholicism, at once so spiritual and so lofty, which marks the true Quaker. We are reminded that we have neither creed nor catechism, and distinctive religious instruction is viewed with consequent distrust. Some indeed uphold the public or undenominational school as a temple of the liberal arts, and condemn the Quaker school as a cloister in which the wider interests of life are in part ignored. They claim that a certain gaucherie of manner and a sectarian exclusiveness, which seriously limit the influence of Friends, are there contracted."

"Are there special circumstances which warrant their continued existence as distinctive institutions?"

"As long ago as 1667, George Fox recommended 'the setting up of a school at Waltham' for boys, and at Shacklewell for girls, that they might there be instructed 'in whatsoever things were civil and useful in the creation.' His advice reminds us how mistaken is the supposition that the early Friends deprecated human learning. William Penn, when he sailed for America, left a letter for his wife, in which he begged her 'not to be sparing of expense in procuring learning for his children; for that by such parsimony all was lost that is saved.' Nor does Penn's exhortation lose weight because Fox declared that to be bred at Oxford or Cambridge is 'not sufficient to fit a man to be a minister of Christ.' Education is certainly insufficient; but who will be so rash as to say that education has t fore no part in the preparation of a mini

"Our Society stands almost alone in taining a free ministry, and the grave re sibility of this position presses upon every point. We cannot escape it either homes or in our schools. For us the e tional standard of other religious bodies adequate, since we do not set apart ce members for special training in theolo colleges. Friends have too jealous a rega the liberty of the Spirit, and too lively a of the danger of its restriction, to fall the snare of professionalism. But, alth the spiritual life is, as Fox discerned, and beyond all human learning, it require highest development of the faculties fo full expression."

"The objection that denominational e tion is petty and one-sided is too often But while we wholly disapprove of such teac we desire that our children may have poin placed before them 'the practical, spir and non sacerdotal aspects of divine Tru relation to individual and national life.'"

"When we consider our small numbers severity of our ideal, our stern denial popular aids to worship, our steadfast i ence upon the individual exercise of spiri shall recognize that intense personal convi is the necessary condition of our existen a Society. Those who cherish a high especially in a time of reaction, must be foundly impressed with its beauty, its vi and its purpose in the world. If our ide severe, our children will accept easier more popular standards unless they have been instructed in its real significance. cannot be compassed if they are educat schools where our ideal is disregarded nied; for we can not rely solely on th fluence of the home when so critical a of life is spent with the teacher."

"Even when our schools are properl dowed, properly staffed, and abreast o best equipment elsewhere, something y mains. They cannot be simply high-class lar institutions controlled by Friends wh ercise a good but indefinable personal infl over pupils of whatever denomination. do not underrate the valuable work wh already being done, yet we believe there room for more definite religious teaching

"It is of the utmost importance tha young people should not leave school w some conception of the broad lessons of ious history, and the governing principa life indicated particularly in the Bible generally in the history of the human They should also have such a conception meaning of worship that their loyalty Society may stand the test of discourag and criticism. The disloyalty among ed young Friends, coupled with the hazin view so often encountered, is evidenc more of such teaching is still require value will lie, as we have before explain in dogmatism, but in suggestion. U tionably this is delicate work, calling f discrimination and training."

t being my aim to write only of that in ch my mother's feelings were especially sted, I may say that, by the fall of 1851, health of our family being fairly good, my her's solicitude went out toward the dear s bereft of a husband's and father's care with h strong desires to see them, that it was cluded to make the journey, and she, not g to travel on the water, the writer took team, and with a carriage, made the trip. younger sister, mother and I gave room some luggage. I cannot describe the scene naternal affection on our arriving at the shold of the lonely dwelling of the little y we had come so far to see. Of course little ones knew us not. We received many ressions of sympathy from those that had wn my brother.

fter a few days spent in doing what we d for the dear ones, we turned our faces eward, and in due time arrived safely there, not without some anxious times as we went , in crossing the great Ohio River. The n not liking to go on the ferry-boat, a ng man took each by the hit, notwithstanding which, when they concluded to go, they ng with great violence, and one fell broadon the apron, so called, and it appeared n instant would go overboard, but regained feet without anything being damaged, gh my mother and sister were greatly ated, and it was but reasonable that the g linesman felt nervous. On our return we nicely over the great river at the same e, but as we ascended the long, steep hill, hich a narrow track was cut for wheeled cles, we met a great concourse of people, e in carriages, some on horses, others on , but my duty to keep to the right relieved f all danger of being crowded off the preous bank.

on after beginning this ascent we met an er, who bid me keep in my place, namely, ie right, and he believed no harm would one, for he had bid the people to be civil. had been up to the summit running es. This was very exciting.

the early part of the year 1852 my mother yed the privilege of being present at the iage of one of her sons, which event seemkely to relieve my mother, in part, of the estic cares in which she had so long been ested, as it was expected that the newly ied couple would, for a time at least, octhe old family home, as my interest was . My mother and unmarried sister, having sire to spend some time with my married r and husband, residing near Barnesville, elmont County, Ohio, went thither. My er-sister still felt at home with us as much ited her inclination. She married in a months, but not keeping to the good order he Society of Friends, had no entertainwith us. This was a grief to my mother. younger brother took a term in the boardschool, then at Mt. Pleasant, Ohio. The r boy, that has been noticed, was turned to the care of the writer.

y father's estate not being settled and my her being inclined to buy the realty, my ner and sister felt inclined to return to the family home. Inasmuch as my younger brother was not married, this seemed a reasonable conclusion, and not seeing it best for more than two families to settle on the estate of my father, wife and I decided on seeking a home west of the Mississippi River. This was a grief to my mother.

My brothers contracted with the appointed executor for the realty of my father's estate, and entered upon their duty with ardent feelings, but the financial crisis of 1856 made it necessary for the property to go into other hands. This was a grief to my mother. Her interest, however, enabled her to buy a house and lot in the village of Chesterfield. My younger brother, having married, occupied rooms adjoining my mother and her unmarried daughter. My elder brother also procured a home not many doors from my mother. Here the three families lived in close proximity for several years, but my brothers felt the necessity of pursuing whatever reputable employment might present, and for this cause were often out of reach of any meeting of Friends, and much exposed to adverse influences. This was a grief to my mother.

When our country was engaged in bloody conflict, the draft fell upon my elder brother. A military officer came and took him from his family and home. This again was a grief to my mother. But out of sorrow rejoicing came, for it soon reached my mother's ears that her son stood firm for the principles of his education, which had long been the principles of his convictions. This was cause for rejoicing to her, though mingled with sorrow, for her son was in military care and under military control. I know not whether corporal punishment was inflicted or not, but when, in conversation with my brother on the subject, he told me: "In last controversy with the chief officer, he turned from me, with this expression, 'I wish to God that every man in the world thought as you do on this subject.'"

One thing more presents to my memory, though not in place in point of time. In the fall of 1855 my eldest sister's husband left his family and home, near Barnesville, Ohio, to attend the Yearly Meeting then at Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, with the prospect of homing with his mother, not far away. Here he became so violently ill as to be unable to return to his family.

About the time my mother reached the period in life of three-score and ten, a perceptible change took place in her eyesight, which ere long resulted in total blindness, that continued to the end of her long and useful life, which took place on the twenty-third of First Month, 1871, at the age of eighty-two years.

Let me here say that, owing to the great distance between my mother's home and mine, I was with her but little for the last twenty years of her life, but my younger and unmarried sister, being her constant companion, kept me well informed of the piously resigned state of our mother's mind. To this have been added many oral testimonies of those that knew her well and oft enjoyed her company. The interment of my mother was made near the graves of my father and sister, in the cemetery belonging to the Society of Friends at Chesterfield, Morgan County, Ohio.

Having now performed a long felt duty in bringing these sketches of two useful lives to a close, this twelfth day of First Month, 1900, my trust is that the evening sacrifice may be regarded as an acceptable offering by those that read.

EFFORTS OF A SON TO SEE HIS MOTHER.

Appendix to the Sketches of William and Debby Dewees.

It appears to have been about the twentieth of First Month, 1871, that the following dream took place, and is still fresh in the memory of the writer. In the quiet hours of the night it seemed as if some one lay a hand on my shoulder to claim my attention, and then said if I wished to see my mother alive, there was no time to spare. I felt that I ought to go at once. I awoke, but the impression remained. "Start this day," I informed my wife. She felt sympathy for me, and replied that, on her part, she could prepare for my starting that evening, but suggested that the mail might bring some word. In the afternoon a letter was handed in that gave the same word, in effect, that I had dreamed of getting, the letter having been delayed. By the assistance of kind friends I reached the depot in time, but missing the fast train at my first change made my journey tedious, placing me at Barnesville, Ohio, in the evening instead of morning. All water craft were ice-bound, sleighing was good and snow falling fast. I went direct to a livery, and desired a man to take me to McConnellsville that evening (distant twenty-eight miles). He would not turn out short of ten dollars. This my slender purse could not afford. Being then vigorous and strong, with satchel in hand, I stepped off eight or ten miles that evening. Stopping at a public house that evening for entertainment, I informed my host of my wish to employ some one in the morning, though it were called the Sabbath-day, to take me to McConnellsville. He said he had a neighbor that did such jobs, and he would bring him in. The man, having come in, appeared willing to make a profit of my necessity, and said he must have five dollars. I told him that I got my money by my work, and that it would make me good wages to walk for one-half that sum. "Well, well," said he, "I'll take you for two dollars and fifty cents." Though I liked not that way of dealing, I accepted the terms. The following morning being a pleasant one, an early start was made from the point designated in the contract. I had three or four miles to walk to reach the home of a cousin of mine. On reaching the threshold of her dwelling and making a signal for admittance, she came in person, and, on seeing me, exclaimed, with uplifted hands, "Here is Cousin William, come all the way from Iowa to see Aunt Debby (my mother), and she was buried the day before yesterday!"

None, I trust, that have had to drink of such a cup of bitterness, will sneer at me when I acknowledge that a flood of tears flowed from my eyes. With the assistance of kind relatives I reached the late residence of my mother that evening. Here again tears flowed from my eyes, and were mingled with those of all my brothers and sisters then living.

AN obstinate man does not hold opinions, but they hold him.—Selected.

The Confessors of Peace.*

Before referring to evidence of the fact that in the first three centuries of our era, not a few known as Christians were enrolled in the Roman armies, let us consider testimony to show that it was not merely aggressive warfare that was then declared unlawful, but likewise that warfare for self-defense which is now generally looked upon as both allowable and praiseworthy.

Irenæus, referring to the New Testament disallowance of retaliation, speaks of the Christians of his day as "now unaccustomed to fighting, but when smitten they offer also the other cheek." He alludes to the prophecy concerning the inoffensiveness that should be seen in the Messiah toward his enemies, as having been "accomplished in the Lord's person," and adds that "the same is still true with regard to us, the body following the example of the Lord."

In Cyprian we find many confirmatory passages, but a single one only will be cited, in which, speaking of the non-carnally equipped "soldiers of Christ," he says: "They do not in turn assail their assailants, since it is not lawful for the innocent even to kill the guilty," and again, (he is addressing Demetrianus, the Roman proconsul of Africa), in certifying to the willingness of Christians to await the Divine amend for injuries, he continues: "For this reason it is that none of us, when he is apprehended, makes resistance, nor avenges himself against your unrighteous violence, although our people are numerous and powerful."

Tertullian, already quoted as testifying so fully against the military service, refers to the faithful as "yielding themselves up in their own places of duty with patience, rather than fighting in self-defense."

Lactantius, in delineating true bravery, shows how incumbent it is upon the follower of Christ not to answer reviling in similar manner, and when injured not retaliate in kind, that such a one should not merely not inflict injury, but he should not avenge it when inflicted on himself. A just man, after this order, he admits, may be an object of contempt, and, "because it will be thought that he is unable to defend himself, he will be regarded as slothful and inactive," the common estimate of one who avenged himself upon his enemy being that he is a man of spirit and activity. When it is remembered that Lactantius became preceptor to Crispus, the son of Constantine, called "the first Christian emperor," one is inclined to wonder whether percepts such as the above were imparted to the heir expectant, who, later, "earned his spurs" in the wars against the Franks, and eventually was put to death (A. D. 326) by his father's order, upon what is alleged to have been a baseless accusation.

According to Lactantius, who died in Gaul the year before his one-time pupil was beheaded, there had at that time been so great an increase in the standing army that there were not men enough left to till the ground, which was allowed to run wild; and the army itself suffered in consequence, as the supply of provisions was inadequate to their demands. Arthur J. Mason, in his "Persecution of Diocletian" (A. D. 303) alluding to the growing wealth of the church, remarks,—"The wealth which was now in her hands might well have excited the covetousness of a less honorable sovereign than Diocletian. Bishops, like Paul of Antioch, lived in greater state than Aurelian himself. According to Eusebius, even governors of provinces and great state officers were fain to court the good will and support of the prelates."

It was clearly a time of decadence in Church and State. Humility, simplicity, steadfastness, the non-resistant principle taught in the Sermon on the Mount, were giving way before the inroads of riches and luxury on the part of ecclesiastics to be presently followed by the unseemly and unblessed union of Church and State.

The persecuting edicts of Diocletian, we are told by Anthon, had been much mitigated by the forbearance and leniency of Constantius; and Constantine not only followed his father's example in being merciful to the persecuted Christians, but even showed them some marks of positive favor. Very considerable numbers of them, in consequence, flocked to his standard, and swelled the ranks of his army. Their peaceful, orderly and faithful conduct, contrasting most favorably with the turbulent and dissolute behavior of those who formed the mass of common armies, won his entire confidence. "To what extent," cautiously remarks the author above quoted, this satisfactory military accession "led Constantine to form a favorable opinion of Christianity, or inclined him to view with esteem and respect the tenets which produced such results, cannot be ascertained. How far his avowed reception of Christianity was influenced by the prudence of the politician, how far by the conviction of the convert, it is impossible to determine."

We may take it for granted, nevertheless, that Justin Martyr (2nd century), who, in his first Apology for the Christian religion, addressed to the pacific emperor Antoninus Pius, so well appreciated the record of that sovereign's long reign undisturbed by any war, would not have rendered a like gracious tribute to the perpetually fighting Constantine, although the latter was known as "Christian," which Antonine was not. In the Edict of Milan (A. D. 312), promulgated by Constantine, he declares: "We have long seen that we have no business to refuse freedom of religion, and that to the judgment and desire of each individual man must be left the power of seeing to matters of belief according to man's own free will." Yet this concession seems not to have been made because of the Emperor's piety, for his acts were far from showing it; but, rather, was declared at the dictate of state policy and expediency. A pagan he continued until his death in 337, although he permitted the rite of water baptism to be administered shortly before he passed away.

It had now become notably easier for the professing Christian to enter the military service, seeing that the accommodating Emperor had altered the oath so that it read—"By God, by Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the majesty of the Emperor, which, next to God, is to be loved and honored by mankind." Poor people, who thought that persecution for Christ's sake had ceased and the Empire Christian! How little did most of them derstand that Constantine had brought Pag ism bodily forward, incorporated it—its c monies, superstitions, even its idolatries—the Christian faith, whilst he himself reta the blasphemous title of Divinity and Pont Maximus which had been bestowed upon predecessors! The articles are designed to show that Christ's testimony against war has been maintained from the time of the first disciples down to the present, notwithstanding that at times the right of it seemed to be on the verge of extinguishment.

Singing Mice.

A rare little singer is the musical mo but some people living at a hotel in south France late last winter enjoyed such a t for nearly a month. One day they heard they supposed, the song of a canary out the balcony, but search for the singer reve a mouse in the room. The weather being c a small fire was kept, and the mouse stayed most of the day under the fender, its fri feeding it with bits of biscuit. It became t in a few days, and would sit on the heart the evening and sing for several hours. It not disturbed by talking, and would sing on e when people came near. It was a tiny crea with large ears, which it kept in motion w singing. Its song resembled a canary's, was more varied and quite as sweet. It also a double song, like a melody and its companiment, which made some of the p think at first there must be two mice sing

France has by no means a monopoly of t singing rodents. A couple of musical mice the pets of J. S. Chelton, of Woods Cross Ro Va. He is the captain of the schooner A Loyd, and the first mouse was captured s months ago in the cabin of his vessel, whil Gloucester Point, Va. The little fellow caged, and he sang merrily at all hours, notes being somewhat like the subdued tr a canary bird. A few days ago another sical mouse was caught in the cabin by Cap Chelton, and is now a companion of the previously captured. They keep up a l concert at all hours of the night and day.

And yet there are very few of these l animals—in fact, they are so scarce that are regarded in the light of curious phenon Some time since a dentist at Santa Rosa, fornia, captured one, not knowing the ta it possessed. His attention was first attra by what seemed to be the singing of a ca in the near neighborhood, and at the same he noticed a little mouse that was in the of scampering around and across the offic all times of the day. For the sake of l who came to the office he entrapped the s visitor, and, to his astonishment, found h got the author of the music that had pu him. It took the doctor some time to sure that the little creature was the vocal a but he soon became convinced by the ac of the little animal while sending fort notes. It would stand upon its hind leg behave much like a canary. It was kept trap for more than a month, during which it entertained many curious spectators wi songs, which differed somewhat from th the feathered songsters, but had a great b of their own. Baptism.

Paul said of his own commission, Christ sent him not to baptize but to preach the gospel; a light to the Gentiles, ration to the ends of the earth and that the i. 16 gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all who believe. Paul's commission for salvation, preaching by the power xxiv: 47 of God to the ends of the earth xiii: 3, 5 was essentially the same as that en to other apostles to preach among all ons repentance and remission of sin in his e with power from on high, for there can io salvation without repentance and remission of sin.

ad our Saviour ordained water baptism to end of the world, the four evangelists ld all have known it and have testified to it hey and Peter all testify to Christ's own tism of the Holy Spirit. Paul would have i: 17 known it and not have denied it. x: 42 Peter would not have said, "Christ us to preach to the people" without makany allusion to water baptism. The apos could not have understood that Christ comded water baptism or prescribed any forh therefor, otherwise they would have used formula or have referred to this command uthority for their subsequent water bapms.

ut, so far as Scripture informs, the apostles r did baptize with water in the name of ier, Son and Holy Spirit, nor ever refer to command as authority for any water bap. Some converts they baptized with water, e they did not. We have no record that apostle but Paul was so baptized. Had it essential or even important it would have mentioned.

resent zeal for water baptism is a parasite ater growth. Sometimes they baptized in name of Jesus, Lord or Christ, but never word about the Father nor the Holy Spirit. viii: 38 Some baptized without formula or if they did use formula it was not rded of sufficient importance to mention. in iv: 2 They baptized with water before xviii: 25 xix: 3 Christ gave the commission, and coned to baptize in the same way after. Near y years after Christ some believers coned to baptize without formula, and we don't w how much longer it continued. The whole ude of the apostles to water baptism is l proof that their authority did not origie in Christ's command. When was Christ's mand first quoted as authority for water ism? Not in apostolic times, nor until long r. When did man first presume to baptize water in the name of Father, Son and Spirit? Not in the first century. "The -Nicene Fathers" and "The teaching of twelve apostles" indicate the use of such mula in the fore part of the second century; the historian Schaff, who was familiar with these records, says: This formula is not traceable in its present shape earp. 164 lier than the fourth century. Evily the apostles baptized with water beie it was a conspicuous feature in the special ion of John the Baptist, as well as a Jewish in which they and their fathers had been cated. They had no thought of Christ's mand as authority.

i: 17 Paul said plainly that he had no such authority. Christ sent him "not to baptize, but to preach the gospel." Paul thanked God that 1 Cor. i: 14 he had baptized so few. He could not have spoken thus slightly of Christian baptism. It must have dawned upon him that in the fulness of the Christian dispensation there was no place for water baptism. Otherwise how could he thank God that he baptized so few? What dispenser of water baptism could give such thanks to-day? Paul Acts xvi: 3 Gal. iii: 3, 4 circumcised Timothy and perhaps 1 Cor. i: 14, 16 Titus because of the Jews. Did he not baptize those few with water for the same specific purpose. Or did he not at first receive full light upon this subject? Some assume that Christ gave other apostles authority to baptize which did not extend to Paul. What groundless assumption — how preposterous! All Christ's ministers to the end of the world commissioned to baptize with water, and Paul only rejected! This reflects unjustly upon Acts xiii: 46, 47 Gal. iii: 7, 8 Paul, the great apostle to us gentiles. It is a palpable evasion of the gospel truth, here and elsewhere inculcated, that Christ gave no commission to baptize with water.

John i: 33 John the Baptist was commissioned to baptize with water.

Mark iii: 16 Luke iii: 22 The Holy Spirit once descended as John baptized with water.

1 Cor. i: 17 Luke xxiv: 47 Christ commissioned his apostles to go preach the gospel.

Acts xi: 15, 16 1 Peter i: 12 1 Thes. i: 5 1 Cor. i: 14 See last article The Holy Spirit often descended as apostles preached the gospel. The apostles were never commissioned to baptize with water. The Holy Spirit never descended as they did baptize with water.

JOHN'S BAPTISM.

John the Baptist was sent before Christ to prepare the way before Him. John was a prophet of a dispensation previous to Christ. He was in the desert until the days of his showing unto Israel. In the vision he was with Moses on the Mount and they talked with Jesus. He with Moses vanished and left Jesus alone.

Matt. xi: 10 Mark i: 2 Luke iii: 4 Luke vii: 27 John iii: 28 Luke i: 80 Matt. xvii. 1, 8 Mark ix: 4, 8

John said: "That He (Jesus), should be manifest unto Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water." John defines his commission as only to Israel, the Jews. His baptism was adapted to Jews, but not unto us, who according to Jewish classification are gentiles. Evidently John baptized Jews only and not gentiles. It was unlawful for Jews to keep company or come unto gentiles. The woman of Samaria wondered that Jesus, a Jew, asked water of her a Samaritan, for Jews had no dealings with Samaritans. When Jews numbered the people they did not count the gentiles. So all Jerusalem and Judea whom John baptized would not include the few gentiles who lived among the Jews. But few of those baptized by John appear to have become the disciples of Christ.

John i: 31

Acts x: 28 John iv: 9

Matthew iii: 5

Exodus xix: 3 Exodus xl: 32 By the law given through Moses Jews baptized with water.

John ii: 6, 33 John was a man sent from God to baptize Jews with water. But no one was ever sent to baptize us gentiles with water.

John i: 32, 34 God sent his Son to baptize us with the Holy Spirit.

Joel ii: 28 Acts ii: 16, 18 Acts xi: 1, 18 All flesh, Jews and gentiles, are objects of this one baptism.

John said: "There cometh one after me mightier than I. His shoe latchets Mark i: 7 Mark ii: 8 I am not worthy to unloose. I, indeed, have baptized you with water. But John iii: 30 he shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit."

And again: "He must increase, but I must decrease."

Acts i: 5 Christ said "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit."

Peter quoted this saying of Christ and recActs xi: 16 Acts ii: 16, 18 ognized this Holy Spirit baptism to be the same as that which the prophet Joel foretold should be poured out upon all flesh.

Two baptisms are here contrasted by John, John iii : 30 Christ, and Peter. Baptism of water must decrease with John and Judaism. Baptism of spirit must increase with Christ and Christianity. To whom can we turn with more confidence for knowledge about all baptisms ordained or intended for us than John i: 16, 18 Mark i: 8 Acts i: 5 John vi: 26, 33 unto John, whom we are told was sent from God to administer one baptism and unto Christ who was the author of another baptism. Three times in eight verses John says his baptism is of water, thus distinguishing it from Christ's baptism without water. They are both quoted as testifying to two dissimilar and distinct baptisms administered at different times, one with water and the other without water.

Neither of them intimate that these two Acts i: 5 John iii: 30 baptisms shall ever be united, but they do both plainly intimate that they shall not be united, and that the first shall Matt. iii: 11 Mark i: 8 Luke iii: 16 John i: 33 pass away and the second remain. John said: "He [Christ], shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit." But John never said that he shall baptize you with Acts i: 5 Acts xi: 16 water, nor that any one else shall ever baptize you with water. Christ says: "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit," but He never said ye shall be baptized with water, nor does he ever allude to water baptism except to minimize it. According to Acts ii: 17, 18 Joel ii: 28, 29 Peter's interpretation of the prophet Joel all flesh, servants and handmaidens, sons and daughters, old and young, shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit. But Joel never prophesied that they should be baptized with water.

If in these gospel days we were to have been baptized with water, would not Joel have prophesied of water as well as of spirit. Would not our Saviour at some time have intimated water baptism should be continued.

Would John when teaching that great multiMatt. iii: 11 Mark i: 8 Luke iii: 16 John i: 26, 33 tude of Jews on the banks of the Jordan have impressed upon them that water baptism was only transient, and that they would all need to be bapMark i: 8 Matthew iv: 19 Mark ii: 24 John iv : 2 tized again with the Holy Spirit. John baptized his disciples with water. Christ called to his disciples, "Follow Me." Christ did not baptize with water. He is calling to-day, "Follow Me."

HE CARETH.

"Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you.—1 Peter v. : 7.

What can it mean! Is it aught to Him
That the nights are long and the days are dim,
Can He be touched by the griefs I bear,
Which sadden the heart and whiten the hair?
Around his throne are eternal calms,
And strong, glad music of happy psalms,
And bliss unruffled by any strife.
How can He care for my little life?

And yet I want Him to care for me
While I live in this world where the sorrows be,
When the lights die down from the path I take,
When strength is feeble and friends forsake,
When love and music, that seemed to bless,
Have left me to silence and loneliness,
And my life-song changes to sobbing prayers,
Then my heart cries out for a God who cares.

When shadows hang o'er me the whole day long
And my spirit is bowed with shame and wrong;
When I am not good, and the deeper shade
Of conscious sin makes my heart afraid
And the busy world has too much to do
To stay its course to help me through,
And I long for a Saviour—can it be
That the God of the universe cares for me?

Oh, wonderful story of deathless love!
Each child is dear to that heart above.
He fights for me when I cannot fight,
He comforts me in the gloom of night,
He lifts the burden, for He is strong,
He stills the sigh and awakens the song;
The sorrows that bowed me down He bears
And loves and pardons because He cares.

Let all who are sad take heart again;
We are not alone in our hours of pain;
Our Father stoops from his throne above
To soothe and quiet us with his love.
He leaves us not when the storm is high
And we have safety, for He is nigh.
Can it be trouble which He doth share?
Oh, rest in peace, for the Lord does care."

The Tract Association of Friends.

The Board of Managers report, that during the year ending Second Month 28th, 1900, the stock of our publications at the Depository, No. 304 Arch Street, has been kept up, and the facilities there afforded for obtaining copies of our tracts for gratuitous distribution, have been made use of by members and others, by personal application or through the mails. By means of the catalogue annually printed, persons at a distance desiring to select from our series can inform themselves in regard to the title and number of pages of each tract; and can readily obtain them by mail by addressing our Agent in charge.

By the death of our Friend, Joseph Hall, in the Second Month, 1899, who had been for some years much interested in fulfilling the duties of his position as Agent, it became necessary to obtain a successor, and in the Fourth Month last William C. Cowperthwaite was appointed to this service.

The reading matter connected with the almanac and card calendar has been selected, and they have been issued as usual. The demand for the latter has increased since it was first issued, and it is used to a considerable extent among Friends in this neighborhood.

One new tract has been added to the series during the year. It is numbered 180, and is entitled "The Letter of a Young Jewess to Her Father," and is extracted from a Memoir of Leila Ada, a young woman who died at the age of twenty years in full hope of a glorious immortality through the merits and sufferings of a crucified Redeemer. It is hoped that it may be of special service among Hebrews; some of whom are desirous of circulating such reading matter, and by whom it has been gladly received. It is gratifying to know that requests for our publications continue to be made by those who value them and desire to place them in the hands of others, and also that the interest of auxiliary societies is maintained in different places.

Our tracts, when bound in volumes, furnish an agreeable miscellany, very suitable for reading rooms, etc. A full set of them has lately been furnished upon application to a public library in St. Louis, Missouri.

A treatise on religious subjects casually brought to the hands of a reader has often been made an instrument of spiritual good. But we have thought that the special service which our tracts perform may be in elucidating and enforcing some of those doctrines of the Christian religion, and the practices resulting from them, which have as yet been accepted by but a small proportion of religious professors at the present day—such as the universality and efficacy of Divine Grace; the immediate revelation of the Divine will to the soul of man; the right place and authority of the Holy Scriptures, the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the spiritual nature of the Communion and Divine worship; the exercise of the ministry and prayer; the call of women as well as men to the ministry of the gospel; the incompatability of war and the taking of oaths with the Christian religion and the influence of and objections to the use of music. Short treatises upon each of these subjects are included in the series of tracts now published, as well as some biographical accounts of individuals who have exemplified these doctrines in their lives, and some essays of a more general and miscellaneous character.

As in the past our tracts have been distributed among the sailors visiting our port, and many expressions of appreciation and thankfulness for the privilege of perusing them have been heard, which have encouraged us to further efforts in this direction.

Quite a number have also been furnished to members of an organization who visit, and hold religious meetings among sailors and others at Point Breeze, and to attenders there, as well as to conductors, motormen and others on their way to and from the place of meeting. They have been received with much appreciation, and frequently other copies have been asked for. One aged woman to whom a tract was sent by the hands of a child was so impressed by the reading of it, that on the following First-day, with effort she reached the point where the child received it, asked for more, and expressed much satisfaction in having them, as such reading matter appeared to be that which she had longed for.

A young woman writing from Portland, Oregon, mentions that she furnished some of our tracts to different persons in that city and to prisons, reading rooms, etc., where they were gladly received. She also left a large number at the United States barracks for soldiers; from whence a portion were sent to Manila. She distributed some at a meeting of sailors in that city, and writes if she had a thousand she co have disposed of them there.

During the year our funds have been creased by the acceptable addition of $207 from the proceeds of two legacies left Sarah Marshall and her sister Mary M. Johns

There have been printed during the ye Tracts in English, 57,750; tracts in Spani 4,000; almanac, 5,250; card calendars for 19 1,700.

The [principal] distribution for the year been: Tracts, 69,179; Juveniles, 6,907; manacs (including 1,072 of 1899). Of th 800 of 1899 and 850 of 1900 were placed the cells of the Eastern Penitentiary, 4,8 Select Extracts, 30; Divine Protection, Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes, 8; M ings and Memories, 41; Select Readers, Card Calendars (1899-10), 1,556, [and ot publications, making the entire distribut 69,179]. For "THE FRIEND

The Power, Preached or Unpreached.

It is interesting and instructive to note reading D'Aubigne's "History of the Refor tion," how the facts correspond with the marks of the author, as given in the follow extract:

"The monks were not the only persons rallied around the standard of the Gosp priests in still greater number began to pre the new doctrines. But preachers were no quired for its propagation; it frequently a on men's minds and aroused them from t deep slumber without any one having spoken

The italicising is our own, and while we w not wish to discourage a rightly author ministry, but believe such a ministry is a bl ing to the Church, but that power which the dawn of the Reformation, as well as in rise of our Society, "acted on men's mi and aroused them from their deep slum without any one having spoken," remains t the same as it was in that day, and is a pc that can gather without an outward minis But ministry without the power cannot ga to anything higher than its own source. is not long discourses we need, or words t merely upon the emotional feelings of the m but that which will reach to the life, and w will tend to stir up from the spirit slum reaching the witness for Truth in the be of the hearers. God is jealous of his ho and He will not give his praise to another to any graven image formed by the huma tellect alone and set above the Spirit, how soever the semblance may be to that whi really Spirit and life.

HOW THEY GET THEIR FIRE.—Various av ages have different methods of kindling re In New Holland a pointed stick is twirle between the palms of the hands until the on which it stands begins to smoke, and at breaks into flame. Other savages obt a spark by sticking one bit of wood upri the earth, cutting a slit in it lengthwis which they rub another bit of wood wi protruding piece until it flames.

The most ingenious method is, however, b followed by the inhabitants of Western M gascar. They use a string of animal hid ich they twirl the upright stick rapidly and sten the fire-lighting. Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

BY JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

Fourth Month 9th, 1900.

During the past week communications simi-to those previously received have come to d from different villages, in response to the resses sent to them, expressing satisfaction aving been addressed, and appreciation of subject-matter therein contained, together h the declaration of their trust in God and h in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. re is a cheerful tone and hopeful anticipa-evinced in the letters as to what the spring ht do for them. The need of vegetables is , and there is pleading for assistance to buy e cows.

visit has been made to some of the heads departments at Ottawa, by which more in-nation was obtained of what had been really e through government officials, and of what ht be expected through that channel. From official reports there received, the Doukho-ors are now busily engaged with their seed- but their horses are reported in poor dition, and more work will, in consequence, e to be done by hand. The probabilities that as much seed will be furnished as there be ground prepared for. The railroad com-ies have all agreed to grant free transport-n for seed requirements.

n the Saskatchewan District over one thou-l acres of land are reported as broken up. h from the official reports and private let- the general health of the colonists appears e quite as good as could reasonably be ex-ted, considering the privations to which have been subjected, although evidences the scurvy still exist, there being several es of diseased feet and limbs, and sadly im-ed vision from sore eyes, and, as yet, not entire exemption from the Cyprus or ma-al fever. But it is admitted that the gene-health has been improving, and the death- not large. The exceptional mildness of winter, the assistance received from the ritably disposed in the United States, and approximate amount from other sources, pendent of the bonus money of the Cana-Government and what was done prior to r arrival in Manitoba, Assiniboia and Sas-chewan, has, with the Divine blessing, pre-ed many from perishing. In an interview Ottawa, last week, with the Controller of Mounted Police of the Northwest Terri-, as also with the Superintendent of the migration Department, they were both asked ny more than two deaths had been reported could directly be attributed to hunger or osure, and they answered in the negative. mounted police reported that, while the khobors fed on common fare, such as shorts what might be rejected by others, they e cheerful and happy, and the general feel-was they would prosper, but must be helped l they can get a crop. Considerable debt has been incurred for flour. Numbers of them have, it is true, obtained what seemed to be good wages on the railroads, but the charges for provisions were out of proportion to their earnings. Necessity caused some of the women to go out in the distance to work, mothers, in divers instances, going out to save the exposure for their daughters, but the want of the language and other trials incident to a separation from their associations that were very dear to them, made it not only lonely and wearisome, but depressing, so the stay would be limited.

I was assured that all goods that had been forwarded had reached the Doukhobortsi, and when they could not be hauled by their own teams the goods had been delivered to them. This statement, from the heads of the department and confirmed by Arthur St. John and Anna De Carouso, now in Philadelphia on their way to England, is particularly acceptable, as also the insight given of the help rendered in other ways by noble-hearted individuals that were supporting the efforts of officials.

The acting Minister of the Interior, during the absence of the Minister, now in Europe, manifested a very kindly spirit. The Deputy Minister had not returned from a visit to Manitoba. He has taken a great interest in the cause.

Professor Mavor, of Toronto, who seems to be well versed in political economy, granted an interview, and favored me with a relation of some of his Russian correspondence, and the interest of the Doukhobortsi seemed to be an object near his heart. He wrote a preface to the work of Vladimir Tchertkoff, giving a history of the Doukhobortsi, or Spirit Wrestlers. On the whole there is great cause for gratitude that the hearts of those with whom the Doukhobortsi have had to do in the transition from their native land to where they now are, have been, we may say, prepared of the Lord to do what could be done to give them a settlement and start, and the disposition to strengthen the hands of those upon whom the management devolves is also cause for thankfulness, for their work is by no means light, and does need, with good statesmanship and heavenly wisdom, pecuniary aid. The women of Toronto and Montreal deserve credit for their endeavors to minister to the necessities of the colonists. Several hundred dollars have been lately sent for cows. Last year they contributed several hundred dollars for the same purpose, in addition to clothing, etc. A late donation of flax from England was particularly appropriate. But as cows can soon subsist on the grass of the field, those who feel like contributing for the purchase of cows, sheep and poultry, would indeed confer a great benefit, and might have satisfaction in the remembrance of the words of Solomon: "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord, and that which he hath given will He pay him again."

Extract from a letter to William B. Harvey, from the family of a rancher living near the Good Spirit Lake:

"Scarcely a day passes but some of [the Doukhobors] come to our house, and are continuously telling us to write and thank you all for your kindness in sending them so much provision, clothing, wool and garden seeds. They say they would like to do some work for you in return for all these offerings. Robert and myself have taken great pleasure this winter in going about among them, trying to cheer them up. There has been sickness among them, I think owing to not having enough vegetables is the cause, as they break out in bad sores, and complain of headache and of rheumatism. The medicine that was left here has cured a number of them. We were delighted in having it for the poor creatures. Nothing gives us greater pleasure than doing what we can for them.

"We still have Constant [a Doukhobor] working for us. He is a most trustworthy man. We would not like to part with him on any account.

"Some of the Doukhobors six miles north of us are preparing to go to the Assiniboine River, as they say they cannot get water. The remainder of them seem very contented. The only trouble is they have very little ploughing done for grain and vegetables, but we sincerely hope they will prosper."

RECEIVING AS A LITTLE CHILD.—It is a known fact that children are guided by their intuitions; they see the realities around them, and know and believe them. They know and believe that they are real beings; this is a real world; there is a God; there is right and wrong; wrong deserves punishment. As they grow older they drift away from their intuitions and depend more and more upon discursive reasoning, as their reason develops and becomes more and more into activity, and thus the door is thrown wide open for all kinds of errors. It is by matured and cultured men that opinions are formed and maintained, which are regarded by children as absurd and impossible. Idealism, agnosticism, scepticism, infidelity, are not the product, nor the characteristic, of childhood. There is a second question for scientific investigation. Are not the replies of the younger children the pure ideas of childhood, and are they not, because intuitive, nearer the truth and more reliable than the first attempts of immature reason; a power which in full maturity leads men so far astray, that professing themselves wise, they become fools and deny fundamental truths, which the little children know with intuitive vision?—W. H. Hodge.

THINGS are very plain mostly when we get once a fair view of them. Usually, however, we come to this clear vision slowly. A man may ponder over some problem long and laboriously without coming to the light. But by some slight circumstance the truth is made to flash upon him. Then he wonders how any man can fail to see as he does. Saul was in complete darkness till the light flashed upon him on the way to Damascus. When the scales fell from his eyes, thenceforward he gave himself no rest trying to convince others of the truth concerning Christ which he saw so clearly. We have need to exercise patience in teaching those who have not made the same discoveries of Truth we have. Remember how long we ourselves were blind, and to how many things we may be yet blind. Light is progressive even in those who are earnestly seeking for it. How much more slowly will those advance upon whom the light must be forced when there is no heart to it.—Christian Instructor.

Correspondence.

It was because of what I understood of thought, as developed nearly fifty years ago, that I was drawn to the Friends, and what I further learned helped to keep me with them. And to-day, so far as I understand, the furthest range of the movement in some directions barely grasps what was assured belief with the Quakers over two centuries ago.

To speak of the Bible as not being the highest and only authority for religious belief; to call in question the Trinity as three distinct persons; to disbelieve in baptismal regeneration in connection with water; to deny special sacredness to the elements of bread and wine on the communion table, or to any exclusive right of college bred ministers to dispense these, or to preach the gospel by virtue of apostolic succession; refusing to acknowledge inherent holiness in the First-day of the week, or in places for public worship, and esteeming as superstitious consecration of burial grounds, and hardly less, the ceremony often performed there; these being but a part of the trend of things Friends were largely responsible for, and crowning all, their arch heresy of quenchless faith in the universality of the grace of God. Friends should acknowledge that all that was "modern thought" then, and millions are still at issue with it to-day.

What a favor to realize that revelation has not ceased, but that now as ever heaven is open and "angels of God are ascending and descending on the Son of Man."

FROM ENGLAND.—To a society or church which is called to judge not according to appearance, but in a discernment of the true relations and importance of things, in this judgment it is often seen that those things which are highly esteemed among men are an abomination in the sight of God. The Spirit which moves the nations of the earth is not the spirit of righteous judgment, but a dark, carnal Spirit, and this is that which newspaper writers write for and please especially in time of war. So that it is not so much the knowledge of military facts and exploits we have to dread, as the Spirit which presents them out of the wisdom of God, and where admitted it darkens the windows of the soul. If I have any true sense of the situation and how it concerns lovers of their country and of the cause of Truth, the greatest consideration do not arise out of the present, but out of what will happen in the future, as direct or indirect results of the action of our Government and of the popular ferment it has excited.

I fear a permanent increase of militarism and the more that spreads the greater are the difficulties placed in the way of the development of true social harmony in a nation. And again, where individual liberty is cramped, spiritual liberty is cramped, and people are less disposed to think out serious questions independently.

In the long run priestcraft will profit out of this.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—For the nine months of the present fiscal year there was an increase of imports of dutiable merchandise of $76,148,067, and of exports an increase of $105,167,933, as compared with the same period of the preceding year.

The report of the arbitrators in the Delagoa Bay Railroad case has been received at the State Department by mail from Berne. It is likely to be accepted as final, though the award is considered inadequate and unjust.

There was a spirited debate in the House during the closing hours of the struggle over the Puerto Rican Tariff bill on the 11th instant. The measure was finally passed by a vote of 161 to 153. Nine Republicans voted against the measure. The President has signed the bill.

Assistant Secretary of the Navy Charles H. Allen, of Massachusetts, has been nominated as the first Governor of Puerto Rico. In accepting the appointment he says he will endeavor to administer the affairs of the island to the best interests of the people.

On the 11th instant, the Senate passed the Pacific Cable bill, a measure which appropriates $3,000,000 for a cable from San Francisco to Honolulu.

On the 13th the House, by a vote of 240 to 15, adopted a resolution for a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. Fourteen Republicans and one Democrat voted against it.

It is said at the State Department that no conclusion has yet been reached in the negotiations which have been in progress between the Department and the Spanish Government respecting the title to certain of the outlying islands in the Philippine archipelago.

The President has signed a proclamation opening to settlement, on Tenth Month 10th, the northern half of the Colville Indian Reservation in Washington.

A despatch from Pittsburg, dated Fourth Month 12th, says: "The Pittsburg Coal Company has inquiries from German firms asking for bids and quotations on Pittsburg gas coal. The letters state that it is desired to make contracts for a year, and for a number of years if terms can be agreed upon. An effort is being made to charter steamers, and if this can be done, and terms made, the Pittsburg Coal Company will sell fuel to the German Empire. Recently a deal with Russian officials fell through because transporting vessels could not be secured."

A resolution was introduced at the session of the Utica Presbytery last week, to amend the confession of faith by striking out the paragraphs relating to the doctrine of election and reprobation.

Returns made by Chester letter carriers indicate for that city a population of 40,538, which is twice the number of its inhabitants in 1890.

A colony of 400 Missouri farmers will settle in the valley of the Concho River, State of Chihauhau, Mexico, this spring.

Graphite is now being produced in Alabama, and two factories, which were recently started in Cleburne Co., are meeting with considerable success.

The New York World last week, says: "The latest despatches from Manila report six engagements with the insurgents at different points in the islands last week. "One armed body, 'all in full uniform,' was encountered on Friday within five miles of Manila. Two were killed and ten captured, 'but unfortunately Captain Sturgis's force was not large enough to pursue the main body."

"General Young, commanding in North Luzon, and General Bell, who commands in the South, have both 'made several requests for reinforcements.' They represent their troops as 'exhausted by the necessity of constant vigilance,' that they are unable to garrison the towns in their jurisdiction and that as soon as our soldiers leave a town 'the insurgents return to the district and kill the friendlies.'"

"And this after fourteen months of war, with 60,000 troops engaged and with Otis relieved because 'the war is over.'"

General Young reports this week, (on the 17th inst.), that 300 insurgent riflemen and bolomen attacked the American garrison at Batoc, province of North Ilocos, yesterday, but were repulsed, losing 100 men. The Americans had no casualties.

The enemy lost 53 men killed. Our troops also captured 44 men and burned the village. One American was wounded.

One of the reports just at hand from Manila is that William Odun, who is spoken of as a minor of large experience, has returned from a prospecting trip to the distant coast of Vigan. He showed rich specimens of gold, and declared that he had located a ledge of quartz as rich as anything in Colorado or California. He is organizing a company of ex-soldiers, and will go into the mountain districts of Vigan to secure claims.

There were 691 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 41 less than the previous week and 171 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 349 were males and 342 females; 134 died of pneumonia; 53 of consumption; 51 of heart diseases; 46 of influenza; 28 of convulsions; 26 of nephritis; 24 of apoplexy; 22 of neuralgia; 21 of old age; 17 of inanition; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of typhoid fever; 15 of marasmus; 15 of bronchitis; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of diphtheria; 11 of cancer; 11 of paralysis; 11 of debility; 10 of Bright's disease, and 9 of congestion of the lungs.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Third-day, the 17th.—After the reappointment of the Clerks the men's meeting entered on the consideration of the Queries and Answers.

About the usual state of regularity in the meeting and attendance of the meetings was reported, with some omissions of them in four localities. Encouragement was taken from evidences of life still maintained in many meetings, and in the preservation of a living ministry. Worldly standards of success in life continue to diminish the mid-week meetings, while a similar interest in the Christian life would greatly prosper the church. That which upholds our smaller country meetings so long without vocal ministry or usual attractions of churches, must be a power not of man; and in this Divine power alone have they a right to stand. The love of Christ constraining us, so that there will be a seeking to know his presence, was commended as the remedy for declension.

Love and unity were favorably acknowledged from all quarters, that by which men should know our discipleship, and realize the concern of the first Query also. The practice of frequent, or daily, reading of the Holy Scriptures in families seemed general within our borders, few exceptions appeared in the matter of simplicity of behavior, speech and apparel. Earnest exhortations were given forth on these subjects, and testimonies of preservation experienced through their observance. Likewise concern for sympathetic relations between parents and children.

In the women's meeting, besides the consideration of Queries and of the educational reports, earnest exercises on the subject of peace and the obligations of the Christian life claimed serious attention.

Fourth-day, the 18th.—A concern was introduced for the appointment of a committee to visit in gospel love meetings and members within the compass of the Yearly Meeting for their encouragement and upbuilding in the Truth. Much sympathy was expressed with this proposal, yet it was the general sense that the service might be more livingly performed by concerned members as they should be especially drawn in their own hearts for service towards their brethren in any place.

Answers to the fifth Query showed that the poor in the Society are cared for and their children educated. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor." This charity beginning at home has extended to the suffering Doukhobors, and is now called for towards the far more famine-stricken natives of India. As to the placing of our children under the care of others, what advantage has the Friend, or the being placed under his care, except as there are committed unto him "the oracles of God," livingly observed?

Three exceptions in regard to military service were reported, and the other particulars of the Query relating to the State had been well observed. We were reminded to maintain these and all observances of our Queries, not only as testimonies of Truth and of protest, but in the spirit of witnesses. So should we be carried on in life above considerations of mere expediency or policy. The world greatly needs such witnesses.

A general carefulness as to living within our circumstances, moderation in trade or business, and just payment of debts, and care to deal with offenders in the right spirit, had appeared. In reflecting upon all the Queries it was remarked, that the prophecy of William Penn, that the "exercise of concerned souls" should be felt upon communities, had been fulfilled, and that our peace must consist in faithfulness in our day.

The Annual Answers represented that five elders and one minister had died during the year. No new meetings were settled, births and deaths were regularly recorded. Nineteen schools were maintained, and the Queries and Answers were regularly read in Subordinate Meetings.

An interesting exercise, reciprocated by young and old, for a place of sympathetic confidence in each other's thought, spread over the meeting.

The educational statistics showed that seven hundred and thirty-one members were between five and twenty years of age; one hundred and seventy-three of these have been at schools not taught by Friends, and seventy-five not at school.

The report on the use of intoxicating drinks showed improvement in some quarters, several Monthly Meetings being entirely clear of their use; and in others there had been no diminution (in two or three instances a slight increase) in the number using them.

In the Women's Meeting the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read and the language quoted as applicable to their work, "Blessed are they that sow beside all waters." There is work for all to do, and the young were encouraged to be faithful. The patience and faith of the Doukhobors under suffering was pointed to as an example and as a lesson in moral heroism that even children can appreciate. After prayer for Divine aid and protection the meeting adjourned.

At three P. M. the meeting of Ministers and Elders assembled. A large number of anointed spiritual exercises appeared, and in much deep and waiting silence the crown and diadem of assemblies in Divine communion was the covering of the closing day, raising the whole occasion above our ability to report.

Fifth-day the 19th.—Meetings for Divine Worship were held in three of the meeting-houses in the city as usual, a large and interested number being gathered at Fourth and Arch Streets, under baptizing power.

The committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown reported the number on the roll as one hundred and eighty-five, an increase over last year. The total expenditures had been forty-five thousand eight hundred and eighty-two dollars, an excess of one hundred and eighty-eight dollars above the income. It appeared that each pupil had cost the institution one hundred dollars more than was paid in for him. Except for many cases of measles lately appearing, the health of the school has been good. It was with sorrow that record must be made of the death of the efficient housekeeper, our friend Regina S. Rote, who had served the institution satisfactorily for eight years.

By modifications in the lecture room a fine gymnasium had been added to the resources of the school, besides an enlarged audience room. The expense of these changes had been borne by private contributions. Manual training, cooking and sewing have a valuable place. The thoroughness of the school work is recognized outside. A Friend has added $10,000 to the funds of the school, subject to an annuity of $450 during her life.

These and other valuable improvements, both in the building and in the educational interests manifested that the minds of the committee had been on the alert. General interest in the institution had been awakened by the efforts of the Old Scholars' Association, and the $62,000 which they have raised, as part of a memorial fund, will long help the school and scholars.

"A concern for the religious welfare of the children lies very near to our best feelings," the committee say, "and we can but desire that the officers of the institution, as well as the committee in charge, may be helped so to discharge their duties in this interesting and responsible field of service as to fulfill the object for which this school was established, namely, the religious and guarded education of our youth."

The committee for the civilization and improvement of the Indians reported a well-cared-for condition of the work at Tunesassa. The average attendance of children at the school was 43. The good behavior of the children in meeting, as well as in school, and the manifest interest in their studies, indicated that they were under the care of faithful and conscientious teachers. Expenditures on school and farm amounted to $5,726.49—less than receipts by $41.46. The property is valued at $34,000.

The attempt is made to conduct the farm as a model farm. A second edition of the "Lives and Happy Deaths of Some Indians" had been put in circulation. The meeting appropriated $2,500 for next year.

The Educational committee reported the giving of financial assistance to sixteen schools of Friends, which have been attended by 294 pupils. Of these, 113 were members and the remainder connected with Friends by birth or interest. A census made by the committee had disclosed that there are 145 Friends' children attending schools not taught by members, principally the public schools. The Superintendent had been unusually attentive in her visitations of our schools and in conferences with teachers. These are afforded the use of a loan library of 865 volumes. An appropriation of $2,000 was made for the coming year's work in these schools.

Sixth-day, the 20th.—After the reading of the Treasurer's report, the raising of $6,500 was ordered for the coming year. A Committee on Education was appointed to serve for three years. Attention was called by a member to the dangers of competitive games, and the objectionable contents of some reading books. Their use was considered unnecessary, especially at a time when so many unobjectionable books are on the market.

The exercises which had been spread before the meeting, particularly in the consideration of answers to the Queries, were in much of their substance gathered into a Minute of Advices, which was now read. It recommended the feelings of sympathy that had been expressed for small and declining congregations, and exhorted to a deepening in spiritual life, and to a full dedication of heart. "The truth was expressed that it is sin, even though it be in refined form, that clouds our spiritual perceptions, and that sanctification is imperatively necessary to fit us for the service of the Most High." A free Gospel ministry, bearing witness to and for the Truth as it is in Jesus, and moderation in all things, was suitably set forth. The minute concluded as follows, "It was cheering to the Yearly Meeting to hear the expressions of loving regard by some of the younger members towards those in maturer life, and the encouragement by the former class to counsel with and confide in those whose long experience in the Christian path qualifies them to help others. A cordial response was expressed to this cementing feeling, and the hearts of both young and old, we believe, have been drawn by the outflow of the love of Christ to us all into a renewed devotion to his blessed cause."

A lively appreciation of the minute was manifest, and exercises for the good of the Church being poured forth, were succeeded by a covering of fervent supplication, under which it was precious to enjoy the manifestation of the Divine presence.

A weighty minute of acknowledgment of the favors vouchsafed during the deliberations of the week was read by the Clerk, and the solemn silence which followed seemed fraught with blessing for the further work and service of our day.

No memorial of any deceased Friend was presented to the Yearly Meeting this year, but the memory of its former Clerk, who was also editor of this periodical, doubtless was presented afresh to many hearts. It seems fitting to present in this number the memorial read last year concerning our friend, JOSEPH WALTON, who was so long and usefully identified with the service of the Yearly Meeting.

LONG-LIVED SEEDS.—Some twenty-five years ago, when the slag produced by the ancient Greeks in working the silver mines of Laurium, near Athens, was removed, in order to be reworked by more efficient modern appliances, the seeds of a kind of poppy of the genus Glancinon, which had lain underneath the slag, in a dormant condition, for at least 1,500 years, sprang up again all over the uncovered ground. Unknown in modern times, this plant was described in the first century of our era by Dioscorides and Pliny, and had disappeared from the face of the globe for fifteen or twenty centuries. The fact that these seeds should have retained their vitality so long seems very extraordinary, but there are other instances qu as remarkable. For instance, raspberry se found in 1835 in an ancient tumulus in a co buried thirty feet below the surface, and lieved to have been there since the sec century, were successfully planted. And another case seeds of the Polygonum Convol lus, dug up from the bottom of a sand- where they were believed to have been bu for two thousand years, were still vigorous produced healthy plants.

Joseph Walton.*

He was the son of Joseph and Abi Wal and was born in Philadelphia the fourth of the Eighth Month, 1817. After hav been a pupil of Westtown Boarding Schoo entered Haverford School, and was one of first who graduated from that Institutior the year 1836. He was then employed classical teacher at Westtown, remaining this position about ten years. Subsequentl was engaged in other business. In the 1879, upon the death of Charles Evans, Jos Walton succeeded him in the editorshi THE FRIEND, and continued the manager of that publication until his final illness. was well qualified for this sphere of use ness, and the periodical, under his man ment, was a welcome visitor in the home very many families, who loved to see the tinguishing views of the founders of our ligious Society upheld.

He was a member of Philadelphia Mor Meeting from his birth until his remova Moorestown, N. J., in the year 1874, and tinued a member of this Monthly Meeting his death in 1898. He was married in to Lydia Lippincott, of N. J., a union w proved congenial and helpful to both.

As a boy, Joseph Walton is said to been, by nature, quick tempered; but through the effect of Divine Grace, we overcome, that his manner indicated only cidity and quietness of spirit. He seem have been, from childhood, thoroughly vinced of the principles and testimonies o Society of which he was born a member, an maintained them unwaveringly throughou life; and it might be said that it was his mary object to uphold and inculcate the plicity and truthfulness of the religio Christ before all with whom he came in tact.

His intellectual endowments were good his opportunities for school education ha been beyond the average in his early year was additionally fitted for usefulness. He a close observer of nature, being special terested in the sciences of botany and ogy; and his contributions to the journal which he was connected often showed fruitful results of his quiet walks thr country lanes and woods; or indicated in ple language his familiarity with the in gations and conclusions of those who had a study of natural science; thus promot landable interest in his youthful reade elevating thoughts and pursuits.

He held the pen of a ready writer through a long course of years kept not incidents connected with his own and hly esteemed—not only in his watchful and ome extracts are subjoined from his corpondence :

Seventh Month 5th, 1865, in a letter to a nd, he writes : "I can add my testimony hat of many others—of the goodness and ng kindness of our merciful Heavenly her. Ah, He it is who melts the heart and es brokenness, as Isaac Penington says, t he may be tender towards it, and em-ce it in his arms of love and reconciliation Blessed, and magnified and adored, forever, his holy name! When thus favored, may e our concern to return all the praise to n, to whom alone it belongs."

Eighth Month 26th, 1866.—"I feel, I hope, ncreased desire to promote the spiritual fare of my fellow mortals. How much re noble an employment to spend one's time loing good to others than in heaping up es for one's self."

Second Month 14th, 1868.—"How good is Lord, and worthy to be praised. The sal-ion of the soul is a wonderful thing. What ld become of some of us if we had not a y merciful God. In reflecting on his goods I have felt a nearer approach to the sen-on of love and gratitude to Him than was al for me. Though I rejoice in this feel, yet it is with fear, knowing something of own frailty."

Ninth Month 3rd, 1871.—"Amidst all bts and conflicts, is it not a precious thing e able at times to feel an evidence of the ng kindness of our Heavenly Father, and a e of its continued extension to us, tender-the heart, and raising a song of thanks-ng to the author of all our mercies, to m all honor and praise belong."

Eighth Month 9th, 1875.—"It is a comto see Friends willing and earnest labor-in the best of causes, even that which is lified with immortality, and crowned with rnal life; and yet we must often feel that success depends on the Divine blessing. If feel satisfied that we are laboring in the field of service designed by the great Husbandman, and we are performing therein the duties which He appoints, I believe it is best not to sink into too much discouragement at the little apparent fruit resulting from our labors. Does not such a desponding spirit indicate a practical want of sufficient faith in the power, wisdom or beneficence of the Ruler of the universe? And will he not give such a blessing (whether known to the instrument or not), as is consistent with his all-wise designs? However comforting and encouraging it is to see good fruit resulting from our efforts, yet I think our primary motive should be to fill up our measure of duty, so that we may receive at last the glorious reward, so infinitely beyond our deservings."

Although not a recorded minister, Joseph Walton was at times led into vocal service in our meetings for worship. His remarks were weighty, and would strike home to the hearts of his hearers. Upon such occasions his auditory were often tenderly affected, as he would cheer or gently exhort others to follow his loving Saviour. His spirit was much exercised for the religious welfare of the young, with whom he honestly and faithfully labored for their establishment in the Truth. In approaching these objects of his solicitude, such was his simplicity and gentleness of manner, coupled with manifestations of pure love and Christian interest, that a door of entrance was found to their hearts. He was indeed a nursing father in the Church. Near the close of his life, and upon the last occasion but one that he attended his meeting, he was led to address the children, of whom there were many present, tenderly admonishing them to remember the purpose for which they were assembled—that it was not to sit expectant of outward ministry, but to endeavor to bring their minds into that stillness wherein they might be prepared to receive the Word of Divine Life addressed to the soul in secret.

It was the effect of Divine Grace upon him to induce a carefulness not to compromise with inconsistencies, and yet to feel very tenderly towards those whose views were different from his own. For many years before his death we cannot recall his speaking harshly of Friends, or others whose practices were at variance with sound Quakerism or the Gospel.

As old age came on, the mellowing influence of the Divine Grace, which he had cherished for so many years, became increasingly apparent. His placid temper patiently accepted the trials and infirmities of life, and to the very end he quietly performed the duties which he had assumed in the days of vigorous manhood. He regarded the approaching dissolution of the body with serenity and hope, as one awaiting with holy confidence the coming of his Lord. And now, we reverently believe that, having done his day's work in the Master's own time, he has been gathered, as a shock of corn fully ripe, into the Heavenly garner.

His decease occurred Second Month 10th, 1898, in the eighty-first year of his age. His funeral was largely attended by Friends from near and far, and many testimonies were borne to his Christian character and faithfulness.

It takes time to be thorough, but the time thus expended is not lost.

Jemima Reese Boone.

Was the daughter of Ambrose and Deborah Boone, of Pickering, Ontario. She was born on the sixth of Third Month, 1846, and died on the twenty-first day of Tenth Month, 1899, aged fifty-three years, seven months and fourteen days. Her father died in Ohio whilst traveling in the ministry. His prayers on behalf of his family of five girls and two boys were graciously answered, and gratefully they acknowledge the favor and blessing of their Heavenly Father extended towards and resting on their home. One of his sons and his wife also were called away, leaving a son, towards whom his aunts extended a motherly care. This care devolved, in a large measure, on Jemima, who has but lately been called from works to rewards. She herself was a willing, unselfish worker, dwelling in humility, and, though possessing a vivacity of disposition, this was held in check by the power of Divine grace, which early induced her, whilst holding a good and tender conscience, to set a close watch on her words, so that, in the prospect of death, she could truthfully say, "I only remember once telling a lie, and the memory of that was enough for me." Nor did she rest till, through true heartfelt repentance, she was, in mercy, assured of forgiveness. But very far was she from trusting in self-righteousness. She well knew the conflicts of spirit in the fight of faith with the buffetings of the enemy on the one hand, aided and abetted by the frailty of the flesh on the other, but we feel assured she came off more than conqueror through the power of Him who loved her and gave himself for her, that He might redeem her to himself. In her humility, her watchful walk, her loving fulfilment of every duty in life towards God and man, one beheld the lamp of Divine grace shining through it all, for, through the obedience of faith, she made a good confession to Him who was her chief love.

Early in her illness, in view of unfavorable symptoms, she remarked, "I do not know that it will make much difference, if I were only fit to go, but I have done so many things," meaning such as were contrary to the Divine will.

Pending a critical surgical operation, being asked how she felt, she replied, "I trust it will be all right either way, but I would like a little clearer evidence." Yet she, with thankfulness, acknowledged that she had been favored far beyond what she had deemed herself worthy of, expressing a hope that she clearly understood all that was required at her hands.

Overhearing a remark to another friend that her recovery seemed very doubtful, for a time affected her much. She prayed fervently for help to resign all into God's care and keeping, which prayer was, we believe, answered, for she soon resumed her habitual calmness, and this quietude of spirit continued to the end, nor did the approach of death in any way discompose her, and when informed that no hope of her recovery was entertained, she received the intelligence with perfect calmness.

About twenty-four hours before her decease, thinking her time to go was nearly come, she bid her sorrowing friends farewell. Again reviving, and wishing to express the burden of her mind, she requested her medical attendant to give her something to clear her voice, but this he despaired of, and with sorrow declined the request. Her friends now thought she would speak no more, but she broke out in prayer that "the blessings that had been meted out to her in the past might be continued to the end," saying, "I have full confidence in thee." She continued praising her Heavenly Father for all his mercies. She prayed that the Divine presence might rest as a protection over her beloved sisters, and for her nephew, "the dear boy whom I apprehend was left to my care. Oh, protect him, and be a Father to him when I am gone, and if I have not done towards him my whole duty, be pleased graciously to forgive me." Her last words to her nephew were: "Do right—that is the safest and best way."

She requested her sisters not to grieve for her, saying, shortly before her release, "I shall soon be free forever from pain and troubles."

Doukhobortsi Correspondence.

The following is taken from a letter evidently written in response to the address sent among the villages.

JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

Fourth Month 21st, 1900.

Peace and the blessing of God be unto you from our Lord Jesus Christ:

Our dear and beloved brothers and sisters, who are abiding by the faith of our God, and who are so near our hearts spiritually as brothers and sisters.

Your much beloved letters we received, and we read in them of your sincere devotion to us, and to all our Christian community, and your anxiety about our exiled relatives in Siberia.

From the bottom of our soul we thank you for all the support you have given us in the time of our need, physically as well as spiritually. We had a great many physical wants, and you assisted us. At the present time we hope in our Omnipotent God, that we will gain strength, and that our circumstances will assume a brighter aspect. Your letters are always dear to us, and a great help to us; they are keeping up the spirit of your weaker brothers, and dispel our despondency.

Dear brothers and sisters, this letter we are writing to you from only one village by the name of Poterpievshy (Sufferers). We are keeping our children, husbands and parents in Siberia, Russia, informed of all your efforts in reference to us made by you, and we are sending our prayers to the Almighty God for them, that He may deliver them from the rigors of that climate, and unite them with us. They will be very glad to hear that you are uniting your efforts with ours in their behalf.

We are by these presents sending to all the Quakers our deep hearty greetings. We are faring well and are happy.

Our old grandmother, Anastasia Vasylievna Vershina, recently received a letter from her beloved son, Peter Vasiliewitch Vershina, from Obodorsk. This news gave us much consolation; since we arrived in Canada this is the first letter.

From all those children and brothers who are in Jakutsk, we receive letters frequently. They are all awaiting the day when God will bring us together, to see each other personally. The small children of those who are exiled in Siberia, are very homesick for their parents.

From our village there are in Siberia eleven brothers and one sister.

We hope in God, that He will not desert us, and leave us orphans. We are awaiting your reply,

VASYLIEVITCH ZIBIN, (Village) Poterpievshy.

A Year's Work for the Doukhobortsi.

Report of the Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, read in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Fourth Month 16th, 1900.

The committee in charge of aid for the Doukhobortsi report—That since Fourth Month, 1899, two additional ship-loads of the immigrants have landed in Canada. One thousand and thirty of these were the company who had been in Cyprus; and twenty-two hundred and seventy came direct from Batoum. The whole immigration numbered about seven thousand three hundred souls. They have all been located on lands assigned them by the Canadian Government in the provinces of Manitoba, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan.

A considerable extent of ground was planted with wheat, potatoes and other crops. In numerous instances where teams of oxen and horses were wanting, and the men were laboring elsewhere, plowing was done by the motive power of women. The yield from this labor was cut off in some places by unseasonable frosts.

Pecuniary help continued to flow into our treasury, which, with wages earned by able-bodied men in the employment of others, and supplies from other sources, sufficed to support the people during the summer and autumn. Houses were built, wells dug, and other preparations for their homes were carried on.

As winter approached we were impressed with the necessity of greater efforts to prevent suffering and starvation during the cold weather. As the result of a public meeting, held in Philadelphia, to devise means of assistance, a general interest was aroused among Friends in many places, and, by the voluntary labors of younger Friends and others, whose help we gratefully acknowledge, generous offerings of money, clothing, food and medicines were made.

Our friend, Joseph S. Elkinton, met the new arrivals, as he had the previous ones, and was able to communicate with them at once, to extend a welcome and to cheer them with the assurances of religious sympathy and friendship.

In order to have a better knowledge of the situation and needs of the immigrants, Joseph S. Elkinton has twice visited them in their settlements. In the Sixth Month he was accompanied by William Evans, and in the Eleventh Month by William B. Harvey. These visits have been a great advantage, in enabling us to comprehend the present and prospective wants of these people, and in ascertaining the most economical methods and safe channels for administering relief.

The contributions in money received since those reported to our last Yearly Meeting amount to $24,834.42, and the estimated value of clothing, food, etc., given in kind, is $5,265.00. Total, $30,099.42. There have been appropriated, approximately, for food, $9,000; for wool, $1,640; for spinning-wheels, $400; for seeds, $3,712; for teams and implements, $2,500; for milk cows, $1,765; transportati $1,400.*

Two hundred pounds (£200) have been ceived from a Committee of London Meet for Sufferings, and various sums from M nonites and River Brethren in Pennsylva and elsewhere.

Four hundred copies of the New Testam in the Russian Language, given by the Brit and Foreign Bible Society, were distributed the Colonists.

There are more than one hundred men of age subject to military service, left in exile Siberia, as prisoners, for their refusal to c ply with the requisitions of the governmen this respect. The names of these men h been furnished by their friends in Canada, application made by the English committe the authorities in St. Petersburg for their lease. The difficulty of a direct appeal to Emperor has not been overcome, and we h no assurance as yet that the petition will granted.

A written address was prepared by our c mittee,† a Russian translation of which circulated among the various communitie the Doukhobors. Replies to this commun tion manifest gratitude for the interest t by Friends in their spiritual as well as for t temporal welfare; while the language use cludes a confession to the foundation truth Christian faith.

Baptism.

tize with water, because Jesus sanctioned Judea. Jesus, his disciples and the Jews were all Jews, and this was under the the law of Moses; but that is no precefor us either Jews or gentiles in these ifestation of his will that we should cone to observe the covenants and customs of

By this one spirit are we now baptized into one body, Jew and gentile, bond and free, male and female, all one in Christ Jesus; all flesh, sons and daughters, servants and handmaidens, old and young.

By no other baptism can we all be baptized into one body. Water baptism diverts from this one baptism into one body. Water is not to be understood whenever baptism is named, neither is baptism to be understood whenever
Luke xii: 50 | water is named. There are many baptisms without water mentioned in Scripture. John's baptism was of water,
Acts i: 5 | Christ's baptism was of Holy Spirit. Churchmen say, burial with Christ in
Rom vi: 2, 3 | baptism is figurative. A mortification of our lusts, not a literal burial in water. We accept this teaching and suggest
Rom vi: 3, 6 | that baptism into Christ and crucifixion with Christ are no more literal. We see no more water about baptism into
Gal. iii: 27
Gal. iii: 20
Gal. vi: 14
Gal. v: 24 | Christ than we see wood in the cross upon which all Christ's children are crucified. Churchmen say, (water) baptism is generally necessary to salvation. As an apology for introducing this word "generally," they say the thief upon the cross was evidently saved without baptism as we understand. This is contrary to Scripture teaching.
John iii: 7
Acts ii: 5 | Christ said positively, "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit, and shall be born again." There is no "generally" in it. Without new birth and baptism we have
Luke xxiii: 40, 43 | no hope of salvation. The thief was evidently baptized upon the cross and born again without water, and was thus prepared for paradise. He experienced repentance, forgiveness and remission of sin. Simon the Sorcerer was baptized with water.
Luke xiii: 3
Acts viii: 13
Acts viii: 21 | Was he born again? We are told that he remained in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity, and that his heart was not right in the sight of God. Although baptized by apostles evidently Simon was not born again. Although not baptized with water the repentant thief was born again. There is no Scripture connection between new birth and
Gal. iii: 27 | water baptism. Paul said, "as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

Had Simon put on Christ his heart would have been right in the sight of God; not in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity. Ac-
Gal. iii: 27 | cording to Paul's teaching Simon was not baptized into Christ. Baptism, not of water, but of Holy Spirit, makes the heart right. By resisting this baptism we fail to be baptized into Christ. By yielding to this

Luke xi: 9, 13
Acts ii: 16-21
Joel ii: 28, 29
Acts x: 34, 35 | offered to every son and daughter of Adam. Those of every land who never saw the Scriptures may be baptized with this saving baptism and born again without instrumentality. There are diversities of operations, but it is the same God.
1 Cor. xii: 4, 7
Heb. ii: 9 | Our Saviour left us not dependent on book, man or water for salvation. His love is universal and unbounded; He tasted death for every man.

The grace of God which brings salvation has Titus ii: 11
John xvi: 12, 14
Luke xii: 48 | appeared to all men, but not necessarily to all men in the same way and fulness, but always in sufficient fulness to bring salvation if heeded. He now stands at every door and knocks. If we open He will come in and sup with us. If we love Him He will abide with us. But we must heed his gentle knocks, his still small voice, and open.

Churchmen say, the visible church, comprising persons good and bad, saints and sinners, is the kingdom of God or the kingdom of heaven, and that the door of entrance is baptism—water baptism—duly administered. Paul
Cor. vi: 9, 11
Gal. v: 19, 22
Eph. v: 5, 6 | tells the Corinthians, the Galatians and the Ephesians all in nearly the same language thrice repeated that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Fornication, uncleanness, enmity, strife, jealousy, drunkenness, revellings and such like,—I tell you plainly they who practice such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. "But
Gal. v: 22 | the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, kindness, faithfulness, meekness and temperance." Paul certainly implies by the whole context that those who bear the fruits of the Spirit, love, joy, peace, etc., are the inheritors of the kingdom of God and that the unrighteous are rejected. Again Paul says, some who were once unrighteous have been "washed, sanctified and justified in
Cor. vi: 11 (R.V.) | the name of the Lord Jesus and in the Spirit of our God." These unrighteous Corinthians were made inheritors of the kingdom of God without water baptism. Paul knew no door of entrance to this kingdom by water baptism or he would have told us.

We read, "Ye shall be baptized with the Matt. iii: 11
John iii: 5 | Holy Spirit and with fire," and again, "Except a man be born of water and the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

This baptism with Holy Spirit and with fire, and this birth by water and Spirit are plainly both one and the same operation.

Man, who is prone to substitute the letter
2 Cor. iii: 6 | which killeth for the Spirit which giveth life long ago perverted this testimony of Christ to Nicodemus by construing "born" to mean "baptized," and thus he would
Matt. xxiii: 14 | close the kingdom of God against his fellow man who was not baptized with water. With the Bible, which was long forbidden now open to all, how can we of
John iii: 5 | this enlightened day still adhere to such idle dogma, or ever quote these words of our Saviour as authority for any water baptism.

By the whole context He had no allusion to water baptism. Had He meant "baptized" He would have said baptized and not born. Just
John iii: 5
Matt. iii: 11 | as Christ said we must surely be born of water and the Spirit, and we must just as surely be baptized with the Holy Spirit and fire. But we must no more be born of material water than we must be baptized with material fire.

Neither is Christ's fan material, nor his axe

Rev. vii: 17 | at the root of the tree, nor the waters which He said should flow from the bodies of believers. Nor the waters which He promised should be in them a well of living water, springing up unto everlasting life. Nor the living fountains of water where God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes. Neither shall
Zech xiii: 9
Mal. iii: 2
John iii: 25, 31
Gal. v: 24 | we be tried and refined literally as gold and silver, nor purged literally as a fuller purges with material soap. These fires, waters, etc., are spiritual, these purifications are symbols of our spiritual regeneration and preparation for the kingdom of God, which the unrighteous shall neither inherit nor enter. Like those Corinthians, we must be washed, sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and in the Spirit of our God. Saved by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Spirit shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour.

Cor. vi: 11 (R.V.) | 1 Cor. ii: 10-17 | Titus iii: 5

Col. ii: 11, 23

We must be circumcised and crucified as well as washed and baptized. We must be crucified upon a cross which we may often carry, but with outward eyes can never see. We must be circumcised in Christ and buried with Him in baptism. We must be baptized into Christ, put on Christ. We must be circumcised in heart and spirit by the circumcision of Christ. As instructed by Scripture we accept this circumcision without hands and this baptism and washing without water, and do most firmly believe that our Saviour never commanded nor intended any other.

Three Days on the Rhine.

We had delightful weather for our steamboat trip up the Rhine. We much enjoyed stopping off at various points to inspect old castles and towns. Our fortunate experiences were only somewhat marred by occasional encounters with porters in a foreign tongue, and these, whilst at the time aggravating, were frequently amusing to us.

Second-day evening we reached Bonn in time for dinner. When we alighted from the train a whole company of porters wrenched the bags of the boys from their hands, as soon as they discovered we were Americans, and rushed off with their belongings in spite of all protests. There was almost a fight—for all our party are not followers of Fox—until a man was discovered who understood English, and who helped us to insist on having our bags returned to us. Then the porters were left scowling with rage because we refused to fee them for having run off with our luggage.

The hotel at Bonn has beautiful gardens, extending almost down to the water's edge. That evening, in wandering around town looking at the shops, we became lost, but finally got back to the hotel, after aid from a big, jolly German, who made us understand that he had once been in London, and consequently was interested in things English and American. His was one of the ever observable instances that travel broadens one's sympathies and interest in other people.

The next morning we went from Bonn to Drachenfels on the boat. We lay over a few hours at the latter place to ascend the mountain and view the old ruins. The scene from the top is charming. The broad river winds below, bordered by vine-covered hills and lovely gardens and homes. The town at our feet was very picturesque. A few of our party went up the path on donkeys, but most of us walked. All along the way were little booths, whence came forth men or girls as we passed, who endeavored to beguile us into buying their wares or to have our pictures taken.

That afternoon we had a lively time at dinner on the boat. The boys were glad they were alive, and sitting out on deck in the fresh air, after their exercise, they disposed of dinner in a surprising fashion. Two of them ate immense portions of fried potatoes, after dessert, as a supplement to the meal. They were so lively for the rest of the day that we assumed that the generally harmless vegetable had somehow been transformed into alcohol during the processes of digestion.

At St. Goar we found delightful rooms awaiting us in the Hotel Lilie, commanding beautiful views up and down the river. Although 9 P. M., it was at once voted most desirable to examine the Rheinfels Castle by moonlight. So up the party started to view the ruins. Climbing the steep roadway, the younger members of the party let off their exuberant spirits and the effects of their unlimited fried potatoes by playing leap-frog and carrying one another up pick-a-back. The custodian of the castle was soon started on the rounds by his enthusiastic visitors. The ruins are the largest in Germany. Here powerful princes held sway for centuries, until the Revolution of 1797, when the great structure was nearly destroyed by the oppressed people. It seemed very "spookey" to wander amidst great walls and dungeons by candle-light, where deep shadows darkened our feet and grotesque stones peered at us from every turn. The trip was highly successful from a romantic point of view. When, about 10 o'clock, we stood on the highest tower, and watched the lights of the town, far below, and some fireworks in the distance, and viewed the black, swift river, and saw the moon creep slowly over a distant height, we all agreed that our experience was a novel and delightful one.

The next morning we further examined the castle. The wine cellar is immense, as large and high as a good-sized house, cut out of the rock and arched over. The views from the old battlements are fine. We wandered into all sorts of dark holes, and some of the party were taken through hundreds of feet of dismal passage-ways cut out of the rock, and leading from one part of the ruins underground to another. Many acres are covered by this old place, part residence and part fortification—all connected with and the result of the social conditions of those bad old days.

We have had many kinds of funny experiences caused by our not fully understanding the language. Thus, at St. Goar, I found on my bed a cover about two inches thick, and another one about twelve inches thick on top of it, the latter very light and warm and made of feathers. I sent for the chambermaid, and, after much talk and many signs, a light of understanding came into her countenance. She went away, and soon returned with another immense "comfortable," and proudly laid it down on top of the rest. I wondered what she thought Americans needed to sleep under in mid-summer. But then, happily, W. F. W. came to the rescue, and explained that I desired a "wollene Decke." Again she hastened away, and brought what I wanted, an every-day, ordinary woolen blanket, one of which was enough.

The next afternoon we resumed our life on the steamboat. After getting settled, and after having disposed of about six underlings who worried us with their efforts to force us into unnecessary expense, we ordered dinner. It was highly enjoyable on the big steamer's upper deck, in the fresh, dry air, as well as to w the panorama constantly unfolding to our v Up to Bingen the scenery is not grand beautiful. The mountain sides are often raced and green with vineyards to their t for here is the great wine-producing regio the world. Every few miles, on some projecting rock would be seen the tum down walls of an old-time fortification or tle. Not infrequently, away up on a crag, w stand a grand modern castle, whose owner, his towers and peaks, can look down on peaceful world below. The swift excu boats, gay with people, were often met. entrance to the frequent railway tunnels handsome stone structures, architectural tone with the surrounding scenery. Their nels never present just a big, black hole the mountain side, as with us. The banl this charming river are dotted with lovely dences and lined with gardens and terr The houses in the cute little villages have fashioned gables pointed towards the park rows of linden trees, so giving a picture foreign effect, which our much more American streams cannot attain.

Many of the bridges are exceedingly g ful. A boat-bridge at Bingen is made of anchored in the river alongside of each all the way across. Some of these craf propelled by steam. When, as is often the a wide raft comes floating down the st the bridge is quickly parted by a few o boats being allowed to drift down the cu some on one side and some on the other opening thus made. When the raft or has passed through, the boats, which while have been held in position by steam back to their regular places, an interrupted traffic is resumed.

At evening we left the steamer and train for Heidelberg. At Mayence we h go from the pier to the station, on the side of the city, and our transit was memorable by consummating a definite be with two porters, who agreed to take u our baggage to the station, over a mile for a stipulated sum. They then put th gage in a hand-cart and rushed off, tell to follow to where the carriage was. E carriage appeared. Away they went, a had to follow rapidly, so as not to lose of our luggage. Then it began to dawn that we were deceived. But we were he To argue was useless. We could not car heavy belongings, and time was too limi protest. So we humbly trudged along w our effects, with mingled care and amus It all turned out pretty well, as we had view of some handsome buildings in th and just reached the station in time. At stadt, on this trip, we noticed some trolleys. The pole terminated in an im sort of ring at the top, where it touch wire overhead. It could never jump fr position, as the wire was inside of the bi at the end of the pole. How interst wires were crossed I do not know.

What most impressed us when first e Germany was the great number of un everywhere observable. Not only are the often really good-faced officers of the to be seen strutting all about, with cl sabres, red and gold collars and gilt bra golden bands and epaulettes, but ever encountered distinctive uniforms connec- with many of the usual occupations of tions from the Letters and Memoranda of Robert Milhous.

For "THE FRIEND."

he following portion of Robert Milhous's oranda having been lost in transmission to FRIEND and lately re-copied, is here pro- d to remedy the breach in the narrative.].]

rst Month 1st, 1885.—Another year has ed over and have I made any advancement rogress in the way to the Heavenly King- ? I often have feared but little, and yet e a fervent desire remains in my heart to ound in the way of my duty and to have ccounts in readiness so as to render them joy, and be admitted through mercy and eming love into the mansions of rest and e, for I am made very sensible that the rs of the frail tabernacle are giving way the shadows of evening are lengthened being now nearly seventy-four years old, h is considered past the average life of that all that is found within my heart, rary to the will of my Heavenly Father, ut be removed, and that all my many sins shortcomings might be forgiven. Surely, ve been followed and watched over by ls unslumbering Shepherd, all my life long this very day, unworthy as I feel myself e, and many times He has preserved my through imminent dangers, and thus I re- a monument of mercy. O, may the com- rear be better spent than the last, just gone ver, I humbly trust is my sincere desire prayer!

ird Month 27th.—I again take up my pen r feelings of great unworthiness to record lecease of another beloved member of our ehold, our dear Sarah M. Starbuck, who eft behind her a dear husband and three children. She passed away on the six- th, and the funeral was on the nineteenth We humbly trust she was favored with aceful close and has been gathered into old of rest. I have greatly craved to be resigned to this afflicting dispensation. the All-wise Being knows best what is best us; and I have greatly craved that these tions may be turned to our furtherance in way to the kingdom. How uncertain is ime of sojourn here, and how very needful we should be engaged to be found ready eet the Bridegroom when He cometh.

elfth Month 27th.—It has been my lot for r months past to be in very low places, t times the feeling of my mind was such I was ready to exclaim in the language of salmist, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Is his mercy clean gone forever? And will He be favorable no more?" But unworthy as I am of his mercy, He hath again lifted up the light of his countenance upon me and revived my hope in Him. O, may I serve Him more faithfully!

Fourth Month 15th, 1886—This has truly been a memorable day, and I may say a day of deep exercise and trial to me, and it seems the more remarkable as it is my seventy-fifth birthday. On this day I laid before our Monthly Meeting an exercise that had rested on my mind for more than a year past, to visit, in the love of the gospel, most or all the meetings belonging to Kansas Yearly Meeting and some meetings of Friends in different parts of Iowa, and some belonging to Western Yearly Meeting, Indiana, and if way opens for it to appoint a few meetings amongst those who are not members of our Society, I feel it to be indeed a solemn matter, and it rests with much weight on my mind. I have craved that all my own will may be brought into subjection to the Divine will. I feel it to be as an evening sacrifice, and I crave that it may be an acceptable one unto the Lord. O, that I may be enabled to cast all my care upon Him committing the keeping of my soul unto Him in well doing "as unto a faithful Creator!"

Ninth Month 25th, 1886.—Returned through mercy to my family, and found all well as usual, and with a good degree of the reward of peace, yet not without some fears resting on my mind that through yielding improperly to a feeling of discouragement and unfitness, I may have passed by some places, which I had better have visited. O, if so, may the Lord in mercy pass by my omissions and enable me for the future to watch more closely the pointings of his finger.

Third Month 6th, 1887.—Through a feeling of great unworthiness I have passed by recording the very many mercies that have been bestowed upon me, since my last record in this little book, and I thought I might say that on this day in our little meeting, I was favored to feel the precious evidence, as at many other times, that I am still an object of mercy and not forsaken. O, Heavenly Father, be pleased to preserve me through all unto the end! O, may I be faithful, is the desire of my heart!

Eighth Month 17th.—This day attended our little Meeting of Ministers and Elders, consisting of five members, and on hearing the queries and answers read, it was to me a season of close searching of heart, and when the advices to ministers and elders were read, ardent desires were raised in my heart, that I might more and more experience the baptizing power of Truth to prepare to labor availingly in the Church of Christ for the gathering of souls unto Him.

Twelfth Month 2nd.—Although feeling poor in spirit, I am favored still to lay hold of that hope, which is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, which enters into that which is within the vail.

Fourth Month 15th, 1888.—This day I have finished my seventy-seventh year, and now I lay me down to rest and sleep, with desires to commit myself to the care and keeping of Israel's unslumbering Shepherd, and O, if my life should be lengthened out another year, may it be more devoted than the past to the service of my Creator, is my desire!

Not Idle in the Market Places.

In a corner of one of the great markets of Philadelphia a stall was for many years occupied by an old Scotch woman. She sold only heads of lettuce and herbs, but few as crisp and fresh were to be found in the city. Sometimes the other hucksters urged her to "spread out" into the larger vegetables, "Na, na," was her invariable answer. "I ken my salats an' my herbs. I dinna ken the ithers. I sud cheat or be cheated wi' them."

She never wronged any one of a penny. Her sense of justice was so well known that disputes in the market were brought to her to settle. Customers who once stopped to buy the fresh, crisp leaves from the tidy old body always came again, and more than one busy housewife would go out of her way to buy from old Molly.

"It is not only that her herbs are so fresh and delicious," said one, "but it rests me to speak to her. She is only an ignorant woman, but so true and friendly. It is the kindest heart in the world that looks out from her eyes."

Twenty years she occupied her little stall in the market, and every year she became a greater power for good. The rough, burly butcher whose stand was next to hers grew to confide in her, and she it was who coaxed his boy to give up drinking. The women of the market brought their troubles to her, and she helped them to the best of her ability.

When she died there was no notice in any paper to show that a power for good had gone out of the world. But her empty corner was swept and closed that day, and over every stall in the market hung a scrap of black. One man whom she had brought back to decency and happiness preached her funeral sermon in these words:

"A woman may sit as a huckster in this market, and yet be one of the angels of God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A Washington despatch says that the relations between the United States and Turkey are in a critical state, owing to the Sultan's refusal to keep his promises to pay the indemnity claims growing out of the Armenian massacres in 1895.

Surgeon General Wyman has received a cablegram from the surgeon in charge at Yokahama, saying that the plague is now prevalent in Osaka. The quarantine will be reimposed.

A Washington despatch says that the Isthmian Canal Commissioners have concluded that, with all possible expedition, they cannot complete their report upon their examinations of the various isthmian routes for a canal before next Twelfth Month.

Commissioner Thomas Fitchie, of the Bureau of Information at New York, says that during the fiscal year 96,000 Italians have arrived in this country, and that since Fourth Month 1st nearly 20,000 landed. The Bulgaria, which arrived on the 23d instant, carried 1,164 Italians, and the Trojan Prince, which arrived on the 20th had 1,100.

Our exports of 1893 to China were $3,900,457, and in the present fiscal year will be in round numbers $15,000,000. To Hong Kong our exports during the period have doubled being $4,216,602 in 1893, and promises to be over $8,000,000 in the present fiscal year. To Australasia the exports of 1893 were $7,921,228, and promise to be fully $24,000,000 in the present fiscal year. To Asiatic Russia the exports of 1893 were less than a quarter of a million of dollars, but will reach fully $2,000,000 in the fiscal year about to end. Even more remarkable, however, is the growth of our exports to the Hawaiian Islands and Philippine Islands. To the Hawaiian Islands the exports of 1893 were $2,827,563; in 1899, $9,305,470, and in the fiscal year of 1900 promise to be fully $12,000,000; while our exports to the Philippines, which in 1893 were but $154,378, will in the present year exceed $2,000,000. Considering our exports to Asia and Oceanica combined the total for the fiscal year 1893 is $27,421,831; for 1899, $78,235,176, and for the fiscal year about to end will exceed $100,000,000.

The Superintendent of the United States Mint at San Francisco has forwarded to the Director of the Mint at Washington a report showing that the gold and silver product of California for the calendar year 1899 amounted to $15,840,043, of which $15,336,031 was gold and $504,012 silver. The silver is given its commercial value, its coining value being $1,106,573. Compared with 1898, gold decreased $570,447 and silver increased $89,957. Owing to the dry season many mines were shut down. Receipts of Alaskan gold at mints, assay offices, refineries, smelters, etc., for 1899 were $5,602,012 and silver $223,343, a total of $3,199,844 more than in 1898.

Receipts at mints, assay offices, private refineries and smelters in 1899 from the Northwest Territory (the Klondike) were $15,386,627 gold and $267,390 silver, an increase over the previous year of $5,028,198.

It is estimated that there are between 4,000 and 4,500 bales of cotton in Columbus, Ga., warehouses, and of this it is said that not a single bale is for sale at the present market price.

Farmers of North Carolina are making a test of Japanese rice.

Statistics just published show that there were no less than 174,280 summer boarders from outside the State entertained in New Hampshire last season, of whom 58,222 are reported as remaining one week or longer, 95,706 transient guests remaining less than one week and 20,352 guests occupying cottages.

President A. J. Cassatt, of the Pennsylvania Railroad has planned to build a straight line of railway between Gallitzin, the top of the mountain, and Altoona, the base, cutting the distance from twelve miles to seven. These plans do away with the famous Horse Shoe Curve. The opening of the old Portage tunnel was the first step in this direction, and now it is intended to continue the new Portage line down along the steep slope of the mountains south of the present main tracks and finally connect the new line with the old near the local yards. The new line will be one of the most prodigious improvements ever undertaken by any railroad in the world, and will cost millions of dollars. The horse-shoe road will still be used.

Lompoc, in Santa Barbara County, California, grows mustard for the whole nation. In that region 2,000 acres are cultivated to the seed, the industry employing about 200 farmers.

Plans for the reclamation of the meadows near Newark, N. J., are being considered, and thirteen plans were submitted. The plans were sent in by experts and engineers from all parts of the country.

Half a million dollars damage is estimated to have been sustained by fruit raisers in the vicinity of Canon City, Col., from the late heavy storm and frosts.

The floods which commenced the early part of last week have already caused three million dollars loss in central and southern Mississippi, to say nothing of the damage sustained by the railroads.

A despatch from Meridian, Miss., says the extensive rains which have prevailed over Mississippi and parts of Alabama for seven days, making the rivers and smaller streams of those States rise to an unprecedented extent and overflow the lowlands, is causing suffering and a loss of property never known before. Thousands of acres of farming lands have been devastated, and the early crops will prove a total loss. Homes have floated away, and thousands of cattle have been drowned.

There were 739 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 48 more than the previous week and 234 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 362 were males and 377 females; 123 died of pneumonia; 84 of consumption; 56 of heart disease; 34 of convulsions; 31 of influenza; 25 of apoplexy; 24 of measles; 23 of uræmia; 21 of nephritis; 21 of old age; 21 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 19 of bronchitis; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of Bright's disease; 15 of cancer; 14 of typhoid fever; 13 of softening of the brain; 12 of marasmus; 10 of scarlet fever, and 10 of congestion of the lungs.

FOREIGN.—George Douglass Campbell, eighth Duke of Argyle, died on the morning of Fourth Month, 24th. He was distinguished as a statesman, author and public speaker. His eldest son and heir is the Marquis of Lorne, who married, in 1871, Queen Victoria's daughter, the Princess Louise.

Last week has been one of the bloodiest of the Philippine war since the first day's fighting around Manila. Authentic reports, mostly official, show a total of 378 Filipinos killed, 12 officers and 244 men captured and many wounded. The number wounded is hardly guessable. Considering that the Filipinos entirely lack hospital facilities, a great majority of the wounded will die. Probably the week's work finished 1000 insurgents. The Americans, total loss was 9 killed and 16 wounded. Two sergeants and one private were killed in ambushes while escorting provision trains. The insurgents have been aggressive in almost every province of Luzon. General Fio del Pilar's band, numbering 300, which was out of sight for three months, the leader being reported killed, has reappeared in its old field about San Miguel. Pilar is supposed to be again in command. He gave the American garrison at San Miguel, consisting of three companies of the Thirty-fifth Infantry, with a Gatlieg, a three hours' fight during a night attack. The loss of the insurgents in this engagement is not included in the foregoing total, as they removed their dead and wounded, but presumably it was considerable. Colonel Smith's command captured 180 officers and men with Montenegro. The officers were brought to Manila. Montenegro, who was formerly one of the most dapper officers in the Filipino army, looks worn and haggard. He says he led a terrible life for months, and he has offered to return to the North with Colonel Smith to endeavor to persuade his former comrades of the uselessness of opposing the Americans.

The sudden deaths of Filipinos and Chinamen in Quiapo Market, Manila, have led to an investigation, showing that fifteen cases of the plague, fourteen of which were fatal, have occurred within a week. The market is in the centre of the city. In black, rotten wooden buildings, the keepers of the stalls live there, with their families, huddled together in great filth. Some of the victims were stricken and died within an hour. There have been several deaths in other sections of the city recently, which have been traced to infection from the market. After all the market people had been gathered together the health officers threw a guard around the buildings, and will keep the inmates quarantined there for a fortnight. They will then burn the market. The deaths from plague are 119 Chinamen and 66 Filipinos. The plague elsewhere has been suppressed. Not one infected person has been in the Chinese district for ten days past.

It has been officially announced that the Emperor of Austria has consented to the marriage of his nephew and heir, the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, with the Countess Sophie Chotek, who is so much admired and liked in Vienese society. The Archduke Francis was born in 1863. The marriage will take place at Dresden some time this month, and the Emperor has conferred upon the bride-elect the title of Duchess of Koponist, after the name of her future husband's property in Bohemia.

The Vienna correspondent of the Daily Telegraph says: "The mountains which overlook the town of Klappi, where the landslide recently occurred, has undergone a seismic disturbance, which is spreading throughout the entire province of Bohemia, between the rivers Elbe and Eger. The heights of the Bohemian middle range are moving, with the result that houses and churches have collapsed in some thirty villages. Railway embankments have been moved, streams diverted and roads sunk. Thus far there has been no loss of life, but a constant watch is imperative.

A dispatch dated Simla, Fourth Month 20th, says: "The distress among the people is spreading, and 5,500,000 persons are now receiving relief."

The Government monopoly of the liquor business which Russia began to introduce in 1895 now extends to thirty-five districts. The profits last year amounted to 321,000,000 roubles.

South Africa is of volcanic origin, and the land in the vicinity of Kimberley is so sulphurous that even ants cannot exist upon it.

During last week and the early part of this there have been several attacks by the Boers on the British positions in the Free State, resulting in sharp but indecisive fighting. The attacks in several instances were pulsed and the Boers driven from their strongholds kopjes. The siege of Wepener garrison is still kep but reinforcements are near there. The general ad of Lord Roberts's forces has not yet begun.

The price of the Transvaal sixpence in London i 5 shillings. Kruger's pennies, however, are relat more expensive.

New Zealand's frozen meat trade with Great B now equals about 18,000 sheep a day, or some 6,50 carcasses per annum.

A beet sugar factory has been established at San de Chile, being the first concern of the kind ever lished in Chile.

The municipal elections in Cuba have been fixe Sixth Month 16th. The census of the island shows tions, 1,472,990; postal receipts, $13,729; in revenue receipts, $94,330; miscellaneous receipts 619. Last year they amounted to $963,033.

Artificial silks are made of wood fibre, reduced lulose by the action of acids. This is dissolved to like consistency, forced through holes in glass and out into threads, which dry and harden in the air, those of the silkworm or spider do.

The report that the Borchgrevirk South Polar E tion, which returned from New Zealand to Victori on Fourth Month 1st, has located the South Mi Pole, and at the same time has reached the farthes South yet attained by man—78°50′—has arouse interest. The New York Sun says: "Several ye Sir Joseph Hooker said that the key to the future ledge of terrestrial magnetism lies in the determ of the exact position of the South Magnetic Pole; are not within three hundred miles of a guess of its position." The Brooklyn Eagle says: "Borchgrev lieves that weather forecasts will in time be mad the Antarctic Continent for the whole of Australas this will mean the connection of Australia with th bordering the Antarctic Circle—a scheme that no years ago would have been regarded as the wildes if it is not so regarded still. Yet, as crops and herds are more dependent on climatic influences tralia than in the northern continents, this sys weather forecasts is by no means impossible future."

"We are thankful to Divine Providence for the Scriptures, or writing, and the Holy Doctrine and Divine Precepts therein written; for they testify unto Christ our Light, and our Light is the Truth of them."—George Whitehead, 1670.

Sin life has not cleared us of our sins, how can our death do it?

HE who looks to his surroundings for his satisfactions, will always be leading a disappointed life.

THE TRUE "THEREFORE" OF "GO."—The gospel is of late so often called "the gospel of," that attention needs to be called to the true condition, authority and basis of one's going as laid down by Christ:

"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye THEREFORE."

LET NOT MAN PUT ASUNDER.— A baptism of water to go, is the same that unites teaching and baptizing in the one Spirit. "Go and TEACH, BAPTIZING" into the same Divine Name [Christ] was and is the Power. "I am with you always."

Such a baptized going with a baptizing ministry is the one thing needful to make able missionaries of the ecumenical Gospel.

An Incipient Apostasy.

Clearly upon our nation's committing itself to the principle of inhumanity under the name of humanity in entering upon a war with Spain, we remarked the apathy of Christian life which began to be bewailed in the churches generally. A decline in beneficence towards foreign peoples as practically evinced by the contribution-box for missions was soon deplored, and then a marked falling off in attendance at meetings for worship in various churches. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his," is the apostle's true standard of one's title to be a Christian. That secret denial of Christ, which the spirit of war is, must needs have been bearing its legitimate fruit of infidelity to his spirit and gospel. Add to this that those who have been diligently taught to regard the Bible as the foundation of the Christian faith, on seeing it of late honeycombed by the criticism of not a few of the same clergy that upholds war, must easily feel like saying, "If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" So confidence in church or her professed gospel has fallen into indifference, materialism, and a reversion towards the state whereof it is said in Revelation: "These all have one mind, and give their strength and power to the beast. These shall make war with the Lamb."

The "Appeal of the Bishops" of the Methodist Episcopal Church North is fraught with alarm at the present spiritual crisis through which that Church is passing. "With 16,490 ministers, 25,974 churches, and 2,698,610 members, there was in the year 1899 a reported decrease in membership of 21,731." In all denominations the falling off of their gains in last year was about 155,000. "We have one dire disease," say the Bishops—"spiritual famine, lack of witness of the Spirit, lack of personal experience, lack of spiritual power. And the symptoms are many and varied, but the disease is one."

Several causes, such as Friends have long borne testimony against, are enumerated in their list of hindering things, but we believe that it is by the sword that Christ has been most wounded in the house of his professed friends. "Because iniquity shall abound" (and what more than war comprehends the sum of all iniquities?) "the love of many shall wax cold." In confirmation of our view we call to aid the following words of John Brisben Walker, which have lately appeared in the Cosmopolitan:

There is much complaint nowadays of deserted pews in the churches, and from time to time one reads explanations of the why and wherefore of this desertion. Does it never occur to the good men who [may seem to] stand in Christ's [stead] that the real difficulty lies in the reconciliation in the popular minds of Christian teaching and Christian performances? For instance, here are thousands of Christian ministers in England to-day. Each Sunday for the past ten years they have read from the New Testament to their flocks. Nothing in Christ's teaching is more clearly laid down than the impossibility of a Christian war. Everywhere throughout his life, in every line of his Testament, Christ indicates his abhorrence of fratricidal strife. He counsels, He promises, He threatens, He commands, in the beginning, in the middle, in the end, against the practice of war. . . . Thousands of young lives are destroyed. Butchery, bloodshed and brutality are rampant. Now, you say, is the opportunity for Christianity. Earnest minded men who tread in Christ's shoes will rise up with their followers as a mighty host and protest against this violation of God's commandments. Public opinion will be awed by these millions of Christ's followers. The time is ripe for a demonstration. Alas and alack! Unscrupulous politicians who have brought about war for their own personal ends have no stronger backing than these ministers. So far from demonstrating against bloodshed, they lend the whole power of the social structure which the ages have built around their churches to strengthen the enginery of this bloodshed. Not a protest, not a cry, not a whimper, from these successors of Christ! As the sun of a new day rises over the hills, the thinking man, turning to the east, stands with his eyes looking down upon the words of Christ in the open book before him. What does it all mean? Are theory and practice so incompatible? Are these empty, sounding phrases which are repeated from the pulpits? Do these beautiful teachings have no response in the minds of Christian priests? Is it all farce? And on the following Sunday there are more vacant pews, and the Christian minister wonders why this indifference to the teachings of Christ.

When we consider the Eternal Source of all sufficiency we are constrained not to sorrow over signs of a public lapse of faith, as those who have no hope. Often a low season is a precursor of a wave of revival to follow. We are reminded of the apostle's saying, that the day of Christ shall not come "except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped." 2 Thess. ii. 34.

NOTE.—On referring to an extract made from one of our exchanges on page 295, we are not satisfied to let the expressions "humble origin of the life of Christ," and "born of poor and comparatively ignorant parents" go unchallenged. They are unacceptable to us, as on critical reflection they doubtless would be to the author.

"You didn't run fast enough," said a bystander to a belated Irishman, who had been left behind by a railway train, which glided away as he came puffing to the station.

"Yes," said he, "I did run fast enough, but I did not start soon enough."

Gifts for Good Objects.

The subject of the acceptance by religious, philanthropic and educational institutions, of benefactions from "the injurious," has probably claimed more attention the past year than during any similar period of our nation's history. A religious paper, during several weeks, printed brief letters from hundreds of its readers upon the topic, "Whether to Accept Gifts From Liquor Dealers." While numbers of the writers clung to the old plea that, whereas such money, in the past, had been unworthily acquired or used, it might now be better turned into beneficial channels to get all the good possible from it, there prevailed, on the other hand, the sounder sentiment that such acceptances were both morally disastrous to the unrepentant promoter of evil, while they operated to weaken the Church's testimony against mischievous social practices that militated against its usefulness, dimmed its purity and undermined its strength and stability.

A writer in the Boston Transcript, discoursing on the philanthropic bestowments by wealthy men who have acquired large fortunes by immoral means, justly observes:

"Once let the presidents of our colleges and administrators of our missionary societies take the position that they will not permit men judicially proven guilty of arson, murder, theft, usury, bribery and the like, to pay off their society debts, build their dormitories, endow their professorships, and there will be a stiffening up of the moral fibre of the community in those who may now look to educators and clergymen for moral leadership and find them flabby. As it is at present, the blind are led by the blind. It requires discrimination and courage for college presidents and trustees to do this work, that needs to be done. To be sure it does, but so does every other high service to society; and pursuance of the course might, for a time, cripple the work of worthy institutions. But the moral gain to the institution and to society would greatly outweigh the fiscal loss, and the financial income in the end might be quite as large, owing to the renewed confidence and gifts of the many who are now alienated."

The pleasing information came from Chicago last week that the Jews of that city, who require about $150,000 for the annual support of their charitable organizations, have decided that, instead of raising funds through the means of a charity ball and numerous other entertainments every year, they will henceforth rely upon direct contributions. Already two-thirds of the amount just stated has been subscribed for the present year. Herein the Jew gives a valuable lesson to the Christian concerning the safe way. J. W. L.

My motto for life, my whole heart's expression is "None but Christ . . . the mind of Christ, to feel as He felt, to judge the world and to estimate its maxims, as He judged and estimated." That is the one thing worth living for. But then, in proportion as a man does that, he is stripping himself of garment after garment, till his soul becomes naked of that which once seemed part of himself. He is not only giving up prejudice after prejudice but also renouncing sympathy after sympathy with friends whose smile and approbation was once his life, till he begins to suspect that he will be very soon alone with Christ. To believe that and still press on, is what I mean by the expression, "None but Christ."—Roberts.

A Little Sexton.

With the coming of spring, the young people have an opportunity of finding out many things about the birds, flowers and insects, that are both interesting and curious. The "Sabbath-school Visitor" tells us of one of the latter, which, strange to say, is a gravedigger, even though he is only a beetle. He is about an inch long, and is very black, with the exception of two broad bands of bright orange across his back. He buries the dead bodies of birds, mice and other small animals.

This beetle of which I am going to tell you, set out to find a good meal. He has a very good nose for smelling out a supper, and can scent one at quite a distance. He had not flown far before he found a little dead bird, which he and his wife ate greedily.

When their hunger was satisfied, they proceeded to arrange for the burial of the bird. They first had to find a soft place in which to dig the grave. As there were many sticks and stones about, the bird had to be dragged to another spot. Beetle is quite a gentleman. He allowed his mate to sit calmly upon the bird while he worked. After awhile she ate her way into its body, and there she stayed and was buried with the bird.

Beetle began by digging a furrow about half an inch from the little corpse and extending all around it. He threw the dirt on the outside of the trench, using his head for a spade. I think he cannot mind getting dirt in his eyes as much as you and I do.

After the first furrow was made, he dug another, a little nearer the bird, and after that a furrow was made under it. The little sexton was now out of sight, and you could only tell how fast he was digging by the growth of the pile of dirt.

After three hours' steady work, Beetle came out for a rest. He crawled up on the bird and looked at his work. When he had rested for an hour, he again descended and resumed his labor, pulling the bird down by its feathers. When two or three hours had passed, he again came up and took another rest.

Now came the task of filling in the grave. The sexton went behind the pile of earth and threw it into the hole by bending his head down against the soil, and then raising his nose with a sudden jerk.

After he had covered the grave and trodden down the earth, Beetle burrowed down into it and buried himself. No doubt a human sexton might object to this part of the programme, but our friend enjoyed it. His mate was already buried in the bird, and there she remained until she had laid a nice, large nestful of eggs, when she crawled out. Beetle, having had another good meal, also crawled out, and away they both flew to look for more dead folks to bury.

But the eggs that were left in the dead bird's body hatched out after awhile into little grubs, and they lived and ate in their queer nursery until they were old enough to take care of themselves.

MAKE good use of your time.

Baptism.

BAPTISMAL GRACE.

Some maintain that water baptism is a me of grace; others define it as an outward visible sign of inward and spiritual grace. have no record that our Saviour ever tau such doctrine. Grace is mentioned in the N Testament more than one hundred times, water baptism is never once referred to in nection with grace in any way, manner or fo Neither as a means, help, sign or shadow, vis or invisible. We cannot believe that our iour ever ordained water baptism either means or a sign of grace to his children ever when He never mentioned it; never one word about it, neither He nor his apos so far as Scripture informs in all of those hundred texts wherein grace is so vario and impressively commended to us. We forced to believe that this whole theory baptismal grace was conceived by man, modified by the reformation and now migh entirely abandoned as adverse to the teach of Christ and repugnant to sound reason.

WATER BAPTISM AND CIRCUMCISION.

Some assume that Christ by his apostle stituted water baptism as the Christian cessor of Jewish circumcision. "The Act id taught Jews of the dispersion that they ould not circumcise their children nor walk ter the customs of Moses. Paul was induced to recant from his indifference to circumcision, but not from his proounced indifference to water baptism.

Thus closes our last recorded meeting of lders and apostles with no apparent abateent of zeal for circumcision. To the last ey evince much more zeal for circumcision, an they had ever shown for water baptism.
ainly it was not by the apostles, but after the ostles' time that circumcision was suppressed
d water baptism exalted.

Although Paul ostensibly yielded to the elders and apostles at Jerusalem, yet his subsequent epistles indicate that he remained firmly indifferent or opposed to circumcision, ter baptism and other ordinances, all of hich he called carnal when applied to Gen-es. He said he was made all things to all n that he might win some. To the Jews he came a Jew, to the Gentiles a Gentile.

ATER BAPTISM AFTER CHRIST IN APOSTOLIC TIMES.

It appears that our Saviour never baptized th water nor had it done, and that no apos-s were so baptized in his time.

After Christ, Ananias directed Paul to be ptized. We read that Ananias was devout according to the law of Moses, as were also many of the apostles. They looked for Christ to store again the kingdom of Israel. With ch hopeful prospects for Judaism we cannot nder that Ananias and many apostles de-utly believed it to be in order and necessary at water baptism, circumcision, etc., be con-ued, and that Paul and other converts be so ptized.

That they should so believe is no more re-markable than that upon two occasions eight years apart, they uld pronounce it necessary that Gentile be-vers should abstain from meat offered to ols and from things strangled and from blood. Paul was sent a special apostle to the Gentiles, Peter and others more to the Jews: to Paul therefore we turn for light upon the duty of Gentiles. ul taught Gentile believers, "Unless ye be d that meat is offered to idols, eat whatever set before you or is sold on the shambles, king no questions for conscience' sake. Let no man judge you in meat or in drink or in respect of an holy day the new moon or the Sabbath-day which are adows of things to come. Without claim-g perfection for Paul, should we not all as lieving gentiles accept his teaching about at-eating, water baptism, etc. That Christ did not send his apostles to baptize with water but to preach the gospel, and that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to all who believe.

At Pentecost believers baptized presumably with water. They sold ir possessions and gave to apostles and had all things in common and broke bread daily from house to house. Ananias and Saphira were stricken dead for duplicity about land. In view of this awful judgment upon Ananias and his wife to confirm the authority of the apostles at this time, shall we sell our lands, live in common and break bread from house to house? We see as much authority for doing so as for baptizing with water. If the examples of apostles and believers is Scripture authority for water baptism, it is also Scripture authority to sell our lands, etc.

We cannot believe that we are required by Scripture or otherwise to do all things which the apostles and believers did, however good and proper they may have been for them at that time; and much less should we gratify our own predilections by electing to follow their example in water baptism and to discard it in other particulars.

By Peter's preaching the household of Cornelius were baptized with Holy Spirit. Peter then asked his Jewish brethren if any could forbid water that these Gentiles should not be baptized as well as we Jews. Peter hesitated about baptizing Gentiles as Jews baptized, yet he commanded it to be done. Peter claimed authority from Christ for the first baptism, but no authority for the water baptism, only the silence of his six Jewish brethren from Jerusalem.

Upon another occasion, Peter with others pronounced it necessary that Gentile believers abstain from certain meats as Jews did. We recognize no distinction in Peter's authority, whether he restrained Gentiles from the use of certain meats, or had them baptized with water. Peter's Jewish education was his authority, not Christ. As the eunuch rode in his chariot he read from Esaias the prophet. Philip went up into the chariot and preached unto him Jesus. The eunuch believed and was baptized by the wayside.

The spirit of the Lord caught away Philip.

The eunuch went on his way rejoicing.

This appears to have been John's decreasing water baptism without formula, but nevertheless to have been blessed to the eunuch's dawning condition of belief. It was a public confession that he believed Jesus Christ to be the Son of God.

Had the eunuch been reading Christ's Sermon on the Mount with the veil which was rent on calvary clear lifted from his eyes, he might not have stopped that chariot to baptize with water. But he did not so read. The New Testament was not written at that time. He read from the Old Testament from Esaias the prophet. Many years after Paul said until that day the veil remained upon the hearts of some when the Old Testament was read.

(To be continued.)

When the children of the Lord know Him, their Redeemer to live by his heavenly power in them, they know also that thereby they live and feelingly know his Truth and the precious testimony; and by this knowledge are influenced with a holy, humble zeal, in love and meekness to work in his vineyard, the church, to the honor of God, and the edification and restoration one of another.—John Churchman.

A Plea for the Birds.

One of the most remarkable documents (says the Young People's Paper) on file at the State House is the petition, drawn up by United States Senator George F. Hoar and presented in connection with the original bill regarding the use of birds and feathers on hats. It purports to be signed by about thirty-five undomesticated song birds, and is light and graceful, and totally different from Senator Hoar's usual style. Here it is in full:

"To the Great and General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts:

"We, the song birds of Massachusetts and their playfellows, make this our humble petition. We know more about you than you think we do. We know how good you are. We have hopped about the roofs and looked in at your windows of the houses you have built for poor and sick and hungry people, and little lame and deaf and blind children. We have built our nests in the trees and sung many a song as we flew about the gardens and parks you have made so beautiful for your children, especially your poor children, to play in. Every year we fly a great way over the country, keeping all the time where the sun is bright and warm. And we know that whenever you do anything the people all over this great land between the seas and the great lakes find it out, and pretty soon will try to do the same. We know. We know.

"We are Americans just the same as you are. Some of us, like some of you, came across the great sea. But most of the birds like us have lived here a long while, and the birds like us welcomed your fathers when they came here many, many years ago. Our fathers and mothers have always done their best to please your fathers and mothers.

"Now, we have a sad story to tell you. Thoughtless or bad people are trying to destroy. They kill us because our feathers are beautiful, Even pretty and sweet girls, who, we should think, would be our best friends, kill our brothers and children so that they may wear our plumage on their hats. Sometimes people kill us for mere wantonness. Cruel boys destroy our nests and steal our eggs and our young ones. People with guns and snares lie in wait to kill us; as if the place for a bird were not in the sky, alive, but in the shop window, or in a glass case. If this goes on much longer all our song birds will be gone. Already we are told in some other countries that used to be full of birds they are now almost gone. Even the nightingales are being killed in Italy.

"Now we humbly pray that you will stop all this and will save us from this sad fate. You have always made a law that no one shall kill a harmless song bird or destroy our nests or our eggs. Will you please make another one that no one shall wear our feathers, so that no one will kill us to get them? We want them ourselves. Your pretty girls are pretty enough without them. We are told that it is as easy for you to do it as for a blackbird to whistle.

"If you will, we know how to pay you a hundred times over. We will teach your children to keep themselves clean and neat. We will show them how to live together in peace and love, and to agree as we do in our nests. We will build pretty houses which you will like to see. We will play about your garden and flower beds—ourselves like flowers on wings—without any cost to you. We will destroy the wicked insects and worms that spoil your cherries and currants and plums and apples and roses. We will give you our best songs, and make the spring more beautiful and the summer sweeter to you. Every June morning when you go out into the field, oriole and bluebird and blackbird and bobolink will fly after you and make the day more delightful to you. And when you go home tired after sundown vesper sparrows will tell you how grateful we are. When you sit down on your porch after dark, fifebird and hermit, thrush and wood-thrush will sing to you, and even whippoorwill will cheer you up a little. We know where we are safe. In a little while all the birds will come to live in Massachusetts again, and everybody who loves music will like a summer home with you."

The signers are :

Brown thrasher, Robert o' Lincoln, hermit thrush, vesper sparrow, robin redbreast, song sparrow, scarlet tanager, summer redbird, blue heron, hummingbird, yellowbird, whip-poor-will, water wagtail, woodpecker, pigeon woodpecker, indigo bird, yellow throat, Wilson's thrush, chickadee, kingbird, swallow, cedarbird, cowbird, martin, veery, vireo, oriole, blackbird, fifebird, wren, linnet, peewee, phœbe, lark, sandpiper, chewink.

Definite "Testimony."

[The following editorial in the Intelligencer we append to the above, as related to the same subject.]

How do we differ from the older, earlier Friends ? Have we really fallen off ? Are we really less faithful to the Truth ?

These questions are often asked. Usually, no doubt, we give ourselves a comfortable answer. The prophesying of smooth things easily finds its counterpart in the furnishing of consolatory explanations.

In one particular, no doubt, the changes of time have not been to our advantage. This is the definiteness, the distinctness, with which we "bear testimony" against things which our faith and its logical conclusions require us to disapprove. The older Friends, when they testified against wrong or abuses or evils, did it with such plainness and positiveness that no one could be in doubt where they stood. In our time the unwillingness to be "peculiar," the dislike of seeming "odd," the desire to be "like other people," all tend to diminish the squareness of the issue and the distinctness of the protest.

Let us take an instance of this. Here is the slaughter of the sea-birds—and other birds—in order to obtain decorations for the hats and bonnets of girls and women. When this destruction of these beautiful and useful birds is considered for a moment in connection with the base and unworthy cause of it, we can all see how much of wrong, of absolute immorality, is involved, and a spasmodic effort will be made, of course, to check the iniquitous work.

But there is a want of force in the protest which Friends would make against it, because they are themselves more or less enmeshed and entangled in the great system of which this slaughter of the birds is merely one feature—we mean the system of Fashion. These birds, and their feathers, and their wings, are, for the time, "fashionable"—later, when the pretty species of birds are annihilated, they will be "unfashionable." And, in the arbitrary and almost wholly immoral operations, such as this, of the fashion of our time, Friends, we say, are to some degree involved. In the pursuit of the æsthetic, in the escape from the peculiar, they have fled into the hands of an oppressor worse even than oddity or peculiarity, and by many degrees more exacting and harsh than simplicity.

The decrees of fashion, when we examine them with a candid mind, appear hardly suitable for rational beings, they are so changeable, so unreasonable, so wasteful, at all times, and often so defiant of health, of modesty, of common sense—and, as in this bird case, of humanity and economic considerations.

Against mere fashion the older Friends set their faces resolutely. Nobody doubted where they stood. Their "dress and address," their "behavior and apparel," spoke for them with an emphasis which hardly called for words. They had no complicity with those dictators in Vienna, Berlin and Paris, who change the appearance of the dress of women every year, or oftener, and who stop not on any consideration of ethics.

If the world were wise and sensible, such slaughter as this of the birds would be impossible, it would not even be conceived as a possibility. But the degradation of the world by fashion weakens the moral fibre of men and women, and leads them to do things in its service which they otherwise would not think of. They see the subject with distorted vision, as we are led to look at "fashionable" dress, in its modifications and changes year after year, until we fail to detect its absurdities. Against such things, no doubt, the plainness of our ancestors testified more distinctly than our words of protest now, however earnestly we utter them.

For "The Friend."

As (in infinite wisdom no doubt) our minds are at times drawn into solitude so as to resemble the pelican in the wilderness, having no access to the habitable parts of the earth, nor subject to human observation, so it appears consistent with godly jealousy that human consolation should be forbidden, and that having our dependence only on a gracious and merciful Father, who deals with us as children who require his chastising hand, his rod and his staff, we may be built on a safe foundation, with a quiet habitation thereon out of the reach of human interruptions. Surely there are none so tried as the poor weak instruments that are used for the Divine will to be communicated through. These require not only the forming of the potter's hand, but higher degrees of drying, and greater heat in the furnace to prepare them, than almost any other vessel; nay, if I may be allowed the comparison, they are like dishes that have to pass through the oven for every service, and which, after they are emptied, and the company has enjoyed them, need more washing and care than any other utensil at the table, and great danger there is that, by indiscretion of some sort or other, they will get cracked or broken. I look with dread, I am bowed down and dismayed, at the sight of the precarious standing of such, but especially my own: the consideration of human weakness, and "how frail I am" is almost my meat and drink.

How excellent is the privilege of having monitor at home, an impartial friend in bosom, who, if we enough attend to Him able to make us as wise even as our teache the reproofs and wounds of this friend better than the kisses of an enemy.—Fr the Life of Sarah Grub.

The Unchangeable and Covenant-Keeping G

The Lord our God is unchanged and changeable. His very name is Love, and all his acts towards man, since his creation this day, God has ever dealt in love towa man. As He was in the beginning so is He n Creating man in his own image, endowing with faculties far superior to any other cr ture, and imparting to him a portion of own immortal Spirit, the Lord held sweet verse and communion with man, and "delights were with the children of men." gave to man wisdom, understanding and kno edge, and God himself taught and instruc man, in order that man might know the Div will and obey it. And in obedience to the v of the Lord, man found life. Disobedience that Word was sin, for God's Word was law man, and sin brought death, death to that vine life in which man heretofore had li But God in his love to man changed not. man should thus live estranged from God ever, God, in mercy, expelled him from E and put it out of man's own power to part of the tree of life. But the tree of life ne dies. Its leaves are for medicine and its f for food, and man lives not by bread al but by every word that proceedeth out of mouth of God.

The Lord has indeed gradually unfolded man his Divine will and purpose, and the n ing known of this will to man is revelat God, by his living presence, made this known to Adam, both before and after his so did He to Eve, the first woman, nor did withhold from Cain, though so very wic the expression of his will, and so does He make known his will to those who turn a tening ear. No man can close the kingdom of God to his fellow-man, no man can open the door for another into that kingdom. He alone who stands at the door of every heart, seeking to enter there, reserves this power to Himself. "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." True religion is the result of man's yielding a willing obedience to the work of Divine grace on his heart, and nothing earthly nor any evil spirit has power to preclude an entry to the willing one. Between man the offender, and God the offended, none can come as a reconciler, but Jesus Christ, the one Anointed Saviour, the one Mediator between God and man. "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they who put their trust in Him."

For "The Friend."

The following testimony to the efficacy of the Holy Spirit, and also to the value of "Barclay's Apology," is extracted from a letter dated Twelfth Month, 24th, 1834, from Deborah Cope, then travelling with Dugan and Asenath Clark, in New York and New England meetings, and addressed to Sarah Emlen :

We paid Moses Brown a visit, who inquired affectionately for thee, and desired his love ; says thou mayest come back to New England, and he for one will be glad to see thee. It was really a feast to be in his company ; he still seems green in his ninety-seventh year. He had just received a letter from a young man, with whom we afterwards were in company, one in and for whom we feel a deep and sincere interest. He belonged to the Baptists, and had spent three years at college preparing to be a missionary ; got through his studies with good reputation, and was considered of much more than ordinary capacity by the professors of the Institution ; is said to be master of eleven languages. He returned home to his father, but, no call offering which they considered equal to his talents, his father prevailed on him to return to the college for six months more, which he did ; and while ransacking the library one day in quest of something to amuse, he lighted on "Barclay's Apology," an old, dusty volume, in French. He bore it off to his study and read it attentively, and was met in a narrow place. He became very thoughtful, and asked one of the professors one day if there were any people now living holding the faith of Robert Barclay, and was answered "No ; that was only an old controversial book, which they kept to show the reasoning and arguments which could be advanced by those who once professed such principles." "Well," said G., "it is such reasoning and arguments as I never met with before ; I must set out and see if I can find any such people ; and if not I must sit down alone." Accordingly he went to S—— and made inquiry, and was directed to H. C., a very suitable Friend. He knocked at the door and H. opened it ; when G. inquired if there were any now living professing the faith of Robert Barclay, H. smiled and said he hoped so, and invited him in. They had much conversation, and G. repeated his visits. His father was now displeased, and his friends disappointed, and they reported that he was deranged ; but G. persevered until he became a member ; attended last Yearly Meeting, and promises to be a consistent one.

The following is an extract from his letter to Moses Brown, and will speak his own language : "At last my mind became so exercised that I was constrained to leave the Institution in quest of a people who believed in 'Barclay's Apology,' and if I could not find such a people I determined to worship the Lord alone ; but, blessed be God, the Lord has still a remnant who are conformed to the vain and wicked fashions of this world. To this people I desire to join myself, though I feel most unworthy to come among them. Yes, I can say with the pious Barclay, that having for a long time been seeking after human learning, I have found that heavenly learning which gives content to the soul ; after this learning may I seek forever. I now believe that though a person may read the Bible ever so carefully and critically in the original languages, yet the most unlettered person under the teachings of the Spirit of God is more able to have a true understanding of it than the learned man with all his critical and careful study ; and though I myself have read the whole Bible in Hebrew (except the book of Daniel) ; although I have read the New Testament critically in Greek and Syriac, and have studied the Bible in several other languages, yet the most ignorant man who is really taught of the Spirit can understand the Bible better than I can, unless taught of the same Spirit. And oh ! that all who may read this letter might feel the necessity of being taught of God, of sitting as little children at the Saviour's feet, and learning of Him who was meek and low of heart. Farewell, God's Light.—A beautiful story is told in the "Lutheran World" of a little girl, whose faith in God may teach us all a lesson.

The lamp had just been put out, and the little girl was rather afraid of the dark. But presently she saw the bright moon out of her window, and she asked her mother, "Is the moon God's light?"

"Yes, Ethel," the mother replied ; "the moon and stars are all God's lights."

"Will God blow out his light and go to sleep, too?" she asked again.

"No, my child," replied the mother; "God's lights are always burning."

"Well, mamma," said Ethel, "while God's awake I'm not afraid."

The cost of the gipsey moth to the State of Massachusetts is incalculable. One of the professors of the Agassiz Museum says that extermination is impossible. Yet this pest was introduced by a scientific man, who brought the moths from Europe to this country for the purpose of study. A scientific man who wants to study pests or disease germs should go where they are.

For "The Friend."

A Protest from Friends in 1777.

Amongst some interesting papers belonging to the late William Kite, and presented by his daughter to Friends' Library, is an address of the Yearly Meeting of 1777 printed in German. It proves to be a protest against the unwarranted action of the government in exiling some 16 (32) Friends to Virginia. It is interesting in view of the discussion in our late Yearly Meeting as showing how positive it is possible to be for right principles without being personal or political. The use of the German was probably intended to reach the large German element in the population of Pennsylvania.

A somewhat free translation of the protest is as follows :

A public testimony issued of our Yearly Meeting, which convened at Philadelphia for Pennsylvania and New Jersey, held by appointment from the twenty-ninth day of Ninth Month to fourth day of Tenth Month, inclusive, 1777.

Because a number of our Friends, unheard, have been imprisoned and exiled from their families on account of a charge and accusation that they by their entire conduct and conversation have manifested a hostile attitude toward the American cause, and because articles given in print have charged "That there is good ground to fear that these persons held correspondence which may be in the highest degree detrimental to the common safety," and as this may produce the impression that we have departed in our conduct from the peaceful principles that we profess, and since we fear that the minds of some may thus be led astray, we consider it necessary, that the truth may be known, publicly to declare that the principles of mercy and truth turn our minds from all war and strife and do not permit us as private members of any Association or in any of our gatherings to hold correspondence with one of the two armies ; but we endeavor to uphold the testimony of truth and the peaceable teachings of Christ to seek the highest good of the whole—to keep our consciences unspotted toward God and man and to spread the kingdom of Messiah which we pray may come, and that his power may be manifested in individuals, in kingdoms and in nations, so that they may make their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks, that nation shall not raise up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. And we deny emphatically all accusations that are opposed to this confession (declaration).

As concerns the paper dated at Spanktown by the Yearly Meeting, and without names, which appeared in print some time ago and which has been found in the baggage of Staaten Eyland, any to whom our method of writing is known, will be convinced that it certainly has not been written in any of our gatherings or by any of our Friends. Moreover, there is not in our Society a meeting of that name, neither has such a letter or one like it been written in one of our assemblies since we were a people. We deny, therefore, the aforementioned letter and its author, and we desire that those who dared to forge the name beneath it, either to injure us or thereby to place themselves in safety may find it necessary to declare the truth so that we may be exonerated from this charge.

And since we are convinced through the acquaintance which we have with our exiled Friends and through most reliable reports that we have received, that they have done nothing whereby they forfeited their inherent right to freedom, we therefore most earnestly request that all those who have helped to bring about their banishment may seriously reflect and consider the purpose of their behavior and how contrary it is to the teaching and example of our Lord and Lawgiver Jesus Christ and that they do them the justice which their cause demands, so that they may be allowed to return to their afflicted families and friends. And we are sure that this will contribute more to their own peace than if they leave these in banishment. We give the exhortation in the fear of God, not alone with the object of freeing our Friends, but also for the true welfare of those who have helped to banish them.

Since it has been permitted to us to come together to transact the business of this Society, which concerns the extension of the cause of truth and righteousness, we have above all felt a renewed desire for the welfare and happiness of the human family, and have in the love of the Gospel given this public testimony in order to justify ourselves and our Friends and to warn those who by ungrounded surmises and misconceptions of us, have sought to injure us, to the wounding of their own souls and to the hurt of the general welfare.

EPISTLE FROM LONDON IN OUR REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

On the same day on which the above protest was handed to us, we received from another and distant quarter an old sheet containing the London Epistle of the year 1776. We quote the principal portion of it, beginning with its reference to our country :—

"By epistles received from several of the provinces in America, we have affecting information of the state of Friends in those parts ; and deeply sympathize with the faithful, wheresoever they are situated, under their afflictions, and fervently desire that this season of outward probation may be sanctified to all. We are sensible it must try the foundations of many, and, we trust, it may bring again to the fold some, who, during a long enjoyment of ease and tranquillity, in those once happy and flourishing countries, have incautiously wandered till they have almost forgotten the true Shepherd of the flock, Christ Jesus.

"It is worthy of the serious consideration of all, whether the calamities now deeply affecting this great empire, may not have been permitted by Divine Providence in displeasure, on account of the accummulated transgressions of the people. Let all, therefore, honestly and strictly enquire, how far they have individually contributed thereto.

"And, dear friends, we earnestly recommend it to all, humbly to bow themselves before the Lord of the universe, craving his Divine assistance, and the preservation of the faithful of every denomination ; fervently desiring that He may grant repentance and forgiveness to those who have long lived in forgetfulness of the God who formed them for a purpose of his glory, and of Christ their holy Redeemer.

"Let us humbly retire to that blessed principle of strength and wisdom, the gra God, manifested in our hearts ; that, th a strict adherence thereunto, we may voured to experience it to be as a munit rocks, and a sure hiding place, to whic righteous fly and are safe in every ti trial ; that, in like manner with the evan prophet, we may be enabled truly to s will trust, and not be afraid ; for the Lo hovah is my strength, and my song, He become my salvation"—(Isa. xii.: 2.)

"Finally, brethren, keep in singlene heart, and resignation of soul to the Alm that He may bless and replenish you wit perfect love which casteth out all fear. shall ye be at peace in yourselves, and on another, and 'the peace of God, which p all understanding, shall keep your heart minds, through Jesus Christ'—(Phil. iv.:

Justification.

tification must be acknowledged to be an tant subject for reflection, and a desira- bject for aspiration, whether we incline ine it with the many who regard it as the deliverance from the penalty of sin and relude to the grace of sanctification; or er with the comparatively few outside of ociety of Friends we insist on its being a rance from the guilt of sin, and so a mere nt and measure of the sanctification. And uch as all truth and all error are each of a piece, it evidently becomes a question damental interest which of these diverse ions, as viewed in the light of sound ex- ce and of inspired tradition, shall be wholly free from giving that "uncertain " to the gospel trumpet which would be- the Christian from the spiritual warfare, nculcate the heresy of "continuing in at grace may abound."

mutually illustrative texts of holy writ o the present writer here relevant; one he vision of the evangelical prophet, and her from the teaching of the great mis- y apostle. "By his knowledge shall my ous servant justify many, for He shall their iniquities," are the anticipatory of Isaiah; and the confirmatory ones of "He was delivered for our offences, and again for our justification." The knowl- which the prophet thus urges as that on our justification is to depend, must not ean some traditional and intellectual ap- nsion in our part of that living Word who the form of a servant and became obe- even unto the death of the cross," but it ntails the inference that that knowledge e a thorough-going one, reaching, as the e also here implies in accordance with ore extended teaching elsewhere, from ystical birth of Christ in the individual through the discipline of sacrifice and rucifixion, even to the resurrection into rue life in which "all things are become nd all things of God," and wherein the er realizes the crowning grace of com- justification.

s we may profitably conceive the teach- the Saviour, "he that endureth to the hall be saved," while consummatory to f Paul, "God is the Saviour of all men, lly of them that believe," as being more cal in scope with that of Peter, "elect, gh sanctification of the spirit unto obe- e and the sprinkling of the blood of Christ." For there seems often to lie a subtle snare of the tempter in the premature suggestion to the neophyte believer that the work of the cross is a finished work, and that it is not primarily for us, as Penington wrote, "an inward and spiritual thing;" but that, to us, "the bitterness of death is past," so that we may vain-gloriously boast ourselves in the putting on of harness for our fancied service, "as he that putteth it off." Surely the legitimate successors of Fox, Barclay and Penn and their worthy associates, cannot so disparage the doctrine of "Christ within the hope of glory," nor so subvert the relation of cause and effect in the spiritual life. May none who lay claim to such succession allow the superficial interpretation of disjointed texts to disqualify them from "bearing witness" so the living Word, as having been substantially with Him "from the beginning!"

Items Concerning the Society.

There are prospects of establishing a Friends' School in Atlantic City.

Friends' Educational Association will hold a conference at 140 North Sixteenth Street this Seventh-day afternoon and evening.

The Meeting for Sufferings having revised the "Plea for Peace" read in our last Yearly Meeting, will soon issue it to the public.

Friends' Library is to have an important addition of seventeenth century tracts from a large sale in England. It includes some tracts by George Fox not embraced in his works.

The series of Quarterly Meetings now recurring will begin with that of Philadelphia, to be held at Fourth and Arch Streets, next Second-day, the 7th inst. Abington Quarterly Meeting is to be held at Germantown on Fifth-day of next week.

The trustees of the Forrest estate have made a report to the Monthly Meetings during the week of their labors the past ten years. The gross proceeds of the estate for educational purposes during the time have been about $145,000.

Notes from Others.

A remarkable revival is reported as now taking place among the Indians of Alaska, especially those in the southeastern portion. As far as can be gathered, the work started at no one town in particular, but sprang up at several places almost simultaneously.

Statistical evangelism has forced many of our pastors to give way before the advances of Methodist forms of worship and Methodist methods of conducting revival services. We respect the Methodist church. But we see no need of another Methodist church. Those who, because of temperament or training, incline to Methodist methods have a church ready to their hand into which they can enter and find a church home.—Southern Presbyterian.

It sometimes seems as if some professing Christians are imitating the child who tries to catch birds by putting salt on their tails, with this difference, that the birds the church tries to capture seem, to a certain extent, to enjoy the salt and allow it to be put on, but they are not caught. The church approaches the unconverted with its worldly allurements, by which it hopes to draw some to itself. The world looks on, applauds, sometimes enjoys, but goes on its way, while the church feels encouraged and tries again. No real good is done. The church forgets that in proportion as it teaches that there is no difference between it and the world, it takes away the reason why people in the world should join it.—The Interchange.

They forget, or will not remember, that human sacrifice and the power of an idolatrous priesthood; a system of profligacy unparalleled in any other part of the world; infanticide, a consequence of that system; bloody wars, where the conquerors spared neither women nor children—that all these things have been abolished, and that dishonesty, intemperance and licentiousness have been greatly reduced by the introduction of Christianity. In a voyager to forget these things is a base ingratitude; for should he chance to be at the point of shipwreck on some unknown coast he will most devoutly pray that the lesson of the missionary may have extended thus far.—Dr. Darwin.

In an article on the "Administration of the Holy Spirit in the Church" by Robert L. Dunston in the Record of Christian Work, he writes under the following heads to show that "in the Apostolic Church the office and work of the Holy Spirit was prominently before the people, and his administration in the affairs of the Church properly recognized: (1) That in the administration of the Church men endued with the Holy Spirit were used in the ministry. (2) That in addition to such ministry, such officers were sought as were marked by the same Divine gift. (3) That "the Holy Spirit was recognized in the Discipline of the Church." (4) "The Holy Spirit administered in the work of separating men to their distinctive work in the Church." On this the writer remarks: "As the church in Antioch ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, 'Separate unto me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them;' and after fasting, and prayer, and laying on of hands, they sent them away.' 'So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed.' Notice, the Holy Ghost said, commanded, called, sent. And in cooperation with Him the church ministered, fasted, prayed, laid hands and sent them forth. There is no confusion, no conflicting of duties among the members, but all move smoothly and successfully, as the Holy Spirit administers in the affairs of the church, and assigning to each their work the individual and church work in harmony with the divine dictation. The writer pleads that we may 'recognize the church's rightful administrator' of preachers, officers, discipline and appointments in the work of the Lord."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Senate in executive session last week ratified the treaty with Spain extending for six months the time in which Spanish residents of the Philippines may decide whether they will remain subjects of Spain or become citizens of the Philippines.

On Fourth Month 17th, Senator Hoar delivered an impressive speech in the Senate on the Philippine question. Senator Hoar said: "I do not expect to accomplish anything for liberty in the Philippine Islands but through the Republican party. Upon it the fate of these islands for years to come is to depend. I cannot look with any favor upon Mr. Bryan as an alternative. . . . I believe not only that perseverance in the present policy will be the abandonment of the principles upon which our Government is founded; that it will change our republic into an empire; that our methods of legislation, of diplomacy, of administration must hereafter be those which belong to empires and not those which belong to republics; but I believe persistence in this attempt will result in the defeat and overthrow of the Republican party." As to what he would do with the Philippines, Senator Hoar said: "I would declare now that we will not take these islands to govern them against their will. I would reject a cession of sovereignty which implies that sovereignty may be bought and sold and delivered without the consent of the people. I would require all foreign Governments to keep out of these islands. I would offer to the people of the Philippines our help in maintaining order until they have a reasonable opportunity to establish a government of their own. I would aid them by advice, if they desire it, to set up a free and independent government. I would invite all the great Powers of Europe to unite in an agreement that that independence shall not be interfered with. I would declare that the United States will enforce the same doctrine as applicable to the Philippines that we declared as to Mexico and Hayti and the South American Republics. I would then, in a not distant future, leave them to work out their own salvation, as every nation on earth, from the beginning of time, has wrought out its own salvation." The Senator spoke for three hours and ten minutes. Much of his speech, which was 50,000 words in length, was not delivered, the Senator's physical condition not being such as to enable him to endure the strain.

The Chicago Times Herald says: "That railway managers are convinced that the prosperity of the country is permanent and that industrial activity will increase rather than diminish is evidenced by their decision to invest $50,000,000 in new trackage and equipment to handle the increased business of the future, instead of paying it out in dividends. This decision is reached in spite of the greatly increased cost of materials entering into railway construction. The disbursement of this $50,000,000 means employment to a vast army of laborers and increased activity in many branches of productive industry all over the Union."

Twenty new steamships are now under construction for the trans-Atlantic service and four for the trans-Pacific.

The price of steel plates having gone down from $2.20 to $1.85 several large contracts have been made at Cleveland, some of them for as much as 20,000 tons, within the past few days.

Last year 7,000 tons of steel rails were delivered in Calcutta from the United States, and a large number of American engines have been contracted for by various roads.

The railroad time between New York and Boston has been reduced to four hours and twenty-three minutes.

There will be more hemp raised in Kentucky this year than has been raised in a great many years. There was a time when hemp was the main product of Kentucky, but in late years it has become such an expensive article to raise that the farmers gave it up. Now the price of hemp is high, and the farmers are taking advantage of it.

In a short time the Japanese population of San Francisco will reach 20,000.

Among the 153,000 inhabitants which the last census gave to New Mexico, there were 20,000 Indians and 50,000 Mexicans.

According to a despatch dated Dubois, Fourth Month 27th, forest fires in that vicinity are raging with increased fury. Driven by a high wind, the flames have covered an immense area, and for miles around the country is a smoking waste of half burned logs and stumps. Advices from points in Jefferson, Elk and Clearfield counties tell the same tale of devastation. The entire country is threatened and the losses to lumbermen will be beyond precedent. To-night the flames can be seen in every direction, and the morrow, should no rains come to bring relief, will bring tidings of fresh disaster. Forest fires are raging in Centre, Monroe, Pike and Columbia counties, destroying vast tracts of timber.

There were 618 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 121 less than the previous week and 117 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 312 were males and 306 females; 120 died of pneumonia; 54 of consumption; 48 of heart diseases; 31 of measles; 21 of diphtheria; 20 of inflammation of the brain; 19 of influenza; 19 of convulsions; 18 of marasmus; 18 of typhoid fever; 18 of old age; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of bronchitis; 15 of nephritis; 13 of inanition; 12 of apoplexy; 10 of cancer; 9 of uræmia; 9 of Bright's disease; 9 of paralysis and 9 of peritonitis.

FOREIGN—Lord Roberts' campaign plans, according to official reports received Fourth Month 25th, from Bloemfontein, have resulted in the relief of the besieged garrison of colonial troops at Wepener and the occupation of Dewetdorp, both important stragetic points in the Free State, where considerable forces of Boers had been massed. A later London cable says interest in the South African war is centred in the running fight between the burghers retreating from the southern portion of the Orange Free State and General French's horsemen and the infantry of Generals Pole-Carew, Chermside and Rundle. The Boers who escaped did an immense amount of damage, and have now slipped off to hold the next commanding ridge through a broken country admirably suited for a rear guard defence.

A despatch from Thaba N'Chu, describing the more recent fight near that place, in the Free State, says the British forces, led by Canadian troops, carried the Boer kopjes in a rush, and that at one time the fighting line was ten miles long and the conflict fierce. The British loss in killed and wounded was twenty.

The motive of the Boers appear to have been to occupy positions in the hills where they are strongly entrenched.

A scientific statistical work just published fixes the population of Europe at 381,000,000, an increase of 79,000,000 since 1870, or an annual increase of about 3,000,000.

Evictions in Ireland during the past year number only 450, the lowest in nearly a third of a century.

A purely Scottish expedition is about to be organized to the South Pole to work in conjunction with the British and German expedition.

By the collapse of a condemned foot bridge belonging to a side show in the Exposition grounds at Paris on First-day last, caused by the overweighted towers, six persons were killed and about forty injured. The structure, which was not in use, crashed on the great crowd passing below, burying many in the debris.

The Obi, most western of the great Siberian rivers, has been the most important factor in the communication with the interior of the country. Rising in Mongolia, it has a course of 3500 miles, a drainage area of more than 1,500,000 square miles, and upon the river and its tributaries a regular navigation system is in operation over more than 10,000 miles.

Up to the present time Egypt has only been engaged in exporting its raw cotton, but it seems now that trials will be made in the land of the Nile to manufacture cotton goods from Egyptian cotton.

A despatch dated, Yokohoma, Fourth Month 7th, says: The discovery of gold in Hokka Ido, the northernmost of the main islands of the empire, is assuming more and more important aspects. The total length of the river beds containing gold dust is put at 3500 miles, and the total productive area at 1,750,000 acres. Nuggets weighing over half a pound have been found. Since the restriction upon foreign ownership and management of the mines have been removed by this Government companies have been formed among the foreigners in Yokohoma, and in one case a tract of thirty-seven acres has been purchased, an expert from California engaged and all arrangements made to begin operations.

It will be a boon to the Japanese to have skilled miners from the West take a hand, as the native methods of working gold diggings are said to be exceedingly destructive.

In 1800 there were 200 horses in Australia; in 1900 there are 2,000,000.

Reports from the province of South Camarines show that there has been heavy fighting with the insurgents. Hundreds have been killed with slight American loss. General Bell has issued a proclamation warning the insurgents that if guerilla tactics are continued he will retaliate relentlessly by burning their villages.

Coral diamonds have been found along the Maserana river in British Gniana, and that colony is anticipating a great boom as soon as the facts are known. The gems are of the Demerara variety, and are regarded as valuable. It was near the scene of the present find that Sir Walter Raleigh unsuccessfully tried to find the Eldorado along the Orinoco more than 400 years ago.

In Paraguay cotton grows the whole year round, and from one planting two crops are produced. The plant, after it has borne, is cut down, and from its root grows another plant.

The topic of the day in Peru, Chile and Argentina is the recent pamphlet of Alexander Garland outlining a plan for settling the question of the provinces of Tacna and Arica. Garland asserts that he expressed only his personal view, without previously consulting the Peruvian Government. He urges the convoking of a Pan-American Congress under the Presidency of the United St settle the controversy by arbitration.

It is impossible that the existing uncertainty sh indefinitely prolonged.

A report has been made showing that 66,869 residents of Cuba have preserved their allegia Spain under the terms of the treaty of Paris.

A fire which started before noon on the 26th Hull, on the Quebec side of the Ottawa river, o the Dominion capitol, almost totally destroyed the city, crossed the river to Ottawa and burned over section known as the Chaudiere flats. It was imp to check the flames until the 27th, after they had over five square miles of territory. More tha buildings were destroyed, seven lives lost, seven th men, women and children made homeless, and th erty loss is $17,000,000, according to late estima W. D. Gillean, manager of the Canada Paper Co said on the 30th:

"The destruction of the Eddy Company's mills will largely demoralize the newspaper trade of the for some time to come. Many newspapers will fin tremely difficult to procure their requisite supplies over six months all the mills in Canada have bee ing to their full capacity, and all of them at the time are oversold. On Friday morning I receive grams from twenty-five newspapers in various p Canada, asking to be supplied, but it is absolutely sible for us to do much, if anything. Our first must be to protect our contracts. We are comp keep a large stock ahead for our own custome would, be simply folly for us to sell up to the mark. And the conditions that obtain in Canada also to a great extent in the United States. Ver surplus stock is to be had."

octrinal Use of the Scriptures in Friends' Schools.

t writings given by Divine inspiration are ittable for doctrine" far above all other gs, must eminently be true.

who believe the Scriptures to have been en look to the contents of the Scriptures elves for statement or support of the doc- for which they are profitable.

who, as a religious Society, hold our ls as a religious concern, are not satisfied natters taught, however religious as in- tion or expression, become Christian ing, except in the living motive in which eacher may inculcate them. It is the ian spring and motive life in which they resented, and not the topics taught, that s them Christian instruction.

ile in such a spirit all the topics of a l curriculum become Christian instruc- nd take their Divine place and rank in ivine economy of life, yet there are topics directly expressive than others of things d to spiritual life. The Bible is our most cit written storehouse of these.

iends, in their official schools, have always careful to have a large body of its con- stored up in their children's minds, with atim exactness, hoping that much of that laid up for the child in his mere memory, l afterwards be "given" to the maturer from time to time by "inspiration."

e have formed the opinion that, however tertaining to a state of nature may seem nethods pursued, yet the concern of our ly Meeting for inculcating Bible knowledge gh its schools, has deposited among the and file of its membership a larger and correct knowledge of the actual contents language of the Scriptures than is planted ng the average membership of other meet- or denominations who pursue the teaching at is, the telling—rather than the memoriz- plan. Do not our members generally recog- nize any Scripture quotation as Scripture at once on hearing it, without need of seeing it read, by a minister, from the Book? Such acquaintance is less and less assumed to be the case elsewhere.

We find that in a school where each pupil is supposed to commit to memory some six verses of Scripture verbatim once a week, that when we ask them what they brought away from their last First-day school lesson, we oftener than otherwise fail to elicit even the words of the "Golden Text." It would be unfair, however, to imply that the only good they have derived is what they remember of texts.

But texts are an excellent stock to be "thoroughly furnished" with, ready to be opened to the understanding as the Living Word, walking with us by the way, opens them, that, as we are able to bear it, He, beginning with Moses and the Prophets, may expound to us in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself. "They are they," He says, "which testify of Me;" "ye think ye have life in them, but ye will not come to Me that ye might have it."

The written language for the letter, the Living Word for the life. They are said to err who "know not the Scriptures nor the power of God." The mind may remember them, but the Divine power, as obeyed, is the way to know them.

This law of obedience to known Truth must be the true Friend's rule for learning the doctrines of Truth, whether through Scripture words or those unsyllabled words of Christ which are spirit and life, the latest, fresh, up-to-date Scripture of each one's present soul-life. That which opens ourselves to our understanding opens dormant texts. Lodge this cardinal doctrine in a child's mind, and he is in a fair way, when obedient, for all sound doctrine. In the following of it out he needs not that any man teach him, save as the anointing teacheth.

Divine wisdom has seen fit not to present his spiritual truth to man systematically—that is, systematically from man's standpoint. He who sees his end and eternal purpose from the beginning knows what his system in revelation is, but it is too much for man to know. For man's utmost powers of comprehension the Divine revelation must remain as unsystematic as the wind which "bloweth where it listeth." He has many unsaid things to say to us, and said things to bring to our remembrance, but we cannot bear them prematurely. The truly systematic way of knowing them is systematic obedience. No doubt the mustard seed goes regularly through all the orderly processes blocked out for it in Gray's "Systematic and Structural Botany." But all that it knows about it is an instinct that it is pushing up into the light, as the sun gives it light. Its faith builds more wisely than it knows. So, as we attend to our obedience, by items, the Architect of his own doctrine will attend to his system. We look back upon our accomplished past that God hath wrought, and see it proved that "he that will do his will shall know the doctrine."

And so we like to see a boy convinced that conscientious good order in a Scripture class is a truer Scripture lesson than the finest parrot-like delivery of texts. In other words, that the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

But the form of sound words of doctrine ought surely to be held fast. We are not usually sure that the form of words is sound for a doctrine, except as it is in Scripture words. Friends especially have been careful to adhere to Scripture forms of statement for their doctrines. They desire that their successors in the Church should be acquainted with the same modes of expressing doctrine, that parents should teach them to their children, both personally and by that extension of parental instruction which we call schools. It is a breach of trust in a school supported in the main by Friends' money for educating their children in and according to their principles, to be non-committal as to Friends' doctrines—a colorless school for the general instruction of citizens—for the use, forsooth, of Quaker funds in the education of children of other denominations, before whom, as soon as they touch our threshold, our own principles must hide their diminished heads.

But "teach thou" unflinchingly "the things which become sound doctrine," and, preferably in the words of Scripture. A view of Friends principles is due to others who knock at our doors for admission as matter of information, and to our own children as a matter of training and convincement. True, we do not bring others into our schools to proselyte them, neither do we bring them in to rob our children of their birthright. If their admission is to set aside our doctrines, let them go rather than our doctrines.

But Friends' doctrines need not be presented in an offending form to our patrons, and, if presented in the Scripture language they will not. Against that there is no awakening of cavil.

The passages comprehending the essential doctrines of the Gospel and of right life should be firmly committed to memory, and also those which hold up to view those special aspects of Truth given to our religious Society especially to uphold. Nothing less will our patrons from other denominations expect of us if they expect to respect us. Neither, if a child asks why Friends do so and so, or omit aught that others do, will they expect anything short of a straight and full explanation. To be honest, such statement does not have to be discourteous or unsympathetic of others' consciences But it can hold and state the truth in that love which "rejoices in the truth."

We can readily conceive that a course of Scripture passages could be produced outlining a general acquaintance with the contents of the Bible as a book, dwelling on the essential truths of Christian doctrine and practice, and assembling in groups those texts which enforce each truth of our separate profession; all this to be adapted to the number of years of the school-course using it, at the rate of six or more verses a week for each school year; that is, our usual number of fifteen hundred verses in a seven year's course.

We take, indeed, quite a contract on our hands when we undertake to group the clearest passages covering the subjects of War, Oaths, Worship, Prayer, Ministry, Observance of Days, Universal Grace, Interpretation of Scriptures, Apparel, Ostentation, the true Communion and Baptism, the One Priesthood, the Church, Purity and truth in forms of speech, etc., etc.

Barclay, as so many know, has usefully done this to a large extent in the appendix to his catechism; but it might be a commendable exercise for the concerned teacher to gather an arrangement of these Scriptures freshly for himself, according to his sense of the condition of those under his care; and afterwards, when he has done his best, he may supply deficiencies by consulting Barclay and others. The teachers thus prepared by personal labor and seeking best wisdom for "rightly dividing the word," will take an interest in the teaching, which the pupils will reflect in their recitations. And then he will be personally better prepared to answer inquiring minds.

The two processes which these remarks may have seemed, by this time, to notice, are the incidental and the methodical. The incidental kind draws our principles of Truth, without labeling them as Quaker, through little openings which often surprise one's self as he is open to them, not only in the Scripture text, but also in that of Virgil or Cicero, or Homer, history or literature. We are willing to see our boys and girls getting saturated with the Friend's atmosphere of Truth, and adjusted to our standpoint, in viewing little or great matters that may come in sight from day to day. The appeal to the silent witness for truth in children is of lovely effect.

But the immediate aim is that the child gets the context of the Scriptures themselves, rather than any teacher's views, written or spoken. Let there be liberty in the spirit for the teacher's fresh and Divine opening, but it is a poor thing for the teacher otherwise to talk Bible, and poor for the meetings for worship, which he afterwards turns himself over to, as to a larger Bible-class.

It is not Scripture classes, on any day of the week, as they might be conducted, but as they often have been conducted, that has largely unquakered the general ministry, trained a spurious one, led it to speak as the scribes, or degraded it from the inspired message to the sometimes admired and able teaching.

A system of liberty to open the Scriptures to the human understanding in the mind, will, and intelligence of man, must naturally continue as man-made ministry for adults as for children; must revolutionize backward the spiritual standard for worship; must relegate public worship to the plane of public entertainment; must put forward in meetings for worship, Bible readings and expoundings of them as to a Bible-class; narrows the ministers' gallery into a pulpit, and the incumbency thereof into a stated and paid lectureship on religious truths. Through the same gateway have come in the music-machines; and the retrovolution has proceeded so far by man-made activities, that a Society once concerned to watch the Spirit alone as its witnessed Leader, finds itself generally dismembered from the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," and at a loss for its whereabouts.

Do we lay all this tendency at the door of the Scripture school or class? By no means necessarily. It is to be charged to the substitution of man for the Spirit in the work of the church anywhere. Scripture learning could be conducted without violating our cardinal principle for "opening the Scriptures" and for other ministry, for the rendering to the intellect, or Cæsar, the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are his.

Now it is obvious that much of the Scripture is addressed to the intellectual understanding, and that understanding should be made correct. Points of history, the modern and the ancient meaning of a word, the lives of men, the geography and so on. There is much that ought to be understood on its own plane; leaving the spiritual part to the spirit, as He shall give spiritual openings to deliver it, or as He shall reserve it himself to teach the child, in the future of his experience as he is able to bear it.

But there is another method of teaching doctrine which we can only name here, yet it is of vital importance; it is that which consists in "adorning the doctrine."

ERRATUM.—On page 333 of last number, 12th line of third column, insert the word "not" before "conformed."

MANY of those who believe in the final and universal salvation of all people tell us that they accept the idea that all men will, at some time, be punished for their sins, if not wholly in this world, then in the future world, for a while at least, to make up for the balance due to their sins, says the Christian Advocate, and then comments as follows: "When this has been done, then the souls of such ones will have place in heaven. But it seems to be forgotten that something besides punishment is necessary to make one fit for heaven Punishment for sin cannot fit any one for glory. Nor can it purge sin from the soul. It never can create a new heart. It cannot produce true love for God and good people. One great purpose of having those who are in their sins in a place by themselves is to preserve heaven from all who have not been made wholly holy by the sacrificed life of Christ. It is Christ's life accepted and lived that saves."

Asbestos and Its Uses.

Asbestos is called also by miners "cot stone." Canada furnishes almost all of the bestos of commerce—about ten thousand a year; Italy furnishes a few hundred t It has been found also in Corsica, in Hung in Sweden, in Russia, in South Africa, an South America; but what with the difficult mining and transportation, as well as the ra of the product or the insufficiency of the q tity, the amounts produced in these reg are almost nothing.

Asbestos is chiefly used to pack piston steam engines and joints in conduits for ste hot air, etc., and to cover such conduits well as steam-boilers. It is also employe insulate electric wires.

Of it are made filters for acids and for building paper, brick, cement and paints. is used to line fire-proof safes, in gas-logs, in furnaces. Garments for firemen, g makers, and workmen who use fire and a are made from it, as well as theatre-curt and ropes for use in fire-escapes.

It may be used either alone or in combin with other textile materials, or with rub steel, etc.

Asbestos is very irregularly distrib throughout strata of serpentine rock; worked very simply, therefore, in quarrie points where it is found in profitable quant The deepest quarries do not exceed one dred feet. The huge blocks of serpentin tached by blasting are broken up, and tho the pieces that contain asbestos are carri the workshops, where children break the further with small hammers and separat asbestos according to quality.

It has been said that asbestos can be like any textile material; it is now even This is effected quite well by the follo method: the fibres are placed for two h in a cold ten-per-cent. solution of albume then partially dried in air, after which are dipped in a dyeing bath raised pro sively in temperature till it reaches r degrees C [one hundred and twenty-nin grees F].

The Prince of Wales.

hose of our readers who have not yet be- to study English history may wonder why oldest son of the reigning sovereign, and heir to the throne, should be called the rince of Wales." The story is told by "For- d" as follows :

hout six hundred years ago there was a g of England—Edward I.—who subdued people of Wales, which, you know, lies just t of England. After conquering the Welsh, was anxious to get their good will, and so, en it happened that his first baby prince born in Carnarvon, in Wales, he had a ght idea. He announced that his boy was ative of Wales—one who could speak Welsh as well as any other tongue (this was true, he baby was but a few weeks old), and he uld therefore be the people's own prince, vard, Prince of Wales.

Twenty-three years after this baby became g of England, and about fifty years later grandson had assigned to him, as the third nce of Wales, the crest and motto which been borne by all the English kings' sons o have since that day had the title. The st is three ostrich feathers, and the motto he sentence, "Ich dien"—"I serve." It s given to the Black Prince, a boy of great mise, who fought bravely at the battle of ecy.

The present Prince of Wales is the oldest of Queen Victoria, and is a man whose est son has already become of age. Some ople think of kings and queens and princes aring magnificent crowns and continually king great display ; but if you were to see London house where the Prince of Wales es, you would be surprised at its plain ap- rance—on its outside at least. He has s and daughters who are being brought up a very sensible and simple way. The boys not allowed to "put on airs" because of ir high birth, and the dresses of the young ls are made in a style much more plain than those of many silly school-girls in America. There is a book written by Queen Victoria it would be interesting to any one who likes to know how the home life of the royal family goes on. It shows the reader that the great ones of the earth have just as many trials and struggles and heartaches as the lowliest. It lets you see that the Queen of England is a loving mother and a sincere Christian.

Baptism.

Divine condescension to the dawning belief of this Jewish proselyte in those transition times established no precedent which should induce us to linger in the border land of Judaism. Some wonder why apostles and believers adhered so tenaciously to circumcision, abstinence from certain meats, etc. Future generations may still more wonder why some believers of our day adhere so persistently to water baptism, etc. The day is surely dawning, the ranks are filling with those who realize that these shadows are all foreign to the Christian dispensation. There is less excuse for our now adhering to water baptism than there was for those Jewish believers continuing to observe

John the Baptist foretold that this

THE ATTITUDE OF CHRISTIANS TO WATER BAPTISM AFTER THE APOSTLES.

By collateral evidence several apostles were probably martyred under the Roman emperor Nero about A. D. 64.

Josephus, B. 4 | The Jews rebelled against the Romans A. D. 66.

Josephus, B. 4 | Christians of Jerusalem and Judea removed to Pela beyond the Jordan.

The seat of Church authority moved from Jewish Jerusalem to Gentile Antioch. John was probably the only apostle then living. At Antioch and other places Gentile Christians gained ascendency and discouraged even Jews from circumcision and other offensive customs, while water baptism and those not repulsive to Gentile Christians were mostly continued and

At first water baptism was not insisted upon, but in the second century greater importance was attached to it. Some, however, claimed

Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. III. | that only baptism of Holy Spirit was necessary because none of the apostles but Paul were baptized with water and Christ said: "John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit." About the beginning of

Vol.III.,p.669 | the third century we first find water baptism called a sacrament by Tertullian, and about the same time he complains that many tried to destroy it. Plainly as water baptism was exalted, opposition increased. A

Buck's Dictionary | sect called Accoundits rejected all symbols and sacraments on the principle that incorporeal things cannot be communicated by things corporeal nor Divine mysteries by things visible.

Historian Schaff says: "Many Jews and Gentiles were baptized with water only, not with Holy Spirit and fire of the gospel, and smuggled into the church their old religious notions and practices." The Emperor Constantine professedly became a Christian, while he virtually remained a heathen. A. D. 312. He convened the council of Nice and they formed a creed A. D. 325.

Christians were very few in number before Constantine, but now heathen flocked to the church and controlled its councils. Among obscure dissenters whom the ruling church called heretics may we expect thereafter to find the nearest approach to Christianity as Jesus taught it on the Mount and elsewhere. Within a few decades after the council of Nice isolated

Vol. III., p. 105 | Mosheim says: "Enthusiasts who discarded the sacraments lived among the Greeks and Assyrians for many ages." They were known by the general and invidious name Massalians or Euchites, which sect existed as early

Cyclopedia American and Britannica | as A. D. 361. About A. D. 660 one Constantine came forward as a reform preacher under inspiration received in reading the New Testament, particularly the writings of St. Paul. His followers were sometimes called Macedonians, but were generally known as Paulicians. Some suppose that these Paulicians existed centuries before under other names and that the drooping sect was revived by the powerful preaching of Constantine.

Neander, Vol. III., p. 293

Neander says: "The Paulicians wholly rejected the outward celebration of the sacraments and maintained that by the multiplication of external rights and ceremonies in the dominant church the true life of religion had declined." That it was not Christ's intention to institute water baptism as a perpetual ordinance, and that by baptism He meant only the baptism of the Spirit and that he communicated himself as the living water for the thorough cleansing of the whole human nature. That eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ consisted in coming into vital union with Him.

Mosheim, Vol. II. p. 335
Neander, Vol. III., p. 587
Cyclopedia American and Britannica

In the ninth century one hundred thousand Paulicians were martyred at once in Armenia, accused of heresy and denying the sacraments. For the same offence untold numbers were put to death during previous and subsequent centuries in distant countries. Their enemies admit that these Paulicians were loving, spiritual and peaceful and diligent in reading and circulating the Scriptures. Were not these dissenting martyrs the remnant or true seed of the church and their ruling enemies the heretics?

Some ecclesiastics who presided over a flourishing theological institution at Orleans claimed to have been awakened by the writings of St. Augustine and St. Paul, particularly the latter. Many of the nobility and others of eminent piety and benevolence became their adherents. They rejected external worship, rites and ceremonies, and placed religion in the internal contemplation of God and the elevation of the soul. They rejected water baptism and held to a baptism of spirit, also to a spiritual eucharist by which all who had received spiritual baptism would be refreshed and find their spiritual needs completely satisfied. Thirteen leaders of this sect were burned A. D. 1022. When urged to recant they replied, "We have a higher law, one written by the Holy Spirit in the inner man."

Neander, Vol. III., p. 593
Mosheim, Vol. II. p. 565

Mosheim says: "They soared above the comprehension of the age in which they lived. Their enemies admit that they were blackened by many accusations which were entirely false. They had individual holiness and practical piety to be necessary and that outward baptism and outward eucharist were nothing. This they affirmed was the doctrine of Christ and his apostles.

Neander, Vol. III., p. 569
Mosheim, Vol. II., p. 564

A few years later a similar sect were discovered in the districts of Arrs and Leige.

About A. D. 1046 a sect was suppressed at Turin which was favored by the nobility and widely diffused among the clergy and laity. They claimed to have one priest without the tonsure; he daily visited their brethren scattered throughout the world and when God bestowed him on them they received from him with great devotion forgiveness of sin. They acknowledged no other priest and no other sacrament but his absolution. Who, we ask, is this priest without the tonsure who daily visits the world wide brethren? Is it not Jesus who was made a priest not after the law of a carnal commandment, but by the power of an endless life?

A PRAYER TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY YEARS OLD.

O! that mine eyes might closed be
To what concerns me not to see;
That deafness might possess mine ear
To what concerns me not to hear;
That truth my tongue might always tie
From ever speaking foolishly:
That no vain thought might ever rest,
Or be conceived in my breast
That by each deed and word and thought,
Glory may to my God be brought!
But what are wishes? Lord, mine eye
On thee is fixed, to Thee I cry;
Wash, Lord, and purify my heart,
And make it clean in every part,
And when 'tis clean, Lord keep it too,
For that is more than I can do.

An Age of Hurry.

An old man, evidently a philosopher, had been spending a week in Chicago. He had been jostled on the sidewalks, crowded against walls, prodded in the side, and shoved hither and thither in the midst of a turmoil such as he was quite unused to. His visit was at an end. He was going to a quieter place. He had just bought his ticket when a station official said, briskly but not unkindly:

"Hurry up, sir, or you'll miss your train."

No doubt the old gentleman seemed a little "slow."

"Hustle there; hustle," shouted a gate tender.

"I don't have to, do I?" said the old man.

"You do if you want to catch that train."

"But I don't have to catch it unless I want to, do I?"

"I suppose not; but Chicago's a fast place, sir, and you can't keep up with the procession if you don't hustle."

"People don't get honest here any faster than they do elsewhere, do they?" asked the old gentleman seriously.

"No, I can't say they do."

"Nor they don't become respectable citizens any faster, do they?"

"I suppose not," said the official, whose face was beginning to look puzzled.

"Nor develop the Christian graces any faster, do they?"

This was getting almost beyond the official; but he shook his head negatively.

"Nor learn any faster their duty to their fellow-men?"

Again the official shook his head.

"Nor go to heaven any faster?"

"Not much," said the railroad man, with emphasis.

The stranger took out his watch.

"Well, I have two minutes in which to walk a hundred feet. I guess I can make it without blowing out a cylinder head, can't I?"

He spoke in a gentle tone, almost as if he were speaking to himself, and the railway official picked up his satchel and carried it for him out through the gate and across the platform.—Youth's Companion.

Christ the Revealer of the Father.

No man hath seen God at any time; the begotten Son, which is in the bosom of Father, He hath declared Him." Such is impressive and far-reaching declaration which the Evangelist and Apostle John s what has been called the Prologue to Gospel. There is an interesting various ing, attested by some of the primary criti- uthorities, and preferred by the late Dr. elles: "God, only begotten, who is in the m of the Father, He hath declared Him." ne margin of the Revised Version it is said e supported by "many very ancient au- ities;" and the late Dr. Hort published a ued dissertation in its favor. But as it not adopted in the late Revised Version, common reading of the text above given be relied on as supported by the prepon- ting weight of critical authority.

is a declaration according to which it was ist who was with our first parents in the den of Eden, condemning their transgres- s, and at the same time in mercy opening them "a door of hope," giving them the great promise that the SEED of the wo- should bruise the head of the Serpent. n. iii. 15.)* It is a declaration according hich it was CHRIST who predicted to Noah approaching deluge (Gen. vi. 13). It was who called Abraham from his country and n his kindred (Gen. xii. 1, seq.); and by whom his faith was counted to him for right- eousness (Gen. xv. 6). It was He who ap- peared to Abraham on the plains or by the oaks of Mamre, and whom he addressed as "the Judge of all the earth" (Gen. xviii. 1, 17, 18–25) †; who rained fire upon Sodom (Gen. xix. 24) ‡; who tested Abraham's faith by requir- ing the sacrifice of his beloved Isaac, and who as the reward of his obedience was pleased, in sparing Isaac, to give Abraham the glorious promise "in thy SEED shall all the nations of the earth be blessed because thou hast obeyed my voice" (Gen. xxii. 18.)§

The declaration of the Apostle above cited is the gracious assurance that in his pre-exist- ence as the Eternal Word, CHRIST was Himself present before his incarnation as the All-wise Pædagogos, the Heaven-descended Teacher, Guardian, Counsellor, and Judge, the glorious "Angel of the presence of God" (see Isa. lxiii. 9), carrying forward with patient, long-suffer- ing love the work of preparatory discipline and training in its various stages for the education of the worlds until "the fulness of the time" was come" (Gal. iv. 4) for the crowning of the work of Almighty Grace, by the accomplish- ment through himself in his incarnation, and all the blessed results flowing from it, of the eternal purposes of the righteousness and love of God in the Gospel for the redemption of fallen man.

It is in truth the presence of Christ in his pre-existence before his incarnation working for the preparatory education and discipline of the world in righteousness, which is the mighty fact that at once explains and illuminates the pages of the Old Testament, as the inspired record of the earlier stages of the same Divine revelation, of which the glorious consummation is at once enshrined and unfolded in the pages of the New Testament. The two Covenants are, in fact, inseparable and mutually interde- pendent. They have the same Author, and one cannot be perfectly and intelligently under- stood without reference to the other. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

It was CHRIST in his pre-existence before his incarnation who was himself, according to the Scriptures, the Revealer of the Infinite God, "declaring Him" at "sundry times and in divers manners," but ever with the same unalterable purpose of righteousness and love. It was He of whom the Apostle Paul speaks in allusion to Israel in the wilderness, "They did all eat of the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink, for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was CHRIST" (1 Cor. x. 3, 4). It is in beautiful harmony with this thought—(a harmony which I love to mark and to empha- size)—that the Apostle Peter speaks of the Spirit by which the ancient prophets were in- spired, as "the Spirit of CHRIST," when it tes- tified "beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glories that should follow" (1 Pet. i. 11). The ministry of Christ in his pre-exist- ence, before his incarnation, is, in fact, a glo- rious truth upon which the writers of the Early Church, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius, to mention no others, delight to dwell.

Our adorable Redeemer throughout his earthly ministry appears, from the record pre- served to us in the New Testament, to have lived in the habitual consciousness that He was himself the great subject of Old Testament Scripture. How wondrous is his declaration to the Jews, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it and was glad" (John viii. 56). And in reply to this incredu- lous remonstrance, how solemn is his assertion of his own actual pre-existence, "Verily, veri- ly, I say unto you, before Abraham was, I am" (John viii. 58). He authoritatively ap- propriates to himself the 53rd chapter of Isaiah, in words the meaning of which cannot be mistaken or explained away. "This that is written must yet be accomplished in Me, 'And He was reckoned among the transgressors' (Isa. liii. 12): for the things concerning Me have an end" ("fulfilment," R. V.), (Luke xxii. 37).

And again, how impressive are the words uttered to his disciples as He went forth to the Mount of Olives from his last supper: "All ye shall be offended because of Me this night, for it is written, 'I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad'" (Matt. xxvi. 31). How doubly impres- sive do they become as they are read in con- nection with the prophecy of Zechariah, "Awake, O sword, against My Shepherd, and against the man that is My FELLOW, saith the Lord of hosts: smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered" (Zech. xiii. 7, 8).

What Christian can read without deep emo- tion, the narrative of the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane, when the soul of the righteous Sufferer became "exceeding sorrowful even unto death;" and He uttered the words, "O My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from Me; nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt." "And again the second time He went away and prayed, saying, 'O My Father, if this cup cannot pass away except I drink it, thy will be done.' And He went away and prayed the third time, saying the words" (Matt. xxvi. 38, 39, 42, 44).

How impressive does all this become in con- nection with the words of solemn reproof to Peter, who, in his short-sighted, impetuous zeal, had drawn his sword and cut off the ear of Malchus, the high priest's servant. At that supreme moment, in view of his own impend- ing sufferings, the Lord Jesus, with calm, un- disturbed dignity, exerted his almighty power by restoring the ear, saying to Peter, "Put up again thy sword into its place. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to My Father and He shall presently give Me more than twelve le- gions of angels? But how then should the Scripture be fulfilled, that thus it MUST be?" (Matt. xxvi. 53, 54). Then addressing the mul- titudes, who had crowded around him, He added, "Are ye come out as against a robber with swords and staves to seize me? I sat daily in the Temple teaching and ye took me not. But all this is come to pass that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled" (Matt. xxvi. 55, 56).

Even in his last sufferings the Lord Jesus reminds us by express quotation that He was fully conscious that He was himself the sub- ject of the 22nd Psalm, a psalm the early part of which reads almost like a description of the incidents of his own crucifixion. The opening words, "My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken Me?" are appropriated by Him upon the cross as his cry to his Father, and can only be adequately explained as we realize the momentous fact so well expressed in language that should be familiar to us all, that "at that time the sins of all mankind were upon Him, and their iniquities and transgressions with which He was wounded, which He was to bear and to be an offering for them as He was man, but died not as He was God. And so in that He died for all men, and tasted death for every man, He was an offering for the sins of the whole world" (George Fox's Journal, p. 4, first edition; 1st vol., p. 35, second edition).

"Through the Holy Spirit, who is the Spirit of God and of Christ," to use, in conclusion, the words of the late learned and devout Dr. Delitzsch, "David's typical history as he describes it in the Psalms, and more especially in the 22d Psalm, acquires that depth of tone, brilliancy, and power, by virtue of which it reaches far beyond its typical facts, and penetrating to its very root in the Divine counsels, grows to be the record of prophecy: so that to a certain extent it may be rightly said that Christ speaks through David, in so far as the Spirit of Christ speaks through Him, and makes the typical suffering of David, as the ancestor of Christ, the medium for the representation of Christ's own future sufferings. Unless this incontestable relation between the two be recognized, the 22d Psalm cannot be understood, nor can we fully appreciate the place it was designed to fill in Messianic prophecy."—J. B. Braithwaite, in London "Friend."

Doukhobor Notes.

Extract from letter of JAMES S. CRERAR, Immigration Agent at Yorkton, Assiniboia, to Wm. B. Harvey.

I have been very busy the last month handling the seeds for the Doukhobors, and attending to newcomers for this season. Since spring opened, four weeks ago, we have had the finest and best weather I ever saw, not one lost day with bad weather; roads are now in good shape; Doukhobors are all very busy putting in their seeds, and I must say I have not in twenty-four years in this country experienced finer weather. We have sent a lot of the people out to work. I am sending sixty out to-morrow morning, to work all summer at one dollar and a half per day, at Moosejaw; board, four dollars a week. These men worked at this same place last season, and I expect to send sixty more in a week, the railway giving them transportation free.

I do hope the people will have a good crop this year. Leonhardt will be out among them all spring, to advise them about putting in the seed, and the proper time. So far we have little sickness—not more than one per cent. at present. I am yours truly,

JAS. S. CRERAR.

THE INNER LIFE.

Purer than the purest fountain,
Wider than the widest sea,
Sweeter than the sweetest music,
Is God's love in Christ to me.
Why love me so?
I do not know;
I only know
That nothing less than love divine
Could save this sinful soul of mine.

The Unknown Realms of Scripture.

We were a party of six, all supposed Scriptural experts. One of our number was a retired American Missionary Association worker, and another one had been preparing for the foreign mission field when her health failed her. The five of us accepted the invitation of the sixth, our hostess, to attend a colored revival meeting near by.

Our dark-skinned brethren were of the Christian religion; therefore they were nearer to us than heathen. Nevertheless, between us and them rolled a great gulf. They were illiterate, emotional, babes in the Gospel. They had never heard of the higher criticism, had never studied Barnes or Adam Clarke, and were not afraid of De Wette or Renan. So we sat there with a patronizing air that human beings are apt to assume when we are thrown in contact with mortals less wise than themselves.

Brother Jonah Watkins, a white-wooled, bent-backed man of seventy, was called upon to pray. He responded, in nowise overawed by our superior presence. He prayed as though his lips had indeed been touched by a live coal from God's own altar. [For the reader's reverence we waive the dialect].

"O Lord," he prayed, "thou knowest this people. Here we are before thee, down on our marrow bones in the lowlands of sorrow. Raise us up, dear Lord, and stand us upon our feet upon the mountain tops of glory. And the sinners of this congregation, dear Lord, smite them with the hammer of Jeremiah"—

I heard no more. "The hammer of Jeremiah"—what was it? I had read the prophet Jeremiah through and through, with the commentaries and Bible dictionaries open at every page, but never a syllable had I caught about Jeremiah's hammer. What did this bent-backed colored man know about Jeremiah that the wise teachers of the law had overlooked? The question was broached on the homeward walk. Our party had all been struck with the expression, but not one of us six Sunday-school teachers had the remotest idea of what Jeremiah's hammer might be. The next day six men and women read their Bibles, and each of the six began at the first verse of the first chapter of Jeremiah. One by one, as we reached the twenty-ninth verse of the twenty-third chapter, we found what we were after.

"Is not my word like a fire? saith the Lord; like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?" Jeremiah's hammer was God's Word, that was able to break down the flinty resistance of the indifferent soul. Could Scripture reference have been more applicable? And the wonder of all was that this lowborn son of toil, spelling his texts out word by word, should have found the kernel of the meat, while others, with every help at hand, passed over it.

Then our retired missionary confessed that in one of her meetings a poor, illiterate soul had quoted the Bible's promise that God should be "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land," and how shame and confusion had covered her that she could remember no such promise, and how she searched her Bible until she indeed found it, word for word as it had been given. After that confession we began to ask each other: "Are others as ignorant? Do they read the Bible with an unseeing eye? And if so, why is it?"

One of our number who had read the s book through by course some fifty times ing her life, now read it again from cov cover. This time she was searching fo blind or hidden texts. Whenever she fo text or even a phrase that had an unfa ring, or that she could not readily have ass to its proper book, had not the Bible been to the exact spot, she wrote it carefully The result was astonishing, yes, humilia for the number of these texts was not large, but some of them this patient sea would not have recognized as Scripture she read the words elsewhere.

The texts were tried on other people. for instance, are a score of sample texts. many church-members and Sunday-s teachers can write after each of these the name of the book in which it is fo We ask you to take pencil and paper an it.

Photography's Record.

Beginning with the moon, with which perhaps least has been accomplished, total eclipses of the sun have yielded up long desired information, otherwise unattainable, so that they by comparison approach the character of worked-out fields. Automatic daily observations of the solar surface, with the details of the spots, promise data for determining effects upon terrestrial climate. Nebulæ have been discovered, their form, details and conditions revealed, and fainter extensions, vaster than could be conceived, added. Comets have exhibited wonderful transformations, distortions, and internal movements utterly undiscoverable by the best telescope alone. Asteroids so numerous leave the record of their existence in trails upon the plates, that, as has been said by Prof. Barnard, they are turned adrift again unless they show some striking peculiarity of orbit. Meteors record their paths on which rests the expectation of precise determination of the radiant. Combined with the spectroscope, binaries of shortest periods are detected, variable stars not only discovered, but classified. The surmises of mathematicians in regard to Saturn's rings are confirmed. Runaway stars are caught. The Parisian astronomer that could not catch the satellite of Neptune with his telescope could see it fixed on his photographic plate.

Photography and microscopy too, have gone hand in hand. At the discovery of photography, microscropy recognized at once a new ally. With the aid of the modern rapid dry-plate, sensitive to all or any desired colors, photography has become to the microscope only less the observing and recording eye than to the telescope. In chemistry, Dr. Crookes, by the aid of photospectroscopy and orthochromatic plates, has added the metal monium to the list of elements. Meteorological science is enriched by photography, as is shown by its contributions to the study of lightning discharges. The kinetoscope has found application in recording the phases of a solar eclipse and of growing plants. In the industries the applications of photography are infinite.

It is proposed to furnish cards for the Jacquard loom, and thus make tapestries commonplace. It will furnish water-marks for paper capable of one hundred thousand impressions. It reproduced the Encyclopedia Britannica at one-third the cost of type. It preserved the valuable manuscript copy of the Century Dictionary, which was practically uninsurable, in miniature form against loss by fire. It may, in the future, in the same way, find a place to economize shelf-room in our libraries by compressing books that are seldom or never read. Its applications are well known in the copying of inscriptions, even in dark interiors, in the preservation and duplication of valuable documents and papers, in the detection of forgeries, especially by the method of composite photography as developed by Dr. Persifor Frazer, in the furnishing of legal evidence in general, in the detection of criminals, etc. In Canada fifty thousand square miles have been platted by means of the phototheodolite. In the late war the camera went to the front, and has furnished invaluable records. Apropos of this, it is only necessary to recall Captain Wise making exposures while charging up San Juan Hill. In the present African war it promises to play an important part in reconnoissance through the telephoto apparatus that accompanies the British forces.—Charles H. Himes (address at Franklin Institute, Phila.)

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The amount of bonds received at the Treasury to Fifth Month 7th, for exchange for the new 2 per cent. consols is $265,501,500, of which $48,812,900 were received from individuals and institutions other than national banks.

Secretary Hay and Lord Pauncefote have signed a treaty extending for seven months, from Eighth Month 5th next, the period of time allowed for the exchange of ratifications of the Hay-Pauncefote canal treaty. This extension was arranged for in view of the conviction that no legislation upon the treaty can be secured during the present session of Congress.

The House passed the Nicaraguan Canal bill by a vote of 225 to 35.

The Hepburn bill as passed does not differ substantially from the bill known by the same name introduced earlier in the session. It authorizes the President to secure such territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua "as may be desirable and necessary, on which to excavate, construct and protect a canal," and appropriates the sum of $10,000,000 as a first installment of the $140,000,000 which has been fixed as the limit of total cost. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was negotiated for the purpose of facilitating "the construction of a ship canal" and "to remove any objections which might arise out of the convention of Fifth Month 19th, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction" of an isthmian canal by the United States, provided for the complete neutrality of the waterway. The Hay treaty was signed on Second Month 5th last, but was not ratified. It was negotiated on the assumption that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is still in effect. The Hepburn bill is in conflict with the Hay treaty and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Recent mail advices to the War Department from the Philippines indicate that the latest plan of the insurgents is to organize into mounted bands of 100 and harass the American forces wherever possible. These bands will be scattered throughout the islands, and will be in daily communication with each other as far as possible by means of scouts, who will carry the orders to govern concerted movements and all information concerning retreats, reinforcements, etc. According to the Liberal, the organ of the Filipinos, a complete plan of military strategy will be drawn up, "as a result of which the Americans will soon suffer." That paper declares that the present war, far from being over is really more vigorous than ever. It is reported that a strong insurgent camp is being organized in the Zambales Mountains by a prominent General, and that nearly all the towns of the provinces, whether occupied by Americans or not, continue to pay taxes for the sustenance of the Filipinos in arms and the prosecution of the struggle.

General Young reports that Aguinaldo is organizing a new army in the mountains, to fight in the rainy season. On the 1st inst. four hundred insurgents attacked Catarman in Northern Samar; after the fight the Americans buried 125 of them. There were no American casualties.

The new civil government of Porto Rico was formally inaugurated at San Juan on the 1st instant.

The import of crude rubber to this country have in the last thirty years increased 431 per cent.

England received $525,242 worth of shoes from the United States in 1899.

Louis Dreyfus, of Germany, showed Thomas Edison how to melt iron in five seconds. The National Tubing Company is after the invention.

New discoveries of rich quick silver deposits have been made in Brewster county, Texas, during the last few days, and another big rush of prospectors to the district has begun.

Kansas farmers have paid off $150,000,000 indebtedness in the past year. Good crops are responsible. The last yield of corn amounted to 250,000,000 bushels. The wheat crop was about 64,000,000 bushels. Each of these products netted the State about $50,000,000. The value of other farm products and live stock makes the total about $250,000,000.

South Carolina is now manufacturing all the cotton she produces. North Carolina, Georgia and other States are also turning out a large part of their cotton in finished goods.

Several hundred people from Illinois will visit Maine during the coming summer, while the clams are ripening. The people who compose the excursions are grandsons and grand-daughters of people who went to Illinois from Maine before the prairies were ploughed.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has secured control of the Long Island Railroad Company by purchasing $8,030,000 worth of its $12,000,000 of capital stock, thus gaining fine terminal facilities on New York harbor and a virtual monopoly of steam road traffic on Long Island. The New York Central will be invited to take half the Pennsylvania's interest in the company.

Of 700 ten dollar marked bills paid on a Seventh-day night by a Massachusetts manufactory to its hands, 400 by the following Third day were deposited in bank by saloonkeepers.

After hearing eight divorce cases in one day in which the cause was habitual drunkenness on the part of the husband, Judge Bishop of the Des Moines District, Ia., District Court decided that hereafter when a divorce is granted on the grounds of habitual drunkenness, the Court will serve formal notice upon every saloonkeeper and every druggist in the city that they are not to sell liquor to the man who is thus designated as an habitual drunkard.

The Mississippi river each year washes away an alarming amount of shore, equal to ten square miles of territory 86 feet deep.

A tremendous upheaval of land has occurred on Nooksack River ten miles west of Mount Baker. What had once been a valley and bed of the Nooksack River is now a hill seventy feet high. The noise of the upheaval was heard at Hamilton, ten miles away.

A lesson of the severe winter of a year ago is that trees, shrubs and vines planted deep are not affected by extremes of weather or sudden changes, as are those planted shallow.

Forest fires in Northern Michigan and Wisconsin have destroyed one village and several others are threatened. The dry timber is proving easy prey to the flames, which the high wind has spread over a wide area. Ames, the town entirely wiped out, had a population of 200. There was a store, cedar yard, station and fifteen or twenty houses. Forest fires are also said to be burning all along the Soo road to Minneapolis. The property and timber destroyed already will probably mean a loss of over $100,000. A despatch from East Tawas, Mich., says that forest fires are running through timber lands and cedar swamps in that locality. Forest fires broke out afresh on the 2d inst., in Clearfield county, destroying several million feet of logs and thousands of cords of wood.

On the 1st inst., a terrible mine disaster occurred at Schofield, Utah. One hundred and fifty bodies have been found, and others are believed to have been killed. A naked lamp is supposed to have caused the accident. The entire top of the mountain was blown to pieces.

There were 517 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 101 less than the previous week and 40 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 284 were males and 233 females; 77 died of pneumonia; 57 of consumption; 35 of heart diseases; 20 of diphtheria; 20 of convulsions; 19 of inflammation of the brain; 18 of measles; 15 of uraemia; 15 of bronchitis; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of marasmus; 14 of old age; 14 of nephritis; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of cancer; 12 of inanition; 11 of Bright's disease; 10 of paralysis; 10 from casualties and 8 of influenza.

FOREIGN.—A scientific statistical work just published fixes the population of Europe at 381,000,000, an increase of 79,000,000 since 1870, or an annual increase of about 3,000,000.

About 1,500,000 persons are employed in the coal mines of the world.

The British exchequer's balance at the Bank of England on Fourth Month was $26,000,000 greater than a year ago.

Lord Robert's cables to the British War Office, of the 4th, tell of a victorious advance of the British forces. Besides occupying Brandfort, an important strategic point, from whence he is directing operations, the passage of the Vaal River has been carried at Windsorton, on the 7th.

The official announcement is made in London that General Roberts has crossed the Vet River and is encamped at Smaldeel Junction. The Boers are in full retreat towards Zand River and Kroonstad. The report of Winburgs occupation is confirmed, and a despatch from Warrenton says the Boers have been driven out of Fourteen Streams, and the British are encamped on the north bank of the Vaal River.

The Cleveland Leader says: "To fill the gaps made by death, sickness and other causes, and to meet the increased requirements as the British army in South Africa has grown, the Government has been obliged to send about 65,000 fresh horses and mules to Africa. The number bought has been still greater.

"It is entirely safe to say that the cost of landing these animals at Cape Town, added to the purchase price, has made them represent an investment of not less than $25,000,000. Some authorities argue that the cavalry horses sent to South Africa must have cost the British Government more than $1000 apiece, taking all expenses into account.

"This item in the war bills of the United Kingdom is a striking indication of the total expenditures necessitated already by the struggle which would never have been begun if there had been no gold mines in the Transvaal to fight over. Before the end of the war and the resumption of actual operations in the gold region, the cost of the great blunder to the British people is likely to reach $500,000,000.

"The interest on the sum, at 3 per cent., is no less than $15,000,000 a year. If the gold yield of the Transvaal should average $100,000,000 a year for the next twenty years a tax adequate to cover the interest on the treasure sunk in the Boer war would have to be fully 15 per cent. of the gross products of the mines. That sort of taxation would give the mine owners whose machinations brought on the war something worth while to grumble about.

"As for the principal of the bad investment of British money in the war, it will never be recovered by the taxes that can be collected in South Africa."

The growth of the German railway system is illustrated by the fact that the Prussian Government recently ordered 600 new locomotives and 9000 new passenger and freight cars.

Five new Italian steamships are to be built to ply between Mediterranean ports and New York.

A despatch from Bombay says cholera is alarmingly virulent among the natives on the famine relief works, where there are fifty deaths daily. Elsewhere in India millions are starving or dying of disease.

Three cases of bubonic plague and one death from the disease are reported at Saakim, Egypt.

Railroads of East and West Java have recently been united, so that one can now travel from one end of the island to the other in two days.

It is current talk in Yokohoma that 30,000 Japanese will leave their native country this summer for British Columbia; and, it is believed, that the number coming to the United States will be enormous.

Wood is very scarce in South Africa. Some time ago it was proposed to import from Western Australia blocks of eucalyptus diversicolor for paving the streets of Johannesburg, but the cost was prohibitive.

The Russian Government proposes to carry on extensive dredging operations on the Amoor River during the spring and summer.

The customs and other receipts of the Government in the Philippine Islands during the Fourth Month were $831,255. The receipts of the previous month from all sources were $679,446, a difference in favor of Fourth Month of $151,809.

A proclamation has been issued establishing local municipal government in the Philippine Islands. General Otis sailed from Manila on the 5th inst. for San Francisco.

Edwin Wildman, ex-Vice Consul of the United States at Hong Kong, declares, from private sources of information, that there exists a reign of terror in most parts of the Philippine archipelago within gunshot of our army posts.

News reached Manila, Fifth Month 3rd, of a severe reverse in Panay. An American reconnoitering party was surrounded and four were killed and sixteen left wounded on the field. Reinforcements were sent from Iloilo, and the Filipings fled to the mountains.

As a result of the American operations in the Philippines during Fourth Month, according to General Otis's report, 1721 Filipinos were killed, wounded and captured, and 30 pieces of artillery, 1200 rifles and large stores of ammunition, etc., were taken. The American losses were 13 killed and 27 wounded.

the doctrine which we, as a people, have g proclaimed, that the grace which brings tion has appeared to all men—even that Spirit of Truth of which we, as a Society, claim no monopoly. It is a mission of our religious Society to encourage all others to keep to this, to let their light shine by this, and from this to let their fruit be found. Accordingly, we may rightly be watchful to recognize any fruit of the Spirit, in churches as well as in heathen, and to approve the things that are more excellent in all.

"What then?" Through whatever channel Truth is proclaimed, "therein," as said Paul, "I do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice," "What, came the Word of God out from you, or came it unto you only?" To Him who is the Word we would continue to refer all denominations and welcome evidences thereof in all. Our grievance is, not that contemporaries can echo sentiments which we can consistently quote, but that such instances are so exceptional. If our readers appreciated how many thousands of lines in our exchanges we have to read over for one that we could admit as an extract, the jealousy that has said, "We fear some will ask, What is the use of being a Friend, if so many truths appear in other denominations?" would quickly subside. It has been a part of our concern to show to young people that the truths which we most sure believe have a recognition outside also, as of the universal Truth and Gospel for man, and are not merely sectarian as limited to our holding.

"Therefore, every scribe instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder who bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old." May our correspondent's desire for us in this respect be realized. But it is due to ourselves to say that our considerable number of extracts from without our pale has not been so much a matter of choice as of necessity. Able and lively contributions, will, we hope, reduce that necessity.

Baptism by a Material Element.

The presentation to our readers of a series of articles on baptism is concluded in our present number. To our mind, they have seemed especially terse, fresh in their mode of presentation, and the fruit of a long and careful search and reading. Points open to criticism may have escaped the notice of the writer, one of whose thoughts, in submitting his essay to the scrutiny of our readers, was, that any observations helpful to its truth or improvement might be forwarded to him for the benefit of a pamphlet edition, should one be published.

The symbol of water baptism, which is held as the most universal condition and bond of church membership and fellowship throughout Christendom, serves, in reality, as the greatest divider and separater of the churches. Disputes about baptismal regeneration, wide separations between advocates of sprinkling and immersion, ardent controversies as to infant or adult baptism, must continue to defeat the heartiness of all plans for church union, so long as it is held by the churches that Christ intended his baptism to be that of John, with water. Banish the water as a dividing sea, with other carnal ordinances as walls of division, and some beginning may be made of Christendom flocking together in the unity and baptism of the Spirit and the bond of peace. If the modern yearning (especially manifest in the late General Missionary Conference) after a union of the churches is to get much satisfaction, it must be realized above the plane of these unspiritual obstructions.

The administration of these so-called sacraments, including the mediatorship of the covenant of marriage by a pastor, requires that some man stand in the capacity of a priest. Abjure sacerdotalism as any denomination may, it adopts it when it expects a pastor to administer these rites.

The practice of water baptism, which began, a few years since, to be pushed among professing Friends in some sections, has apparently experienced a lull. The requisite machinery of pastorism not being generally developed as a system, the movement was premature. The conduits so available for the baptismal tank are now getting deliberately laid, and what guarantee do the modern leaks in principle show that the water will not be duly turned on?

The urging of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, which has been so earnestly carried on of late, might be expected to supersede all thoughts of a mere carnal baptism. But, strangely enough, the most conspicuous preachers of their doctrine of the Holy Ghost baptism have made themselves fresh inlets of water baptism upon sections professing our name, having essayed to begin in the Spirit, and later on to be made perfect by the flesh. "Strangely enough," we said, but not altogether strangely when we observe that the same literalism of texts upon which they throw themselves is at the bottom of both procedures. Accordingly we see in the signs of the times no place of assurance for the preservation of our religious Society save on its ancient foundation livingly occupied by us in the Spirit.

THE article quoted in our present number on Graduating Dress, or "the Commencement Gown," relieves us of a serious concern, which is perhaps, more effectively expressed as coming to our graduating classes through another channel. There are many burdened parents among us who try to bear up with a smiling face under the expenses which the expectations of graduating classes extort from their children. For the sake of parents who cannot afford the usual taxation, will not the rich members of the classes set a standard kindly adapted to the means of families in straitened circumstances?

Concerning the Commencement Gown.

Not very many weeks will elapse before our young girls, by the hundreds and thousands, will be going forth from high schools and colleges to "commence" life in earnest. At least this is what their carefully prepared essays—and to do them justice—their own belief, would lead us to expect.

Because these school days are now drawing to a close, in countless homes the necessary preparations for the final event are being made. The dress, shoes, gloves, flowers, are to be provided. The parents of these girls are determined that their daughters shall look as well as any other daughters have looked. To accomplish this end, every effort is put forth. The extra expense, coming on top of other expenses, seems a hard one to meet. The father, who mayhap is worried about other bills, wonders how he will be able to meet an additional one; the tired look already on his face deepens a little. If you should suggest to him that he oppose any unnecessary expenditure, he would refuse. That is a way most fathers have. They think nothing is too good for their daughters, and that a suitable setting to the winsome young face on this, which is so far the greatest occasion of her life, is only her meed. The word "suitable" to him, means whatever the girl and her mother most desire. He will cheerfully work over hours, undertake extra burdens, cut down his own expenses, in order that the suitable may be obtained.

Then what about the mother? The tired look on her face also deepens, for she has doubtless lain awake at night, wondering how a little can be saved here, a little there, in order that the graduating gown of her daughter may compare favorably with the gowns of Susie, Nellie, Sarah and the rest of the class. Poor mother! She has worn her own old worn dress till it can be neither turned nor combined with anything else. Still she will willingly, nay gladly, wear it another season in order that this graduating gown may be in perfect style. If she is perforce obliged to make it herself, how many weary hours, when she should be doing absolutely nothing, are spent in ruffling, tucking, trimming this dress for commencement.

We see the overburdened father and the wearied mother making these efforts, and we turn to pour out the vials of our wrath on the poor young graduate-to-be. We forget, looking down from the heights of wisdom that maturity is supposed to bring, that she is really not much more than a child. She has been busy with books, and probably knows but little of the struggles and burdens that may fall on her too soon. She has never thought of the extra expenses of this season, because she has been so taken up with its triumphs to be. The girl is not absolutely to blame, because she does not think until it is too late.

Neither are the parents wholly to blame for the natural pride we have just set forth. But, after all, the mother (poor, tired soul!) is the one on whom falls the burden of setting this matter right. Of course, the young girl is to be dressed in white—nothing else is thought so pretty or so suitable. Do the mothers realize all the dainty, sheer white things that cost from eighteen cents a yard up to whatever they wish to pay? The fresh, delicate beauty of the ordinary American girl needs no setting. Let the mother take the daughter into her confidence and show her the need for retrenchment. There is not a true-hearted girl anywhere who for mere show will add to her father's burdens or her mother's anxiety.

And as to looks—the cheap white looks just as pretty, the cheap lace is just as dainty. And as for the girl herself (bless her heart) the cheaper dress is every whit as becoming, and the bright face is only the brighter because those faces in the audience toward which she most proudly glances, are not careworn and wearied, but reflect her own happiness and her own triumph.—Presbyterian.

Letter of Morris Cope to a Young Friend.

LONDON GROVE, Chester Co.,
Eleventh Month 5th, 1868.

My dear young Friend—Since thou hast made thy transition from——— to ——— thou hast very often been the subject of my earnest and affectionate solicitude, not only for thy future welfare, but for thy present preservation and permanent establishment in the principles and testimonies of the unchangeable truth as professed by the religious Society of Friends. But many of which are too lightly esteemed by not a few of its professing members at the present day, who are evidently disposed to eat their own bread, and wear their own apparel (live as they list, and do as they please, evading the cross which they appear to esteem but as foolishness) yet claiming and clinging to the name of Friends, to take away their reproach.

I can therefore in justice to my own feelings and the cause of truth do no less than affectionately entreat thee carefully to guard against every species of assimilating to the manners and maxims of the world, which may be thrown in thy way, and which are esteemed by too many as being so small and trifling as not to be worthy of observance in the present enlightened state of society, and particularly in England and America. I do not thus write to discourage thy perserverance and progress in becoming master of those sciences which very laudably claim our attention, and are well calculated under proper restriction, and with the blessing of Providence to elevate and enlighten the mind of man; and not only so, but to humble him under a reverential sense of his own nothingness, and incapacity of himself to do any good thing that will procure his own happiness or redound to the glory and honor of his great and worthy name, whose we are and whom we ought to serve; as from Him al earthly as well as spiritual blessings are tifully bestowed; and who can, as in a mo (shall He see meet so to do) confound and fuse all our ideas and faculties, and compl frustrate our most sanguine desires; pl us at once in no better or more comfor condition than the Babel builders of old set about building a tower, the top of should reach the heaven.

I think I know and understand somethi what I write, by experience, having been dent at school where no pupil but myself the plain garb of a Friend, and where the only individual who confined himself t use of the plain, scriptural, grammatical guage of the singular pronoun when addre but one individual.

And I can now say without any boasting purely for thy encouragement, that I found great peace and consolation of min so doing was respected for the consisten my language with appearance, and appea with my profession, by my fellow stu And now in the evening of life, when I r and take a retrospective view of the mo of my day, and remember the tender de and merciful support of my Heavenly F in seasons of deep trial and proving; my is often made thankfully to acknowledg it was of his mercy that I was neither f ten, nor forsaken, by Him who regardeth effort of the very hindermost of the bl lambs of his flock; yes, surely, his tender is from everlasting to everlasting to thos obey and serve Him; and his righteousn children's children to those who keep his nant, and remember his commandments, them. Well, had I faltered and flinche let fall my testimony when a schoolboy or when could I have regained it? Wou dwarfishness have certainly ensued, and greenness and spiritual life I then poss been scattered to the winds?

But I was then mercifully favored t that one departure from the simplicity truth would open a door, and make w another. And now persuaded I am, that time of life, are the monitions of trut pointings and convictions of the grace which brings salvation, if so co-operated more sensibly felt than in the innocen youth, before the fierce passions of ma have ripened and gained an ascendency can hardly yield to the convicting intim of religious duty. By listening to, and ob the still small voice, not vocally heard, t distinctly understood by those who are to be instructed in the school of Chris giveth more grace.] But the opposing p will strive to arm the man of self with we which must all fail him in that solemn reckoning which awaits us individually.

So that my object in thus writing t my dear young Friend, is purely for t couragement in best things; fervently d that in all thy getting, thou may get and understanding. As we read, and I lie it, that, "the fear of the Lord, is the beg of wisdom; and to depart from iniquit is understanding."

This acquired, then a good, sound sch education, sanctified and adorned with t paration of grace, will make the man a ment to society, beneficial to mankind i neighbor and friend to the afflicted, happy himself, a comfort to his family, and stian prepared for the enjoyment of life nd of heaven and happiness hereafter, his earthly pilgrimage shall terminate. all be glad to receive a letter from thee y time. Defer not, on account of age, r withhold that which the truth may t thee to communicate.

w is it that these dissenters appear to lived better lives without the sacraments their enemies did with them? What is estimony of observation in our day. Are beatitudes which Jesus pronounced in ermon on the Mount better observed by Romanists who have seven sacraments than are by Protestants who have only two, and better observed under two sacraments than they are by the Quakers and other sects who have none. If this is the case it is strong evidence in favor of the belief that Christ ordained the sacraments, but if the reverse is found to be the case then suspicion arises that the sacraments are not Divine but human impositions which divert from the Divine. Therefore do some Christians get along quite as well or better without them. Neither the word sacrament nor any synonym thereof occurs in the New Testament nor in the writings of the fathers until the third century. There were no sacraments then as there are now, therefore no necessity for such a name. Sacrament was the pagan name for a military oath and was ruled into its present position by apostate Christians. The Ante-Nicene Fathers and Eusebius inform us that water baptism was a prolific cause of discord and division among the early Christians. It still sorrowfully distracts the loving children of our one Father. These lamentable conditions must inevitably continue until such shadows are dissolved by Divine brightness in that day which we rejoice to believe is now dawning.

CONCLUSION.

That water baptism, circumcision and many other ceremonies were ordained by God for Israel is evident from Scripture. That these ordinances were fulfilled in Christ is likewise evident. He took them out of the way and nailed them to his cross. Still they were permitted for a time unto Israel, and we do not presume to deny their permission to some even until now, for a thousand years with the Lord is as but one day. As children of the light we ever respect and regard every manifestation of that light to mankind in all ages of the world whether to Jew or to Gentile or to people unknown. We realize that there has been an increased revelation of this light, and believe as our Saviour taught that it will continue to increase as we are able to bear it, and in proportion to that increase will symbols and sacraments pass away.

How can we doubt that our Saviour with his last word here upon earth had in view his own glorious baptism of the Holy Spirit when He commanded his apostles to preach among all nations repentance and remission of sin in his name with power from on high. This power from on high was the baptism of the Holy Spirit which He had previously promised his apostles and disciples when He said: "John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit." They had to tarry at Jerusalem and be baptized with this baptism themselves before they could go teach all nations baptizing. Power from on high was the one requisite to administer this one baptism. They baptized with water before this power was fully manifest at Pentecost, and continued to baptize in the same way after Pentecost.

This power is never mentioned in connection with water baptism, but it is often connected with preaching the gospel. These same conditions continue until now. Power from on high is not yet necessary to administer water baptism. Although this power came in fulness at Pentecost, yet Paul and legions more have received this power since Pentecost.

Farrar says: "This miracle is not transient, but is continuously renewed. Not to a narrow apostolate in an upper chamber at Jerusalem. It is a vivifying wind which breathes henceforth in all ages. It revived the world. It is the power of an endless life. A tide of life which is rolling and shall roll from shore to shore until the earth is full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. In this aspect the outward symbol sinks into subordinate importance."

We think in this aspect the outward symbol sinks entirely. There are many Scripture testimonies that the apostles were instrumental in baptizing with the Holy Spirit.

To strangers scattered throughout Pontus,

1 Peter i: 1, 12 | Galatia, Asia, Cappadocia and Bythinia the gospel was preached with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven. Were not these scattered strangers of many lands

1 Peter i: 1, 12 | baptized with Holy Spirit by gospel preaching as Christ intended when He commanded his apostles to go teach all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit?

1 Thes. i: 5 | By Paul's ministry the Thessalonians received the gospel in power and in the Holy Spirit. Paul preached to the Corinthians,

MAY we not regard the position of teacher as truly in every respect a ministry for God, a real missionary work? It is to be earnestly hoped that the first requisite in the selection of teachers will be the all-important one, i. e., that of personal relationship with God. The teacher cannot guide the scholar to a fountain of which he has not tasted himself, and no amount of intellectual training will enable him to lead his pupils to the feet of Him in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. J. M. Richardson.

Concerning the Doukhobors.

Taken from the translation of letters lately received by Joseph S. Elkinton to Fifth Month 14th, 1900.

KIRILOFKA, April 15.

May the Lord bless your great work to us, your brethren in the Lord Jesus Christ. Peace and grace be unto the workers and followers of our Lord Jesus Christ, remembering the commandment of our Lord before his crucifixion. Our dear and never-to-be-forgotten friends and brethren and sisters and your small children, we greet you all with a loving heart and with best wishes for eternal happiness in the Heavenly Kingdom seeing the Lord face to face. May the Lord bless a hundredfold your great benevolence to us poor wornout strangers. Our love and thankfulness to all kind benefactors. We have received your letters and your help—133 bags of flour, 27 bushels of wheat, 7 bushels of oats, 50 bushels of potatoes, 375 pounds of wool, milk one box, garden seeds, flax, and money, 20 dollars. All this we have divided, to each soul in our village alike. For all this we heartily thank you, and may the Lord save you that you do not leave us without assistance in our need, and count us as your brethren. We pray and ask our Lord to keep you in health, and our little children with tears send up praise to the Lord. God hear our prayer and that of our children, and may He provide for your kind people in his heavenly kingdom.

Dear friends, we wish you all grace from our Lord. To all our brothers and sisters from the community of Kinlorka.

Your brother,
IVAN NIMANICHIN.

SASKATOON, SASK.

In another letter from Nimanichin he uses this language:

"You help my needs and my sickness, so it must have pleased the Lord that I should have such suffering for His name's sake. I lost all my property, and was in exile for two years, and there got cold and took severe malaria; through that I lost my health. The Spring is nearing, all the brethren are going to work, and I am still sick."

VILLAGE PETERSPESIA, April 11.

Your letter sent to us received, for which we rejoiced over and over, and thank you for all your care about us, and all those who are sufferers for the faith of our Lord.

I send you my hearty and deep greeting and wishes of all good from the Lord our God. You ask about my children who are exiled in Siberia. From my loved son, Peter Virigin, I have lately received a letter which was very dear to us, the first letter we received in Canada. He is alive, and awaiting the time when the Lord will grant them liberty, and those sons which are in Irkutsk we often received letters from. Ivan II. and Fredie W. Prokoffi and Wasyl and Gregory and all the brethren are there, but well, and tell us they are very lonesome for us, and pray the Lord that we may see one another again face to face. Our brethren and sisters send greeting and love for all kindness from you. We live in love and Christian community.

ANASTATIA VIRIGIN.

VILLAGE PETRORKA, April 15th.

I will tell you that with the money you sent us we have bought two cows for the poor of our village. May the Lord be with you. * * * * Yes, it is true, it is a very poor village, but they live in community; they have no rich. Not long since we received money from Tolstoi. That money, 60 dollars, has been divided, 40 cents each, so that if a man has six souls he has received $2.40. In like manner we have divided the flour, wool, sugar and money, only out of what you sent us we bought two cows. The 20th of March the cattle went out to graze; the 25th of March we began to plow the garden and sow wheat. The potatoes we will begin the first of May. The seeds have been divided.

I send you my best greeting,
WASYL HASILEUKOFF.

It may also be stated that an account has been received of a distribution of condensed milk in village Kirilofka. No. 1, 66 tins; No. 2, 39 tins; No. 3, 39 tins.

The following is taken from a Canada paper under date of Ottawa, May 7:

In the House of Commons James Sutherland said that the Government had taken measures to prevent Doukhobor immigrants leaving Canada and going to California. As soon as the report reached Ottawa that an agitation was being promoted against Doukhobors to induce them to move to California, communication was had with the gentlemen interested in bringing them out here, and the department was advised that each of these persons and Count Tolstoi, with whom the authorities communicated, write strong letters to the Doukhobors urging them on no consideration to leave the Northwest, as they felt certain that they would achieve greater success than in the United States, and the Interior Department officials interviewed those likely to move, and persuaded them to stay.

The Doukhobor Committee having only a partial load of goods on hand for that people, would inform Friends that it is their purpose to send off a car about the first of Sixth Month, and any who have further contributions for them will please send forward as early as possible. Two members of the committee are expecting to visit the Doukhobors about the middle of next month, and will give attention to the distribution of such articles as Friends may desire to send.

Siberian Exile.

The abolition of transportation and exile to Siberia in the great majority of cases in which that punishment has been inflicted heretofore is provided for in a bill just passed by the Russian Council. Exile without a fair judicial trial is also abolished. The reform has been in contemplation by the Russian Government for a long time, but the opening of Siberia to the settlement of free colonists by the construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway has hastened the action of the Council. On May 18, 1899, the day upon which the Hague Peace Conference opened in pursuance of the Czar's initiative, that ruler appointed a Commission to consider the abolition of the system transporting convicts to Siberia, to sugg other forms of trial and punishment for offe ers, and to report a plan for the improvem of the lot of persons who are in exile in Si ria at this time.

The amelioration of the Russian exile tem is due to a number of causes acting gether. The changed conditions in Sibe which makes it desirable to remove the stig which attaches to a penal settlement; the p sure of public opinion outside of Russia, spired by the writings of George Kennan other travelers; the manifest injustice of flicting punishment for crime by proce more or less arbitrary and barbaric, and do less the pacific and liberal disposition of present Czar, unless he is a consummate a and a monster of insincerity, have had m to do with hastening the reform of an od institution.

The ruler who "for humanity's sake" i ated The Hague Conference movement c not be oblivious and indifferent to the horro the Russian penal system, and could not c to be a consistent humanitarian if he did bring his limitless power to bear for the form about to be instituted. It is a g stride in the progress of the country. If so the mission o Czar, who seems to be a monarch who wi to deserve the good will and loyalty of subjects, will not end with the improveme the Russian penal establishment.

ncident in point, related by one I was ace being at our house on business, we were h surprised—knowing him to be a profane, odly man—at the emotions he manifested he sight of some nasturtiums blooming the door. He said that he had seen none

e leaving his mother's home in London.
had brought her and her long-forgotten
y counsels to mind, and he was much over-
e. Some converse, with my wife, mainly, lted in an invitation to visit and take sup-with him. In the course of conversation gave us some account of his early life; aid his father was an infidel, his mother a s woman, who made it her practice to ier her children about her and have some gious exercise ere they went to rest. That ie father came in while they were thus ened he would catch up the boys and say she ht do as she pleased with the girls, but the s should be taught no such nonsense.
he father soon lost his life through intemance, and under his mother's good influence son grew up a thoughtful lad and was ened as a tract distributor; and he told us of persecutions he had undergone in that employment. Coming to America he fell into temptation, and finally became an exceedingly wicked man and exceptionally profane. Afflicted with a sunstroke, he lay some hours unconscious, and the daughter of a worthy friend who lived next door (in the village of Chesterfield, Ohio), and who was in attendance, remarked on his countenance a look of anguish and distress, such as she thought no bodily suffering could produce, and on his recovery he was asked what had caused this look. And this is what he told. I had heard some hint of the matter, and at my request he rehearsed it. He said he found himself in a place which he described as dark and dreadful in the extreme, yet he could distinguish objects, and saw something coming towards him having the appearance of an old man, that he felt an indescribable dread, and shrinking away said, "Who are you—who are you?" "I am the devil." "Why, where am I? how did I get here? where am I?" "You are dead, and are now in hell, and will have to stay here forever; follow me." He said an irresistible impulse drew him along against his will, and now they were going to find the place for him to stay. They soon came to where a company of men were drinking, passing their cups in silence, but with a look of horror on each countenance fearful to behold. Pointing, "Will you go among those?" "No, I do not drink. I will not go among them." Among his evil habits drunkenness was not included. "Follow me," was reiterated. The next company were engaged in gambling, and so they came to (I think) two others, though what they were doing I cannot distinctly remember, still, as there was with all the same look of indescribable anguish he found some excuse, and refused to go when questioned. At length they came where some were trying horses, racing them back and forth. "Will you go among those?" (It should be noted here that the man's occupation was horse-trading,) "No, I do not like the place. Isn't there another place I can go to?" "Yes, there is another place, but I know you won't want to go there." "Then I'll stay here with these;" and so he was left, but he said there was something so awful that, after a time, seeing the old man again, he eagerly made up to him to go and beg for release. "Do let me go, for I can't stay here." "But you must stay here." "Do let me go; I can't stay here." And he pleaded until it was said, "If you will promise me that you will come back sometime I will let you go." He said, "I had no intention of keeping my promise, but was so desirous to get away I was ready to promise anything." On pronouncing the words "I will come back," he found himself restored to consciousness. To show the impression made, he said to me, "It is now three years since this occurred, and that scene is as plain before me as if just now taking place." The man had given up his profanity and was in some ways much reformed, yet he still followed his horse-trading. Those called Methodists had gotten hold of this account, and tried to get him to join with them, but he said, "No, I have no other way of making a living for my family, and I cannot trade horses and be honest, and I won't make a profession without I can live up to it." This was well, so far as it went. He was now become quite a respectable-appearing man, and we naturally were much interested in him. Leaving Ohio soon after, my wife in writing to her friends always made inquiry concerning him. At length, after about three years had passed, came this word: "Don't send any more messages to ——, for he has become so disreputable a character we can have no further intercourse with him." When last in Ohio I found he had left that part of the country, so I could obtain no information concerning him. Yet that he will eventually fulfill his promise appears likely, for so remarkable a warning being unheeded, another is not to be looked for.

To make this matter more impressive, if that were possible, he told me of an experience of a companion and fellow-workman of his who, finding himself—in a dream—in the place of punishment, was released upon promise to return in a year. C's mother, being interested for the young man, induced him to attend the ministrations of the noted Charles Spurgeon, and a great reformation followed, lasting about six months, when, unhappily, old habits and associations were permitted to prevail. C. said they were together on a ladder carrying brick, when as his companion was about stepping on to the scaffold he lost his balance and fell, which caused instant death, and that it proved a year to that day since his dream.

There was much of what is called free-thinking in the otherwise moral town of Chesterfield, and some holding those views tried to get C. drawn in among them, but he told them, "No, I have seen too much ever to doubt a Divine Power." Among the incidents which he related, one was that being sent by his father to a public house for his drink, he there heard a man asserting something, and then wishing he might be struck dumb—using the sacred name—if what he said was not true. This made me shudder, and I ran quickly home. This man was taken at his word, and never spoke again, and my mother told me of having, when a girl, often seen an old man led by a dog with a string, having lost his sight by reason of a similar imprecation.

If it be thought that I have dilated too much on this subject, my excuse is that it is not only remarkable in itself, but to me of exceeding interest.

One of George Dillwyn's discourses has been so instructive to me through life, that I will here give it in nearly his own words—he never said much at a time:

"When I was a young man I wrote a little book, and in it I put a little verse, which contains the sum of the practical truth needed by man:

"'Do thy best,
And leave the rest.'"

The solemnity and emphasis with which it was delivered made a deep impression, and the latter part of it, to "Leave the rest" to the Good Father, after we have "Done the best we could," has been a strength and encouragement through my life since.—Benjamin Hallowell

Silent Waiting Upon God.

BY THOMAS COLLEY*

When we contemplate the glorious attributes of the Most High, his wisdom, power and goodness, and the dependent state of man, we are led to believe that Divine worship is an essential part of man's duty to him, as from a reasonable creature to a merciful and bountiful Creator; and that he hath an undoubted right to adoration and obedience from such dependent beings, agreeably with the command: "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve" (Matt. iv: 10).

This is acknowledged by Christians of all denominations who believed it right to assemble at stated times for the purpose of worship; although they differ widely as to the manner of it. It is not my intention in this essay to examine the different modes of worship practised in the world, but to point out the advantage that may be derived from true silence, and how necessary it is for receiving a just sense of our particular states and duties, as also its consistency with the gospel dispensation.

A congregation of people sitting down in silence, and sometimes continuing so throughout the meeting, hath been matter of wonder to many, and the subject of various conjectures and remarks. Some have concluded that all the time so spent hath been lost, and that no edification was to be received from it. Others have exclaimed, What does these people mean? and then have endeavored to account for it by supposing that because there are divers things among other professions which we cannot reconcile or unite with, so we have chosen this form as distinguishable from them. Silence in worship is in itself very simple, and there is something in it little understood and much despised by most professors of religion. If upon investigation it has no ground to support it, let it be done away with; but if, on the other hand, it has sufficient foundation both in Scripture and reason, then let mankind embrace it, and receive all the benefit resulting from it. There is this advantage in true silence, that the enemy cannot counterfeit it; there is no exercise whatever where self is more shut out.

The silence which we are engaged to promote both by example and precept, is not merely a cessation from words, or a settling into outward stillness, for that may be acquired by habit, and the mind still left at large, ranging among created objects, a stranger to the true object of worship, and to that rest which is prepared for the Lord's people. It is a silence of the mind wherein living faith (Heb. xi: 6) is essentially necessary; the awfulness and benefit of which state are better felt than described.

Here the soul is prepared to worship in newness of life; from which must come anything that is rightly spoken, either in the way of preaching, prayer, or praise, or it cannot reach the state of a congregation; because when such as are in this state maintain the watch, and abide under the influence and power of the Spirit, they become co-workers therewith; and their spirits are baptized into a sympathy with the state one of another; and the Spirit of Truth, which is the principal object in their view, being lively and powerful, arises and spreads from vessel to vessel, until it frequently becomes to these as a flood bearing down all opposition.

That work under the gospel is a spiritual exercise, adapted to a spiritual dispensation, appears evident from the concurring testimonies of the sacred writings; and is the substance of that ceremonial worship figured forth and practised under the law, but contradistinguished from it, and set forth as far excelling it both in nature and degree.

After our Lord's ascension to that glory which He had with the Father before the world was, He condescended to declare, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come into him, and will sup with him, and he with me" (Rev. iii: 20). Now, as this visitation is in spirit unto the heart or soul of man, can any thing be more consistent with the nature of things than to sit down in awful silence; having the attention of the mind steadily fixed on that which visiteth; waiting in faith for the springing up of divine life in the soul, according to this promise, "I will come in." As man happily experiences this, he can sit under his own vine, and under his own fig tree, where none can make him afraid.

When our Lord conversed with the woman of Samaria, she appeared desirous of knowing the true place of worship, saying, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship: Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father: ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship:" "but the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth" (John iv; 20-24). This passage points out, in the first place, the necessity of knowing the object of our worship; and secondly, that He must be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

The apostle said to the Philippians, "We are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh" (Phil. iii: 3). They were therefore come to the substance of the former shadowy dispensation. It is not consistent with the nature of things for one shadow to point out another, but always the substance: hence it is said; "We are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit:" not retaining any of the old rituals, or having any confidence in the flesh. Then doth it not appear most consistent with the dignity of the gospel, and the solemnity with which divine worship ought to be performed, to sit down in awful silence, and wait to feel the mind divinely influenced? when if any pray, it will be with the spirit, and with the understanding also: for, if in the primitive church, men so highly dignified as they were with the gifts of the Holy Spirit, knew not what to pray for as they ought, but as the Spirit helped their infirmities, with groanings which could not be uttered (Rom. viii: 26); then let it not seem strange that we should also be unable to pray without spiritual assistance.

Assembling together for the purpose of divine worship embraceth three principal objects; first, the testifying of our duty to, dependence upon our great and generous Be factor, in whom we live and move and h our being: secondly, the renewing of our s itual strength in him; and thirdly, the edifi tion one of another. These objects ou always to be in view in all our religious me ings; and first—Our duty as finite creatu to a merciful and bountiful Benefactor. we contemplate the greatness and majesty Him who formed and upholdeth all thin who is King of kings, and Lord of lords; w only hath immorality, dwelling in the li which no man can approach unto; who dw eth in the high and holy place, and inhabit eternity; of whom the prophet said, "Bef the mountains were brought forth, or e thou hadst formed the earth and the wo even from everlasting to everlasting thou God" (Psalm xc: 2); under such a sense of supreme Majesty, who is glorious in holine and fearful in praises, the profoundest ado tion and worship are called for, and we lieve are witnessed in solemn silence. Bu it to be noted, the work of faith is opposed the power of darkness (Eph. vi: 12), and thou it may sustain close conflicts, set forth by " fiery trial;" yet as it continues to be exerci in the power of God, it will obtain the victo and that saying of Christ will be explain viz., "If ye have faith as a grain of musta seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Be th removed, and it shall be done" (Matt. xvii: xxi: 21). This brings to the second thing to considered, namely, the renewing of strength in the Lord.

When our Lord was reasoning with the J on the subject of his divinity, and of that vine life which He came to restore and ra up in the soul of man; in order to turn th views to Him the source of life, He said, " bor not for the meat which perisheth, but that meat which endureth unto everlast life; which the Son of Man shall give u you, for him hath God the Father seal "The bread of God is he which cometh d from heaven, and giveth life unto the wor Again, "I am the bread of life; he that com to me shall never hunger; and he that bel eth on me shall never thirst" (John vi: 27, 35). From all which we infer, that it is his vine nature or spirit that He is calling them agreeably to his own saying, "The words t I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they life" (Ib. vers. 63). Is it not then evident silently waiting for the drawing influence the Father's love to bring the soul to Chri highly profitable, if not indispensably ne sary? especially if we consider what Ch hath said, "No man can come to me, ex the Father which hath sent me draw h (John 6: 44). Again, "I am the living br which came down from heaven; if any eat of this bread he shall live forever: and bread that I will give is my flesh, which I give for the life of the world." "Whoso eth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath nal life;" "for my flesh is meat indeed, and blood is drink indeed. He that eateth flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in and I in him. As the living Father hath me, and I live by the Father, so he that ea me, even he shall live by me" (Ib. ver. 54-57). As this evidently pointeth out Di

Attempts to ich upon that have been, and would be, seri- resented by young as well as older members. have learned to want nothing better than the truth as originally professed by Friends. The feeling of general unity in principle, and of mutual condescension in love throughout the two meetings, Woodland and Rich Square, was comforting. Where so many young parents are already blessed with considerable, and in some instances with large families, and celibacy is not enforced by artificial standards of living, the prospect of the meetings' declining in numbers is naturally far out of sight. Whether in education or in character, the influence of Friends as Friends is widely marked throughout the region. We trust a succession of standard bearers may not be lost, through loss of individual gifts in a too exclusive leaning on the gifts of present standard bearers.

Notes from Others.

Dr. Brooks of Chicago stated that "in Chicago alone there are two hundred thousand Poles with nothing to read in their native language but anarchistic tracts."

Christ declared Peter a happy man, not because he was the rock himself, but because God the Father had revealed this truth to him, which flesh and blood, that is, unaided reason, could never discover.

The first important act of the Methodist General Conference at Chicago, which began its session there the latter part of last week, was a unanimous vote giving equal representation in the general conferences to laymen with the clergymen. This was a victory in a contest which had been waged for more than a hundred years.

In the seventy-fifth annual meeting of the American Tract Society, the president, reviewing the year's work, said no society exists which has done so much to distribute literature through the world. A summary of work of the year showed the literature of the society had been translated into 153 languages and dialects; 49 permanent publications were added to the list; the aggregate number of the seven periodicals issued by the Society during the year was 2,099,300. The aggregate amount of gratuitous distributions during the year has been to the value of $16,385.54, and 63,386 family visits were made, and 39,319 volumes sold or given away.

According to George Bird Grinnell's book on "The Indians of To-day," there are on this continent nearly 400,000 Indians. For 267,000 of these the United States is responsible. The Indians of this continent are divided among 59 families, which are differentiated by their language stocks, and among them there are 800 tribes. Some of these families are extinct, and others nearly so. Two-thirds of those now in existence are confined to the Pacific slope. The Algonquins, with whom the Pilgrim fathers fought, are the most important family. There are 100,000 survivors of these, but most of them live in Canada. There are 40,000 Eskimo, rapidly diminishing on account of disease and the use of liquor.

AN AGNOSTIC DISQUALIFIED AS A WITNESS.—In a Philadelphia Court Magistrate Eisenbrown recently gave an opinion confirming an objection that had been raised against the legal competency of Professor F—— as a witness. The magistrate said: "The principal witness offered by the prosecution was Prof. F——, who admitted that he did not believe in a God. As an officer of justice I am mindful of the fact that Christianity is a part of the common law doctrine in Pennsylvania. With propriety therefore, I can never admit in my court, humble though it be, the evidence of any man who does not believe in a God, especially when he asks that a defendant shall be committed to imprisonment. The testimony of Prof. F—— cannot be deemed as of valid force."

THE COST OF WAR.—The United States Ordnance Bureau has figured up what it cost the government to get rid of Cervera's fleet at Santiago and Montojo's as Manila.

It took 7,000 projectiles to bring Cervera to terms, and Dewey's fleet used up nearly 6,000 before Manila. Dewey's ammunition cost about $45,000, and Sampson's about $100,000, the guns in the latter case being larger. The Spanish-American war has been the cheapest on record.

The Civil War cost the federal government over $3,500,000,000; our Revolution cost Great Britain $600,000,000; England's war with France, which culminated at Waterloo, used up over $4,000,000,000; the Napoleonic wars of France cost $1,250,000,000, and the Franco-Prussian war cost France $1,600,000,000. During the last three hundred years it is computed that Great Britain has spent the respectable sum of $6,500,000,000 in her various troubles with other countries; and this without reckoning in the cost of the war with the Boers.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A statement of the gross receipts at fifty of the principal post offices for Fourth Month of this year, as compared with a similar period of 1899, shows an increase of $255,655. The increase at Philadelphia was $43,011.

The books of Charles J. W. Neely, treasurer of the Cuban Post Office Department, show a shortage of $75,000. It is suspected that $400,000 worth of surcharge stamps entrusted to Neely to be destroyed were issued in part and the money added to his private account. If this was done, it is strange that the fraud was not noticed, for the discarded stamps were entirely different from the new ones substituted. Neely is in the United States, but his arrest and deportation to Cuba is expected. An investigation into the Post Office Department is in progress and many of the officials are implicated in the robbery.

The published statements of the War Department show that Captain E. F. Ladd, Treasurer of the island, paid to E. G. Rathbone, Director General up to Twelfth Month 31, 1899, between $218,022 and $420,028, when the Post Office Department had no knowledge that a deficit existed.

During the last ten months the exports of merchandise from the United States exceeded the imports by $450,495,141.

The Supreme Court has decided the inheritance tax provision of the War Revenue act to be constitutional, and ruled that it applied to legacies only.

The Populist National Convention, at Sioux Falls, nominated William Jennings Bryan for President and Charles A. Towne for Vice President.

The Middle-of-the-road (anti-fusion) faction of the People's party, in National Convention at Cincinnati, nominated Wharton Barker, of Philadelphia, for President, and Ignatius Donnelly, of St. Paul, for Vice President.

In the poll of New York Presbyterian ministers taken by a New York paper over 60 per cent. favored a revision of the creed, and about 13 per cent. were non-committal.

According to Salt Lake City figures, the number of Mormons now in existence is 360,000.

While the production has increased with great rapidity in other countries, in none has the copper industry developed so rapidly as in the United States.

New gold fields rivaling in richness the deposits of Cape Nome will be opened to American miners, if the expectations of the members of the Russian expedition, which arrived in New York on the 12th inst., on the Campania, on its way to Northeastern Siberia, are fulfilled.

Hooley, the English promoter, has nothing to do with the plan. George D. Roberts, who is a veteran California miner, will be a member of the exploring party. Roberts has made a study of gold deposits in sea sand and has a plan for extracting the gold from the frozen tundra. The expedition will sail from San Francisco about Sixth Month 1st, after the Russians have conferred with the Russian Minister at Washington. It will return about Eleventh Month 1st, and expects then to be able to make a complete report of the possibilities of the region.

Roberts says that from information which he had received the deposit of gold in the Siberian coast promises to be the most valuable ever discovered.

Miners who have visited the Siberian coast by stealth have reported that it is practically the same as the Nome coast, consisting of a strip of beach, behind which lies a tundra or belt of gold bearing sand, which has been thrown up by the action of the waves and frozen.

"I should judge that the gold output from Cape Nome alone, this season, will be at least $50,000,000," says P. N. Walkely, of Seattle, Wash.

At the Washington Park fishery on the Delaware below Philadelphia, 12,000 shad were taken on the 14th inst., in six hauls.

The most disastrous fire in the history of Camden occurred on First-day afternoon in the central section of the city, and before the flames were under control property variously estimated in value at from $150,000 to $175,000 was in ashes or damaged so badly as to be valueless, and about twenty-five families were rendered homeless.

There were 494 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 23 less than the previous week and 67 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 260 were males and 234 females; 69 died of pneumonia; 56 of consumption; 35 of heart diseases; 25 of inflammation of the brain; 23 of measles; 18 of diphtheria; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of convulsions; 15 of typhoid fever; 14 of old age; 12 of inanition; 12 of marasmus; 10 of nephritis; 9 of debility; 9 from casualties, and 8 of Bright's disease.

FOREIGN—At a meeting of the Primrose League, held on the 9th inst., Premier Salisbury said: "Mr. Gladstone, in an evil moment, for the fame of the country and for his party, attached himself to the idea of the separation of England and Ireland. It is unnecessary to say that the legacy to the Primrose League had also failed. There has been a long struggle, but no one can say the Home Rule cause presents any elements of sanguine anticipation for the future. It might be said that the Irish idea would realize and that Mr. Gladstone's aspirations would be fulfilled. But, I do not believe that the causes which have once been well beaten have reappeared to any purpose in English history. Apart, however, from the fate of the former struggles, I am still assured that there is no hope of the predominant partner ever consenting to give Ireland practical independence. We have learned something from the South African war; how a disloyal Government, in spite of warnings, could accumulate armaments against the most powerful combatant, and thus secure a terrible advantage. We now know better than we did ten years ago what a risk it would be if we gave a disloyal Government in Ireland the power of accumulating forces against this country. Mr. Gladstone shattered his own party, so that for the moment they are erased and a powerless factor in English politics. But it must not be imagined that the effacement is likely to be permanent. Hereafter external affairs will occupy a considerably larger place among the problems we have to solve. Not necessarily because in themselves they are more important, but if we look around we can see the elements and causes of menace and peril slowly accumulating, and they may accumulate to such a point as to require our earnest and most active efforts to repel them."

The following despatch came from London on the 13th inst: The occupation of Kroonstad practically places the whole Orange Free State in British possession. It is evident from Lord Robert's despatch that the disintegration has commenced. The Free Staters are scattering to their homes, while the Transvaalers have gone northward, declining to fight longer in the Orange Free State. What little resistance the former are still likely to make seems to be centring at Lindley, whither President Steyn has transferred his government."

The abolition of transportation and exile to Siberia in the great majority of cases in which that punishment has been inflicted heretofore is provided for in a bill just passed by the Russian Council. Exile without a fair judicial trial is also abolished. The reform has been in contemplation by the Russian Government for a long time, but the opening of Siberia to the settlement of free colonists by the construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway has hastened the action of the Council. On Fifth Month 18th, 1899, the day upon which The Hague Peace Conference opened in pursuance of the Czar's initiative, that ruler appointed a Commission to consider the abolition of the system of transporting convicts to Siberia, to suggest other forms of trial and punishment for offenders, and to report a plan for the improvement of the lot of persons who are in exile in Siberia at this time.

The transformation of Russian institutions is not attainable immediately. Officialdom is there slowly influenced by public opinion, if indeed public opinion can be said to exist in Russia. It has no voice through the press. Everything depends upon the enlightenment, clear sightedness and moderation of the ruling monarch. The construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway is the conception of a farsighted ruler. He thereby makes a pathway through a vast, inaccessible portion of his realm for the world's commerce, and for the entrance of the shrewd, observing and inquisitive travellers who follow the beaten roads of trade. This railway will probably, more than all else, the betterment of Siberia, its convicts and its free colonists, and for the removal of Russian penal abuses than all that has been written about these matters. It is fortunate for Russia that she is ruled by a sovereign who responds to the logic of events.

ere the Friends' principle of worship oband verbal language is not an essential factor in it, but spirit and truth is, so that we receive our worship spiritually from the "Head of all things to the Church" himself, then the substitution of reading matter is likely to be felt as a violence to the spirit of the occasion. But where the nature of true public worship is so misunderstood that the congregation served is trained to expect the incessant use of language, we cannot wonder at the caution quoted.

Whereas the living solemnity of a living worship, silent or vocal, will drive out from any not callous or unconcerned the thought of reading, yet some of us have seen this standard so cheapened by the abolition of reverent silence in the "reformed" Friend's meetings, as to cheapen the behavior, not only of the youth, but also those in the seats of ministers in large gatherings who, even during appearances of colleagues in vocal supplication, would be turning over the leaves of books, or, while whispering to others, shaking with something more than a smile. Thus reformed, worship is truly deformed; and what has any portion of our religious Society inwardly gained by its loss of a waiting worship with its waiting ministry? Numbers indeed!—but to quote an obsolete query, "Has there been any growth in the Truth among you?"

But though the visible readers would feel more out of place in a true Friends' meeting than in the reading-and-speaking meetings of others, yet are there not many non-worshippers sitting among us, who are often engaged in a secret reading—even of fiction? For what are the rovings and constructions of the imagination in our seasons for devotion, but works of fiction? And then if we will let the thoughts of other interests come trooping in, we change the meeting into a library, to read at random of our business, of our relations with neighbors, of our injuries, our ambitions, our likes and dislikes,—and so we drift down, robbing God of his time and ourselves of his grace and intercourse.

Our favorite habit of thought out of meeting will be our favorite in meeting; and blessed are they to whom Christ their Saviour is become an habitual order of thought, their Book and Word of Life, in whom they read words of eternal life as they are able to bear them; in whom also there is hope that they shall themselves be found written when their individual books and accounts shall be opened. Where our treasure is there will our hearts be also; and there seems no opportunity like a Friends' meeting to expose to our consciousness where our treasure really is,—to open up our secret sins in the light of a Saviour's countenance, so that by living repentance and faith in Him who in so great love is revealed as having tasted the wages of sin for us, we may be brought to own Him as our chief Treasure, whose worship and communion is not merely a duty, but an attraction and a privilege.

The place where the true learner may "seek out of the book of the Lord and read" is well indicated in the following tract by A. B. Simpson, which reached us by mail as the writing of the preceding paragraph was finished. It is entitled "The Power of Stillness:"

"A score of years ago a friend placed in my hand a little book which became one of the turning points in my life. It was 'True Peace.' It was an old mediæval message, and it had but one thought, and it was this, that God was waiting in the depth of my being to talk with me if I would only get still enough to hear Him.

"I thought that this would be a very easy matter, so I began to get still. But I had no sooner commenced than a perfect pandemonium of voices reached my ears, a thousand clamoring notes from within and without, until I could hear nothing but their noise and din. Some of them were my own questions, some of them my own cares, some of them my own prayers. Others were the suggestions of the tempter and the voices of the world's turmoil. Never before did there seem so many things to be done, to be said, to be thought; and in every direction I was pulled and pushed and greeted with noisy acclamations and unspeakable unrest. It seemed necessary for me to listen to some of them, but God said, 'Be still, and know that I am God.' Then came the conflict of thoughts for the morrow, and its duties and cares; but God said, 'Be Still.'

"And as I listened, and slowly learned to obey, and shut my ears to every sound, I found that after a while when the voices ceased, or I ceased to hear them, there was a still, small voice in the depth of my spirit. As I listened it became to me the power of prayer, and the voice of wisdom, and the call of duty, and I did not need to think so hard, or pray so hard, or trust so hard, but that still, small voice of the Holy Spirit in my heart was God's prayer in my secret soul, and God's answer to all my questions."

THE President and Fellows of Harvard College have asked the community to provide seventy thousand dollars to cover the cost of taking care of one thousand four hundred and fifty Cuban teachers, selected from all parts of the island, to attend a Summer School for their instruction at Harvard University. The United States Government provides the necessary transports for the voyage to Boston and the return from New York to Cuba. The University has made itself responsible not only for their instruction, but also for their board and lodging, and gives the labor of many of its own officers and servants. Instruction in English will be given, and in natural history by means of lectures in Spanish illustrated by the stereopticon, and by excursions to various localities; also in American history, in botany, and in such aspects of American life as can be seen in visits to industrial establishments, to good types of school buildings, to Niagara Falls, Chicago, Washington and New York, including opportunities of seeing our homes and modes of life. Major General Wood has said, "In no better way can the people of the United States show an interest in the building up of Cuba." We might say, the motive of such a movement may belong to "the more excellent way."

A Concern for Friends.

It was not enough that we should have made some provision for the needy out of our abundance, or that we should have fed the hungry, or clothed the naked, the command was to "Love thy neighbor as thyself." And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not "charity," it profiteth me nothing. And again, "Take heed that ye do not your alms before men," etc. Plain as the teaching has been, we have substituted mere almsgiving for the "charity which edifieth," and the wrong must be righted.

This has brought about a reaction, which has taken form in the movement to place under the jurisdiction and control of the States all charitable organizations, with a view to their further usefulness and a fuller comprehension of the purpose for which they exist. Friends should not only make a protest against this movement, but should be willing to be made use of now as in the early days of the founding of our State in taking hold of all which concerns the spiritual welfare of the community, and clearing away abuses which have come through holding to the letter, rather than the spirit, and ignoring the simplest truths of Christ's teaching, which cannot be more plainly exemplified than by following the principles of the Society of Friends in carrying out the Divine command involved in the wondrous tie of human brotherhood.

MARY H. GRUBB.

Fifth Month 7th, 1900.

A DIVINE OVERRULING.—In 1839 Lieutenant Gedney, of the U. S. N. (says Words of Cheer), seized a suspicious looking schooner by the name of Amistad. On board he found about forty Africans, and two Spaniards, one of whom claimed to be the owner of the negroes. These Africans were put in a jail in New Haven, while the case was brought before the United States Court. During the progress of the necessary legal proceedings these poor slaves were taught the first principles of religion. In the meantime the case attracted great attention. The venerable John Quincy Adams was employed as senior counsel. He appeared in the Supreme Court at Washington, for the first time in thirty years, to plead in behalf of these poor and helpless strangers. The occasion was one of profound interest, and the "old man eloquent," as he was called," was equal to the emergency. The captives were set free. Adams communicated the result in the following words:

"WASHINGTON, March 9th, 1841.

"The captives are free! They are to be discharged from the custody of the marshal, free.

"'Not unto us, not unto us,' etc. But thanks, thanks! in the name of humanity and of justice to you. J. Q. ADAMS."

These released Africans were in due time taken back to their own country, and instead of captives became missionaries of the Lord Jesus. Thus was commenced the Mendi mission, one of the most important on the west coast of Africa.

Silent Waiting Upon God.

However this may have been neglected or overlooked, it remains to be the transcendent glory of the gospel dispensation: this is the object we have in view, and to which we desire to attain in all our approaches to God, both in private retirement or with our families, and in the congregation for public worship; and we have not found a more excellent way than to sit in silence and endeavor to come to Christ; to feel access opened to him through the power of an operative faith: which being "the substance of things hoped for" "and the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi: 1), we may hereby participate in those treasures which neither ear hath heard nor heart conceived: but, blessed be the name of the God of truth! he revealeth them by his Spirit to the attentive, waiting soul. And though there may not be a word spoken outwardly, such will not be disappointed; their dependence not being on man but on the Lord, they are admitted to that supper promised by Christ to such as hear his voice and open to Him the door, that He will sup with them and they with Him. He will receive of their obedience, and dedication of heart, as sweet incense, while their souls are feeding, in the silence of all flesh, on that Divine nourishment which He has prepared for them: and thus by waiting upon the Lord they renew their strength" (Isa. xl: 31).

Thirdly, it is in this strength that true edification is administered. I shall be short on this head, as the subject has been largely and ably handled by Robert Barclay in his Apology for the true Christian Divinity (Proposition on Worship), to which I refer; but I shall just mention a passage or two shewing in what light the apostle Paul viewed the subject, and see if our practice does not coincide therewith.

He ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men" (Eph. iv: 8). These gifts were to be employed for this excellent purpose; "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry," and "for the edifying of the body of Christ: till we all come, in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man" (Ib. iv: 12, 13): but how these gifts are applied, he explains more particularly a little further on, where he is shewing the connection that subsists between Christ and church, and the dependent state in which church is placed; where Christ is represe as the head, from whom the whole body, ing nourishment ministered, being "compa by that which every joint supplieth, acc ing to the effectual working in the measur every part, maketh increase of the body, the edifying of itself in love" (Eph. iv: Now this appears evident, that if what e joint supplieth must be according to the ef ual working in the measure in them, there be no inconsistency in silently waiting fo evidence of the measure being renewed in hearts, that thereby they might become workers with it.

Although it is comfortable and edifyin sit under a ministry which hath its sup from the gift of Christ, yet the edificatio a religious meeting does not altogether de on outward means, as preaching, etc., for v ever tends to increase the weight and s nity of a meeting contributes to its edifica Now, as individuals are gathered to their p exercise, and attend to the effectual wo in the measure in themselves, an increa experienced, and as the Spirit of Christ i in all, baptizing the different members in joint travail and sympathy one with an another, as that exercise is maintained spring of life is not only opened in indivi but spreads from vessel to vessel. Thu increase is witnessed, and the body is e in love.

The manifestation of Christ in the heart not only a quickening property (Eph. ii: 6), whereby a Divine life is raised in the and nourishment ministered, by which the may be sustained, but He is made un "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanct tion, and redemption" (1 Cor. i: 30). withstanding all the advantages which we receive from without, either from the s writings, from testimonies of those engag the ministry, the writings and experienc other men, or the faculty of reason in selves; yet there occur many cases, wh we are entirely dependent on a higher p ple, for wisdom to direct. I will just ins one, which will shew that others may be same circumstance; that is, with regard ministry. What source of information is short of divine intelligence inwardly con to the mind by Christ, that is sufficient t isfy one man, that it is his duty to preac gospel, and woe unto him, if he preach i and at the same time doth permit anoth be silent, without incurring that woe? other part of that excellent descriptio equally important, that is, "righteousnes sanctification, and redemption:" it is as comes to be raised and formed in us, and ted unto him by faith, that he become Lord our righteousness; and we are acc in him the beloved; so also he is our sa cation; he is the cause producing the e The term includes the idea of cleansin the process is gradual, adapted to the d of impurity imbibed through unbelief a obedience. "There are diversities of tions, but it is the same God which w all in all" (1 Cor. xii: 6). The whole is prised in this passage, "He shall baptiz with the Holy "Ghost, and with fire" iii: 11). The diversity of operations is ed by different similitudes, as "The wash- of water by the word" (Eph. v: 26); in rs, the day burning "as an oven" (Mal. iv: nd "a refiner's fire" and "fuller's soap" l. iii: 2): in all, he is the great operator; as our attention is fixed on him in true gnation, and we in humble confidence wait he renewings of the Holy Spirit in our s, whereby the work is carried on, our ts become purified through faith. Thus likewise our Redeemer, our Saviour, our verer, and Protector: so long as we remain tabernacle of flesh, and in a militant state, ng we shall need his preserving power; for just shall live by faith" (Gal. iii: 2).

om what has been said, I think it must ar evident to every candid enquirer after n, that, for receiving Christ in those in- ant offices, and which cannot be obtained hrough the medium of living faith, there way wherein we can be engaged, so much ted to the attaining of this great end, as silent exercise of mind.

me perhaps may say, If there is so much ntage derived from this silent exercise, comes it to pass that none have found it es you? is it not somewhat extraordinary, the scriptures do not recommend the tice? on which I shall make a few obser- ns. There are many passages which I evidently favor the practice; I will there- just mention a few—The first and great nandment was ushered in with, "Hear, O l" (Mark xii: 29); this was the first to be attended to: here their attention be fixed, that they might with more cer- y receive the subsequent command. When lost High was expostulating with the peo- y his servant the prophet, on the unprofit- ess of their outward worship, while they ined strangers to that which is inward and tual, he said, "Wherefore do ye spend ey for that which is not bread? and your for that which satisfieth not?" and then calls their attention to himself, saying, rken diligently unto me; incline your ear, come unto me; hear and your soul shall and I will make an everlasting covenant you, even the sure mercies of David: be- I have given him for a witness to the le, a leader and commander to the people" ah lv: 2-4). This passage is so evangeli- and so adapted to a spiritual dispensation, had the prophet lived in gospel times, he cely could have chosen language more ible: and as it so well applies to the pres- subject, I shall make upon it the following ctions.

ere the nobility and dignity of the gospel splayed; the way is opened by which lost, ldered man may come to Christ, and ex- ence life through him; and here the ground anifested, whereon man may move with ptance before him. Can anything be more , than that to hearken diligently to him, cline the ear, and come unto him, requires ate of deep inward attention, because it is by the Spirit that we have access to him. st remains through all generations, the , the truth, and the life; and none can e to the Father but by him, who is that ious medium between God and man whereby souls of his children are not only quick- d, but raised up together, and, at seasons, e to sit together in heavenly places in him (Eph. ii: 6): here is the state or ground in which acceptable worship is performed, in the spirit, and in the truth.

Christ is the good shepherd, who not only knows his sheep but is known of them; who said, "When he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them" (John x: 4): and as he is the commander of his people, in order that due subordination and proper decorum may be preserved, it is necessary that a strict attention be paid to his commands—to wait for his orders with becoming diffidence and reverence. How would it look in a company of people approaching some great personage, who had a right to their obedience, and whose prerogative it was to appoint them their service, and on whom they depended for daily subsistence; if, instead of waiting for his directions, they should instantly begin extolling his greatness, and praising his goodness; and perhaps in a language that neither suited their states nor station? Might they not expect to receive from him a reproof?

If this would not be acceptable to a man, who is also compassed about with infirmities; what can we think of those customary exercises practised amongst many professed Christians, who upon entering their place of worship, instead of waiting for the preparation of the heart from the Lord to be known; presently begin singing, as they suppose to the praise and glory of God? And oftentimes, it is to be feared without considering that, if the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord, so also must their praises be: besides, if they make use of words which do not apply to their state, as when they repeat the sayings of David, "All the night make I my bed to swim; "I water my couch with my tears" (Ps. vi: 6); again, "Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law" (Ps. cxix: 186), others appealing to the Searcher of hearts after this manner, "My heart thou knowest, can never rest, till thou create my peace:" can it for a moment be supposed, that this language can fitly apply to the states of a whole congregation? Might they not reasonably expect this reproof, "Who hath required this at your hand?" would it not better become the solemnity of a religious congregation, to attend unto that command, "Be still, and know that I am God!" (Ps. xlvi: 10).

But to return to the subject, the prophet Habakkuk expressing a state of silent attention, saith, "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me," or as the margin hath it, "what he will say in me" (Hab. ii: 1). Again we read, "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord: for he is raised up out of his holy habitation" (Zech. ii: 13): again, "Keep silence before me, O islands, and let the people renew their strength, let them come near, then let them speak" (Isa. xli: 1). "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." (Hab. ii: 20). Now if silently waiting upon the Lord, was so powerfully inculcated, and so forcibly enjoined, under an outward and typical dispensation, which in many respects was declared to be but as the shadow of good things to come; it is reasonable to conclude that with this spiritual dispensation which bringeth life and immortality to light, it is particularly consonant. I shall close these quotations with that encouraging declaration of the Most High, "They shall not be ashamed, that wail for me" (Isa. xlix: 23).

But should any still say, Is there not danger, in avoiding one extreme, of running into another? and that, although there may be too much formality in many outward forms, yet has not this silent waiting a tendency to settle people in a state of supineness and indifference, and to draw them off from the necessary duty of prayer? To which I answer, The silence which we speak of can have no such effect; but on the contrary, to increase the ardor and fervor of the soul in proportion as it comes under the influence of the Spirit of Christ; for though we have no stated forms of prayer, either printed in books, or expressed at stated times ex-tempore (whether the mind be influenced with the spirit of prayer or not); yet we are not restrained from waiting upon the Lord at stated times, as appears by our regular attendance of religious meetings, which duty it doth not require an immediate impulse to perform; but here lies the difference betwixt us and most other professors; that our time for uttering words is not always ready. Neither does it appear that prayer is confined to expressions in words, but rather consists in a union with the Spirit of Christ; in which state the soul not only breathes forth its wants to Him that seeth in secret, but derives the supplies it stands in need of; here the spirit of prayer is witnessed, which at seasons breaks forth in words, where one is made as mouth for the rest; at other times they find the truth of that testimony of the prophet, "Their strength is "to sit still" (Isa. xxx: 7-15); knowing, from a degree of blessed experience, that the Lord keepeth those in perfect peace whose minds are stayed on him, because they trust in him.

Besides, there is no Christian duty more forcibly and generally enjoined than that of watching; "What I say unto you," said Christ to his disciples, "I say unto all, Watch" (Mark xiii: 37). There is no state to which this doth not apply, however men may vary in their views with respect to other things, It was the concern of the apostle to stir up the churches to watchfulness and prayer; "Watch thou in all things" (2 Tim. iv: 5), said Paul to Timothy; and to the Ephesians, "Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit;" mark—in the Spirit: "watching thereunto with all perseverance" (Eph. vi: 18). Watching hath an extensive signification; it implies, in the first place, a general oversight of our words and actions, and also of the thoughts and intents of the heart; and secondly, it implies a state of silent attention; "I will stand upon my watch," said the prophet Habakkuk, "and set me upon the tower; and will watch to see what he will say in me" (Hab. ii: 1). Watching and waiting, are terms synonymous; pointing out an exercise fitly adapted to spiritual worship; nor transiently to feel the touches of divine grace, but to sit for some time under its influence and operation, as was expressed by the church formerly, viz: "I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste" (Cant. ii: 3.)

Upon the whole, these being the latter days, or gospel dispensation, to which that glorious promise was made, "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts" (Jer. xxxi: 33, Heb. viii: 10), whereby all might come to know the Lord, from the least unto the greatest; it appears to me evident, that in order to a qualification to read that law, a silent abstracted state of mind is both requisite and necessary, and many can bless the Lord, from a degree of heart-felt experience of the precious effects thereof in their own souls; and are at times constrained to call to others (Come, taste and see how good the Lord is) in the abounding of that love which would have all mankind come, and have fellowship with the Father, and with his son Jesus Christ, and sit under the teaching of the "unction from the Holy "One" (I John ii: 20-27), and have no need that man should teach them: when that glorious promise shall be accomplished, that the church shall be thus redeemed from all human dependence, and come to sit under the teaching of Him of whom it was said, all thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be their peace; and in righteousness shalt thou be established (Isa. liv: 13, 14), which state is described in that sublime and glorious strain of the evangelical prophet; "The sun shall be no more thy light by day, neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee, but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory: thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself, for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended" (Ibid. lx: 19-20).

To conclude—as it was neither to Jerusalem nor the mountain of Samaria, that true worship was to be confined; so neither is it in words, nor yet in silence merely, that true worship doth consist; without the requisite disposition of mind. The royal Psalmist, from a sense of the awfulness of the divine Majesty, and his own unworthiness as a finite creature, thus addressed the great object of worship; "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou visitest him" (Ps. viii: 4). "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering: the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit:" and then asserts with holy confidence. "A broken and a contrite heart: O God, thou wilt not despise." (Psal. li: 16-17). The heaven is his throne, and the earth his footstool; yet he hath declared, that unto this man he will look, that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and who trembleth at his word (Isa. lxvi: 1-2). How different is this from a repetition of even the best set of words that can be composed, where they do not suit the state of the soul! Be not deceived; God is not mocked; such as every man soweth, such must he reap in the great and terrible day of the Lord when he shall awaken men from their false and polluted rest; when the sinners in Zion shall be afraid, and fearfulness surprise the hypocrite; when that language is sounded in their borders, Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom, but those that do the will of my Father which is in Heaven: then, soft music, fine voices, and splendid appearances, will avail nothing in comparison of an humble heart, and a contrite spirit, set at the feet of Christ to hear his gracious words.

And you whose minds have happily been directed to the divine gift, and favored to feel the virtue of its living power in your hearts, and to know the joyful sound; may ye be engaged in watchfulness and humility, to walk in the light of his countenance; being frequent and fervent both in a steady attendance of religious meetings, and in private retirement, where ye may pour forth your souls unto your Father who is in secret; and your Father who seeth in secret will reward such openly, by strengthening them with might by his Spirit in the inner man; whereby to support their testimony for the truth in uprightеousness, and not be ashamed to confess Christ and his gospel before men; but by patient continuance in serving the Lord in their generation, in truth and faithfulness, they may happily witness, that the work of righteousness is peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever.

MENTAL KODAKS.—"I wonder why my little boy does pound the furniture around so! I don't dare to let him go into the parlor at all, he is so rough," says one mother.

Just then baby boy falls down, and cries. Mother runs to the rescue.

"Did the naughty old chair bump baby's precious head? Well, ma'll pound the bad old chair for hurting her baby." Thump, thump, on the chair. "Was it the table leg that hurt him? Too bad,—naughty old table leg shall be whipped." Rap, rap, on the table leg.

How very strange that baby should pound the furniture!

Baby was not lacking in intelligence or imitative faculty. He could learn. The idea of instant and violent revenge upon anything that gave him pain, was firmly implanted in his infant mind, by his loving mother.

Presently when little sister hurt him, accidentally, in their play, up came the chubby boot, and cruelly kicked her gentle face, just when she bent to soothe him while she was saying that she was sorry, and did not mean to hurt him.

Mother spanked the baby-boy real hard for kicking sister, but he was a good scholar,—he had learned what she taught him,—and he became an infant terror.

The furniture was revarnished, but alas for the marred soul! Who was to blame?—New Crusade.

WHEN three little German children, six, eight, and ten years of age, were coming to this country alone to meet their parents, a friend took a little book and wrote their destination and a sentence in French and German and English, and said, 'Children, if you get into trouble stand still and open this book, and hold it right up." They sailed from Liverpool to New York, went a thousand miles west, and found friends everywhere. Whenever they got into trouble, they opened the little book. People would come and look and that was enough. What was it? Was it something from the German Emperor? Was it the password of some great secret society? It was this: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." That took them through Germany. It took them through England. It took them through New York. It took them everywhere. Was it the word of a dead Jew? It is the word of a living Christ, and of the Friend who said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth."—H. L. Hastings.

A PRAYER.

BY M. WOOLSEY STRYKER.

Lord, every day and everywhere,
In every way, or large or least
Let faithful service be increased,
And thine approval be my care.

Let all my plans be simplified
To follow thee at small remove,
To catch the secret of that love
Which drew the needy to thy side.

Oh that my lips might learn that word,
That living gift of gracious touch,
Which thrilled the burdened overmuch,
Which loving souls with rapture heard!

Thou Living One! Oh, live in me!
My dullness so transfiguring,
My dumb voice making so to sing,
That men may know I've been with thee.

Control the quick, impatient speech,
Curb my fierce pride and selfishness,
Constrain my thought to heal and bless
First let me learn the thing I teach.

I would not bring thee what is lame,
Unseemly, torn, what cost me naught;
But, by thy patient grace besought,
Would mark my best with thy dear name

Put mine with thine in perfect chord.
Forgiveness let me ne'er forget.
Bend thine ear lower! Love me yet!
I ask no more. How could I, Lord?

A True Story for the Children.

It was a pleasant afternoon not long while the "spring beauties" were still bl ing in abundance and the "Jacks in the pit" had just opened, that I went with three little daughters to take our First-da ternoon walk to the woods. We had w children exclaimed, indignantly, "There has caught a poor little bird." Fox was collie, who with Hugo, the old St. Bernard followed us. I hurried to the place whe was, and found that instead of a bird he h

but was too late to save it. The children noticed that the dogs had gone to an old stump about eighteen inches high and not than a foot across. The centre had dec could put your hand. At the bottom of hole was what appeared to be the stringy their mother was dead, so I broke the s

I put the captured one into my handker

For "The Friend."

Pernicious Literature.

The superficial character of much that passes for religion at the present day is cause for regret. It is quite observable among many under the name of Friends. But if we glance abroad at the drift of writers and thinkers outside of our profession, we find they are rapidly leading us in this career of defection.

Looking back over a period of sixty years I can recall the attitudes of simple faith and obedience on the one hand and intellectual and social culture on the other at that time.

The anti-slavery society had then lately organized and was gathering strength. In their zeal for the cause of moral reforms they held points of doctrine and as religious practice in a subordinate position, so that it appeared likely that their bond of union was rather an interest in good work than a common faith.

Their ranks were largely made up of persons of refinement and scientific culture, who were Unitarian in theology, and they quite generally appeared settled in the conclusion that an association thus banded for purposes of human refinement the necessity of a common faith was superseded. The Bible standard of a condition prepared for acceptance with God was substituted by one more conformable with their ideas of reason and human convenience.

I heard one of their distinguished speakers, in the course of what might have been called either a sermon or a lecture, say: "I know no other preaching of the gospel than to call the attention of mankind to the prevailing sins of the times."

It was about this period, the comparative infancy of the remarkable era of "higher education" in which we live, that the article from which I am about to quote was written. It may be found on page 129 of the 6th volume of THE FRIEND.

The contributor of the article says: "The following eloquent and forcible criticism is from the Journal of the Flushing Institute. It gives expression to thoughts which must be familiar to every Christian whose attention has been turned to the lighter current literature of the day. We may say without extravagance that the present age is in great danger of mistaking grand sentiments of admiration of natural beauty and moral order for Christian aspirations, and that on the other hand a sickly sentimentality is palmed upon it for the tenderness and humility of the Christian spirit. I commend the subjoined to the close attention of the readers of THE FRIEND. Let us apply the same touchstone to much of the admired prose and poetry which circulates in what is called the religious public, and they will detect a great portion of false sentiment and spurious ornament which the Christian is compelled to reject as noxious and unsound.

"Dr. Spurzheim, after building up a reputation in Europe, had come to America, to Boston, in 1832. After lecturing there for some time he died, the same year. It was at his 'obsequies' in the 'old South Church' that the ode was sung, of which the following are the 3d and fourth stanzas:

"Nature's priest, how pure and fervent
Was thy worship at her shrine.
Friend of man, of God the servant,
Advocate of truths divine,—
Taught and charmed as by no other
We had been and hoped to be;—
But while waiting round thee, Brother,
For thy light,—'tis dark with thee.
Dark with thee? No; thy Creator
All whose creatures and whose laws
Thou didst love,—shall give thee greater
Light than earth's, as earth withdraws.
To thy God thy godlike spirit
Back we give in filial trust
Thy cold clay—we grieve to hear it
To its chamber—but we must."

"On the whole it is a beautiful production. . . . But we are concerned only with the religious character of the piece. It presents to us the unhappy anomaly of a Christian people, in a place dedicated to Christian worship, writing in strains of devotion not only devoid of the faintest recognition of any principle distinctively Christian, but concerned in the spirit and to some extent in the language of the bards of heathen antiquity. The ode is destitute alike of Christian unction and Christian truth. It contains no allusion to the redemption of man nor to life and immortality as brought to light in the gospel, nor to the mediation of the Saviour as the ground and confidence of hope. A hope is indeed expressed for the departed spirit. But is it the humble, specific hope of the Christian? Is it a trust based on the definite promise of the Saviour and exulting in the gift of grace to the renovated soul? No; it is the vague and loose anticipation of the heathen. Like the subject of Homer's song, the deceased had a godlike spirit, and will be happy after death because he loved the creatures and the laws of God, i. e., because he was a liberal man and a man of science!

"As to the third stanza we know not whether to smile at its extravagance or to rebuke its impiety. Can you imagine, reader, who it is that, by a Christian minister, in a Christian congregation, on an occasion of public worship before the God of heaven is hymned as

'Advocate of truths divine,'

And by whom a pastor and his flock in the fold of Christ confess with grateful adoration that

'Taught and charmed as by no other
They have been or hoped to be?'

You may be antiquated enough to call to mind some of the worthies of the Bible. You may think it was a prophet, an apostle, or perhaps one of the martyrs of your faith. Or, rather, you would believe it to be the Teacher sent from God. But no, simple reader, you are quite behind the spirit of the age! You are not yet illuminated. Natural science, you must know, is the truth divine of this enlightened era, and the advocate of Divine truth is a philosopher; a lecturer on the protuberance of the skull, and now installed among the gods to become the Orpheus or the Esculapius of a future generation. We mean no disrespect to Dr. Spurzheim, a son of science, a stranger on our coasts, and finding only a grave in the country which he visited in the spirit of enlightened attachment to her people and her institutions. His fate certainly makes no ordinary appeal to our sympathies, and we should have rejoiced to share in an appropriate tribute to his memory. We are as ready, moreover, to respect the genius of the poet as to deplore the untimely fate of the subject of his song. It is the ode which we condemn, used as it was under circumstances which entitle it to be considered as the devotional exercise of a congregation on the occasion of a religious solemnity.

"We repeat our conviction that the present effusion, as well as one which preceded it, however unimportant in other respects, is valuable as an index of the moral tendencies of the liberal theology. When such are the religious hymns of a people the letter of Christianity may remain, but its spirit has fled. No congregation under the influence of an orthodox ministry could have joined in such strains. Even if they had been too ignorant to point out its defects, their hearts would have revolted from it. Their evangelical instincts, if we may be allowed the expression, would have repelled such an insult on their faith.

"'Waiting round thee for thy light.' What an expression to be addressed by an assembly of Christian worshippers to the spirit of a fellow-mortal! When the cemetery was consecrated we had an apotheosis of mother earth, a formal ode to this ancient divinity. And now we have an ascription of praise addressed as it were to a canonized saint.

"Extremes inevitably meet, and it would seem as if the state of religion on which we are now animadverting had become the central point of a demolished faith and a rising superstition. They have no mysteries to awe the imagination, they have discarded the sublime truths which stir the deep energies of the soul, and they have rejected as gross materialism those manifestations of deity which most powerfully awaken the sensibilities and absorb the affections. Thus the lofty aspirations and heavenly affinities of the soul follow the impulse of lawless caprice without the adequate truths to guide and develop them.

"As a necessary consequence the community rush into the very gulf they seek to avoid, expend their veneration on material objects, and forget to worship God in spirit and in truth. This has been the religious history of our race. Already has it been exemplified by the pagans of the ancient world and the papists of the modern, and despite the lessons of experience the same drama may be again enacted."

The tendency of events since this article was written has gone to justify the fears expressed in the last paragraph. The human has made great strides in the development of all departments of science, and brought the knowledge thus acquired to bear upon biblical criticism until the simple "walk by faith" spoken of by the apostle is quite thrust out of view. We can plead for the ancient philosopher, for the light of Christ had not then come in its fulness. He can excuse the peasantry of the middle ages for whom the only glimmer of hope was through the proffered aid of the clergy. But what apology can be made for those who amid the light of the last two centuries seem determined to find some other way to the kingdom than by Christ, the door?

TRUE IDEALS.—Speaking of the importance of all Christians having the true ideal before them, the Life of Faith mentions a story told of a modern sculptor, who was found standing in front of his masterpiece, wrapt in thought and sad reverie. When asked why he was so sad, he said: "Because I am satisfied with it. I have there embodied all that I can think or feel. There it is. And because there is no discord between what I dream and what I can do, I feel that the limit of my growth is reached." But there is this to be noted in the life of the Christian. As the believer advances towards the ideal that he has formed, so that ideal advances. He rises into a purer atmosphere, he gets a clearer vision, he enters more thoroughly into God's mind as to what He has called him to be. And as his standard of the present is higher than his ideal of the past, so his ideal of the future will rise higher than his standard of the present.

For "The Friend."

Fruitfulness.

It is with feelings of gratitude and under a humbling sense of a tender visitation of Divine love and mercy to my soul whilst yet a youth, that I recall to mind the parable of the Lord Jesus concerning the unfruitful tree. "Shall I cut it down?" the gardener inquires. "Not so," the master answers, "but dig about and prune it, and then if it bear fruit, well; if not, cut it down and cast it into the fire."

This, no doubt, is a reasonable and righteous course of action in things natural, and God's witness for truth in every heart certifies to us that it is not less so in spiritual things in God's dealing with us. As we plant with the purpose of obtaining fruit, so does He plant us in his own image, that we may bring forth godly fruits. Nor are we fulfilling the Divine will if He find not those fruits in us.

Fruits meet for repentance are found ere those works of righteousness by which faith itself is made perfect, like as the fig-tree putteth forth its fruit before a show of leaves; nor was it the show of leaves, but the want of fruit drew down the displeasure of the Lord Jesus. No stronger symbol could be, that no empty profession of religion, without an inward experience of its regenerating influence on the heart, and a conformity in life and conversation agreeable thereto can avail any in the day of judgment, nor avert condemnation. Every member must need abide in Christ the vine and bring forth fruit to the glory of God. For God gives of his holy Spirit to every one, that the receiver may bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. And if any be Christ's, Christ by his Spirit abideth in him, for "if a man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." As the branch of the vine draweth life and nourishment from the root, it beareth fruit, so shall the Christian planted in Christ receive of his Holy Spirit and bear fruits of righteousness to the praise and glory of God, the heavenly husbandman. Nor can any unfruitful branch be left sapping the life of the vine and bearing no fruit. As the least branch may and often does bear fruit, so should the least member among the people of God; for God "gives of his Holy Spirit to all who OBEY Him;" and this all may do, as obedient to the grace of God, that Divine teacher, that appears to all, young and old, and teaches every one what to do in order that all may do God's holy will and so please Him. Samuel and Josiah as children, Joshua, David, Nehemiah, John and Timothy as young men, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Barzillai and Simeon as old men, besides Miriam, Ruth, Naaman's maid, Mary and Martha among the maidens, and Deborah, Jael, Huldah among the matrons, each found the labor and work assigned, and in God's fear and by his holy help did it, receiving the recompense of reward. And as these did the will, pleased God and found acceptance, so may all, by God's grace vouchsafed for that purpose, as Jesus our Saviour has taught u pray, "Thy will be done in earth as it i heaven."

There are gifts of service in the chu some public others less so. But no one please God by doing that which is not requi at his hand, nor can he by deferring to what is. Yet as a member of Christ's Chu which is his body, we are members one of other, and being so have duties to God and our fellow-man, both in the church as also w absent in body therefrom. Even our atte ance at meeting, in accord with the c mand, "not to forsake the assembling of selves together," and a proper exercise travail of soul becoming the sacred purp for which all are assembled, is a duty we not forego, without a dereliction of duty, a consequent loss not only to ourselves, bu others also, for so doing we rob God and brother too; for, as coals separated burn feebly or not at all, whilst together they out much heat, so do Christians, closely un in spirit and faithful in worshipping toget in spirit and in truth, shed a radiance of Ch tian love around them.

These gifts of public service as vocal mi try are not given to all, nor are any to atte to exercise a gift they have not received. S unsanctified and uncalled for service minis death and not life to that which is begotte God, and which is nourished only by the h enly manna from God's hand. But there joy, a freedom and liberty in God's servic wider fields, wherein every one may and sh be exercised daily and hourly. This field is world, for "Whatsoever ye do in word or d do all in the name of the Lord Jesus". (Col. iii: 17), and what is done in his name needs be to God's glory; but "Whatsoe includes all a Christian does in his daily and walk, therefore the light and life of a Christian, like that of a fixed star, shines in the firmament of God's power. Such fruitful bearing branches ministering words and deeds to those around them, their very presence breathes of the arom heaven, and men take note of them "that have been with Jesus." No earthly Garde Eden this for man "to dress and keep," wi may be lost, but a heavenly field wherein wise do work and gather in, that when the vest of life is garnered home, sower and re may rejoice together, when all shall drin gether the new wine of the kingdom at table of their Lord, and the righteous sha the fruit of their doings.

THE HIGHFALUTIN STYLE.—The longest cisms are not always the most effective. Canon Overton was student under the Mark Pattison, he had once to write an and he tells us how he did it:

Remarks and Allusion to the Past evived, with Intent to Strengthen and ir up to more Faithfulness.

ere is not a doubt in the mind of the r but that the Society of Friends was l up, not only to set forth by the tongue en the precious doctrines and testimonies to our forefathers to uphold before the , but also that their lives and conversa- hould consistently correspond therewith. ier words, that they should carry out in onious practice their convictions, or live they profess; being as epistles or way- to the eternal kingdom, known and read men. Is not this, moreover, clearly fore- wed to us, being an express command in ewish law: "Ye shall keep my statutes y judgments, which if a man do he shall n them; I am the Lord." This was no practicely exemplified for a time at the f the Society, being, perhaps, one great of the remarkable stir and impression upon the minds and hearts of observers n the sphere of their influence. For in dance herewith, William Penn, writing of rly Friends, says: "I cannot forget the ity and chaste zeal of that day." "We an exercised people, our very counten- and deportment declared it."

w greatly is it to be desired that these cteristics of earlier times in our Society be more generally traced upon us! That ere inward and spiritually minded people, ight with renewed Christian zeal and ive dedication, hold up the banner of erism in its original dignity and purity, hus show unmistakably that we are the ineal successors of that illustrious band ed and proven men and women who, ing o'er this vain world with the keen f faith," counted not their lives dear unto elves, that they might finish their course oy." Hereby we, too, banded together as eart of one man, should be enabled gh God's omnipotent power, who remains me yesterday, to-day and forever, to re- the broken down walls and effectually he battle to the gate in a day when there many adversaries.

ce the period so favorably represented by m Penn, our members have been ex- to many temptations from the increase alth with the excesses and extravagances which it so often leads. It is hard to the heart against the perils of success. ood-tide of prosperity is not good for the The cares of this life and the deceitful- of riches choke the word. And the et's words of Tyre should be a warning to us: "By thy traffic hast thou increased thy riches, and thy heart is lifted up because of thy riches." It was the view of these dangers so tending to bias the purpose, so fertile in reconciling religion with luxury, that prompted John Woolman's pen to the following testimonies: "Small treasure to a resigned mind is sufficient. How happy is it to be content with a little, to live in humility, and feel that in us which, breathes out this language, Abba, Father, may we reverently wait on the Lord for strength to overcome the spirit of the world.

There are some considerations which tend to relieve suffering for the cause of truth. When we are met with cruel and unjust accusations and then look to Christ we see that He more than any of us was the object of the world's scorn and suspicion. Even his brethren did not believe in Him. They could not see the necessity for his exposing himself as He did for the sake of truth. Paul, too, had innumerable trials in his efforts to fulfill his mission to the world. More politic men would have avoided this by not undertaking so much. He suffered in every quarter wherever he went, but kept sweet, in it all, and said, "none of these things move me." Consciousness of rectitude was his comfort. Luther, too, was not a troublesome man except to those who perverted the ways of God. Yet his path was beset with enemies. He was not a coward to flee from, or care much for trouble. So it has been always, the good that men of conscience and of courage would do is opposed by enemies. We should all be glad when we are reproached for the cause of our Master. For great is our reward in heaven.—Christian Instructor.

Many a man prays with his whole being, feels himself thrilled with the Divine currents and going out in aspiration after the Eternal, and yet finds words forsake him when he attempts to put devotion into speech. And yet is not this true prayer—for how can you translate aspiration into speech?—W. D. Little.

Items Concerning the Society.

William C. Allen, with approval of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, has entered upon religious service within the limits of Concord and Philadelphia Quarterly Meetings.

Joel Bean, who, with his wife, Hannah Bean, have been visiting Friends and meetings about Philadelphia since the opening of the Yearly Meeting, has gone on a few weeks' visit to New England.

Abram Fisher, who has been in these parts with a minute from Rich Square Monthly Meeting, N. C., as "a ministering elder," has now returned to Woodland, N. C.

The teachers of Westtown and Friends' Select Schools have planned a camping out together for Sixth and Seventh-days of this week, their tent to be pitched somewhere near Castle Rock and Ridley Creek.

We notice that the alumni of one of our Quaker schools have arranged to be banqueted at two dollars a plate! It may be all right for them, but for ourselves, in the face of the world's great need, we could not eat at that rate with a clear conscience. Two dollars at present is the price of a human life in India.—North Carolina Friend.

A Startling Event.—Since the death of our esteemed Friend, John Sharpless, in 1885, (whose murderer is reported lately to have died in the Eastern Penitentiary), no so shocking murder, if any, has been heard of as being inflicted on a member of the Society of Friends, or on so shining a mark in its membership, as that which befel Roy Wilson White, near Powelton Avenue Station, one week ago this evening, on his way to his Germantown home from the University, where his acquirements in legal learning, remarkable for one of the age of twenty-eight, were honored by a law fellowship and the post of lecturer in Roman law.

If, as some define genius, it is the faculty of working to advantage, such was his genius. As an indefatigable worker he was conspicuous among all young men known to us. How he could earn his way through a five years' course in law study and at the same time provide, in the place of his deceased father, for the support of a family and the advanced education of some of its members, was a wonder to our community, and an object-lesson to our young men whose way is paved with means.

The distinguished earthly rewards which were awaiting him, and already promised, have been left behind for another state of being. But as an illustration to other young men of what can be accomplished in a few short years by faithful conscientions work in an apprehended calling, under self-denial of all diverting enticements, his career has wrought a telling lesson among us, and it is for that, and not for eulogy, that we thus inadequately hold it up to view.

Notes from Others.

In the late Boston Congress of Religion, Prof. Edward Cummings, of Harvard University, said that "Progress never comes from sacrificing the weak for the benefit of the strong, but always from the sacrifice of the strong for the sake of the weak."

Samuel W. Jones, Mayor of Toledo, said: "Up to a few years ago it had been my habit to think of life as something that could be separated into fragments, such as religion, business, and politics. I have now come to believe that all life is one."

A representative of Hinduism claimed Jesus as "a Hindu of the Hindus;" and it was said that "the Hindus live religion, eat religion, and drink religion. Art, politics and society are all based on religion; it is not a thing apart, it is their whole religion."

We have no disposition to doubt the religiousness of many peoples, and of adherents of systems or churches within or without christendom; or the maxim that "man is a religious animal." But if any of them, under whatever religious views, "have not the Spirit of Christ they are none of his;" and "he that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," nor redemption in his religious system.

"Will the ministry be content to live plainly, that it may reach plain people and be supported by them? Will our rich men forbear social extravagance and social distinctions in the church, that the gospel may better do its office for all men? How may our churches be builded and managed, that in them, at the same time, the brother of low degree may rejoice that he is exalted, and the rich that he is made low?"—Address of Methodist Bishops to Chicago Conference.

Latin, in the Romish Church, is a medium of worship and also of intercourse among all its officials throughout the world. By it also the governmental officials of all nations are able to understand each other. Rome never changes, and as it speaks officially only in Latin, its decrees and outgivings, State and ecclesiastical, possess one and the same meaning to all who study them in their original form. This gives her a great advantage, and will long ensure the perpetuity of this ancient language. —Presbyterian.

It has been proposed to employ the phonograph as an aid in learning foreign languages. In learning a language it is necessary first of all to have the ear trained to catch and recognize the sounds, and the only way to accomplish this is to listen to the continual repetition of the sounds until the ear becomes familiar with them. Many persons have to learn a foreign language without any aid from a teacher that can speak that language correctly, and even those that are so fortunate as to have a competent teacher can not constantly have the teacher at hand. Now it is proposed to have phonographic records of language lessons ; then the student can have the machine repeat the lesson over and over again, until he is perfectly familiar with it.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS

UNITED STATES—The Supreme Court of the United States decided the Kentucky Governorship case in favor of Beckham, the Democratic contestant. The opinion was handed down by Chief Justice Fuller, and Justices Harlan, Brewer and McKenna dissented — Harlan totally and Brewer and McKenna in part.

At a Cabinet meeting the question of the reception of the Boer envoys was discussed. It is understood they will be presented to the President by the Secretary of State. They will be received with every courtesy, but only as private citizens and not in any diplomatic capacity.

Immigration at New York reached the high water mark last week. During that time 15,000 immigrants have arrived, 40 per cent. of them being Italians.

The New York Journal says : The amount of arid lands which lie in Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas and Colorado is estimated to be at least 500,000,000 acres. This is rendered useless by the need of water, and the reclamation of this land would add billions of dollars to the wealth of the country. In many sections of Colorado and other States in which irrigation is used, the best farming lands in the country are those which were formerly worthless and are now artificially watered.

The destruction of forests by fires has caused a considerable falling off in water supply in some portions of the country, especially in Southern California. The commissioner of the General Land Office considers this subject of so much importance that he has initiated a policy of reforesting the burned areas of reservation. He has instructed the Superintendents of Forests in California to examine lands of heads of streams and along water courses, with a view to ascertaining what tree growth is indigenous to such places. When this has been done, seeds and young trees will be planted in these denuded localities, and it is thought that within two years the resulting growth will have an appreciable effect in preveating the rapid evaporation of water. The present force of forest rangers will be employed in replanting the burned areas. In order to prevent the spread of forest fires, telephone systems will be arranged in a number of reserves as a means of rapid communication between those in charge of the forests. Many serious fires, it is said, could have been prevented had this system been in use previously.

Illiteracy in North Carolina is increasing, particularly among the whites. By the census of 1870 there were 33,111 illiterate white voters in North Carolina ; in 1880, 44,420 ; in 1890, 49,570—an average increase of 800 illiterate voters a year, and a total of 21 per cent. of the entire white voting population.

Statistics being gathered by the Board of Health of New York indicate that 3000 more deaths from influenza have occurred during the grippe epidemic prevalent since Second Month than during the corresponding period of last year from the same cause.

Conditions in Porto Rico, so far as the population is concerned, are said to be in a fairly satisfactory condition, Nevertheless, it is stated that the extensive aid rendered them by the United States Government has had the effect to pauperize very many honest workmen.

There were 535 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 41 more than the previous week and 143 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 275 were males and 260 females; 75 died of pneumonia ; 54 of consumption; 33 of diphtheria; 28 of heart diseases; 22 of measles; 22 of apoplexy; 20 of cancer; 20 of convulsions; 15 of old age; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of inanition; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of uræmia; 12 of scarlet fever; 9 of marasmus; 9 of typhoid fever, and 9 of nephritis.

The catch of salmon in Canadian waters last year was valued at $3,159,306, a decrease of $2,520,868 when compared with the returns of the previous year. The decrease is so great as to suggest that in spite of all that is being done to replenish the supply of salmon, it, like the lobster of the Atlantic coast and the seal of Alaskan waters, is doomed to extinction within a few years. The salmon has been driven further and further north with the advance of civilization. It was formerly exceedingly abundant in all the rivers of the Atlantic slope north of the Potomac, but was killed by overfishing and other causes, until now it is practically unknown in that region. The fish now remain only in Canadian waters and in gon, The supply in the Pacific coast region seeme exhaustible only ten years ago. MORTAL DECORATIONS.—Who of the na- s defenders cares enough for his nation to nd it from sin in his own person? How y in highest or lowest rank would defend nation's life from alcohol,—our people's army's most awful outward enemy? Who is soldier enough, and who is heroine enough, e unto sin for our country,—to live unto for our country? To protect their nation g nearest them, and their posterity, from wrong tempers, their selfishness, their tousness, their unguarded speech?

ey will hardly do these things for their try's sake, who will not for Christ's sake; so it is Christ that must be resorted to as true spring of all sincere patriotism. A Layman's Protest.

he following somewhat remarkable letter ng been sent for our insertion, we are will- to make use of it as significant of some ning of the eyes of thoughtful men of to- and of a growing revolt against profession- n in the truth. The revolt, however, should revolt upwards and not downwards, reach- above all laymanism or clericalism into the cial authority of the Holy Spirit,—his de- stration and his power. "As every man received a gift [not mere knowledge of pture and Divine truths], let him minister same, as good stewards of grace." The er alleges acquired knowledge and expe- ce as his right to preach, which, though sidiary, is not the true foundation of right hority. For some truths, however, which loes contain, and without adopting every ression, we print most of his letter:—

To the Editor of the [Yonkers] Statesman:—

Through the courtesy of the pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, I expect to occupy the pulpit of that Church, on next Sunday morning. This action is so unusual for a layman that I feel the obligation to make a public statement of the reasons which influence me.

I have for many years been a careful student of the reasons for the comparatively slow progress of the Christian religion in the world, and especially in our own land.

There are hundreds and even thousands of churches where the public services seem almost ineffective. It is claimed that, in the case of at least one great denomination, there has been absolutely no increase of membership during the year. The statistics of Yonkers for the past year are certainly most discouraging. The combined result of the teaching from the pulpit and the personal labors of the ministers, united to the influence of the membership in their own families, has been lamentably small. And this fairly represents, so far as I can learn, the general conditions throughout the country.

From year to year there seems to have been a diminished interest in religious teaching and a decrease in the number of church attendants. An effort has been made by ministers and official boards to remedy the difficulty by attractive music, stereopticon views and other such devices, and these in turn are losing effect.

My conviction is that this state of things is largely due to a misapprehension on the part both of the ministry and laity. The ministry have erred as to their province and relation to their hearers, and the church members have not appreciated their privileges and obligations. As I understand the Bible, the special aim of a settled minister should be to develop his hearers. This is what Christ did; and after preaching less than a year, He sent out seventy disciples to prepare the way for his coming and gave them the authority which He himself possessed over devils, and the power to heal diseases. Even those ignorant hearers, with their irregular and imperfect opportunities of learning truth, in a brief time were qualified to be the heralds of the Master, and were made teachers, [but subjecting spirits by the Spirit.]

The modern idea, and one which I have frequently heard from the pulpit, is that it is a church member's business to attend services twice on Sunday, if possible, during his life, and that he must not suppose he will ever be so far instructed as to be qualified to teach. I think this a grave and fatal error, and just at this point comes in the obligation of the laity.

A wise and faithful minister should, within a reasonable time, instruct his hearers so that they will apprehend the truth and be fitted for service in instructing others; and it is the business of every man and woman, according to their gifts and capacity, to be witnesses of the truth which has made them free and brought them from darkness into light. I think the minister should count himself as only the leading worker. [Rather, a servant among servants.]

Unfortunately, the modern conception of the minister, pastor or clergyman, as he is variously called, is that he is the church, or at least the most important part of it, and churches are spoken of as belonging to him and are called by his name; while, in fact, he is but an incident and the membership constitute the church.

I have also the conviction that the training of a theological seminary, and the prevalent erroneous idea that preaching the Gospel is a profession, induce a kind of pulpit service that does not meet the needs of the average hearer. There is too much intellect and too little heart. To be religiously successful, the heart must be reached, for "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness;" and in spite of the best intentions and the best efforts, I do not believe it is possible for a minister to prepare two sermons a week without becoming mechanical and perfunctory.

I am persuaded the hope of the Church is in lay preaching. It is not reasonable that a congregation—it may be of five hundred or more people—should be dependent for instruction and help solely upon one man. No one man can acquire a Bible knowledge, or has the extent or variety of experience that are necessary for such a purpose. Indeed, it seems absurd that members of a church should listen for a whole life time to one of several ministers, and be counted incompetent to enlighten their fellow-men, and that the results of their experience and their spiritual attainments should be lost to the world.

I am satisfied that there are thousands of business men in the churches who, like myself, have studied the Scriptures from their youth, and, being practical men, have sought for vital, fundamental, heart-searching, life-regulating truth. I feel that I may not have long to live, and am not willing to die without communicating to my fellow-men some of the truths I have learned. May my example prove a useful suggestion to the ministers, and a reminder of duty and incentive to the laity. . . . .

JOHN C. HAVEMEYER.

Creatures of Surroundings.

"When you are in Rome, do as the Romans do," is an old adage or phrase that may suit many easy consciences, but it is dangerous teaching because it is not in accordance with Bible teaching and example. Whoever "coined" the phrase must have had small regard for Daniel's noble character when he "purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat." We are influenced more or less by our surroundings, hence it is necessary to mark carefully just what those "surroundings" are. No matter where we are, but especially young men and women who go to the cities need to make a firm resolve not to be defiled by certain kinds of influences which are more thickly strewn and more subtle than they are in the country. If, when we are in "Rome" we must do as the Romans do, then we had better stay out of that particular "Rome." No matter where we are we must not "do as the Romans do," but as Christians do, as Jesus would do. That is the only safe course (Prov. iii: 5, 6).—Herald of Truth.

This will apply to summer sojourning Friends away from home who are tempted to subject their testimonies, and accordingly their principles, to every "Rome" they roam to, whether boarding place, or "church service," or a pulpit which one is sometimes asked to occupy. Authority vanishes as weak compliance or imitation takes its place.

Church Finance and Frolic.

"Who hath required this at your hand ? . . Wash you, make you clean ; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes" (Isa. 1: 12, 16).

The infidel administered a withering rebuke to worldly-minded preachers and congregations when he said: "Your God must be in great need of money by the tricks the churches practice to get it for Him." A minister visited a young man in prison, and told him that all the church sympathized with him. He replied: "Do you know that you caused me all this trouble ? You remember the Sunday-school fair, when they set up raffling, and hid a gold ring in a cake ? Here I am. Don't let the church come blubbering around me. The raffling ruined me."

All carnal devices for raising money, as it is claimed, for the Lord, or the church, are a disgrace to the name of Christianity, a sin against God, a cause of deep sorrow to spiritually-minded people, a snare of the Devil, and one of the clogs to piety in the professing church.

Far better hold meetings in private houses, barns, on the street corner, in the fields and groves, than to erect or keep up fine buildings by such sinful arts. God wants nothing but free-will offerings, and if the members of an assembly are not willing to give of their means until it requires self-sacrifice, it may be well asked if their stinginess and worldliness do not entitle them to be classed among hypocrites.

The idea of wrenching money from people through the medium of their stomachs, or their love of amusements, is directly against the spirit of the gospel, and of Jesus, who lashed out of the temple those whom He charged with making a house of merchandise out of the building intended as a place of worship and prayer.

A prayer in the spirit, or a godly exhortation offered in the midst of one of these festivities, would be as dynamite, and put an end to the fun and money mongering. These soul-deadening church frolics, where joking, levity and gossip run high, unfit the heart and mind for prayer. Anything that does that is manifestly not of God ; and Luther has truly said "Whatever is not of God, must be of the Devil."—Selected.

For "The Friend."

Wells and Springs.

[FROM PAPERS LEFT BY JOSEPH WALTON.]

During the latter part of the summer of 1892, the amount of rain that fell in some of the eastern parts of New Jersey was much less than usual; so much so that some of the farmers in our neighborhood found it difficult to procure water for their stock. After the dry spell was over, one of these showed me a well in his fields, on which he usually depended for watering his cows, which had failed him in the time of drought. It was about twelve feet deep, and when I was examining it, was probably more than half-full of water. He mentioned an interesting circumstance connected with it, that just before rain came, the water rose in the well, so that it yielded a supply. I remembered that the late Dr. Joseph Warrington, who when a boy lived in the same section of country, told me that he was ploughing in a very dry time, and about the middle of the day a change in the moisture of the ground was perceptible to his bare feet, and this was soon followed by rain.

In thinking over these occurrences, I wrote to my scientific friend, T. Chalkley Palmer, asking for a solution of the problem, as to the source of this water. He kindly replied, and from his letter the following paragraphs are extracted :

"Presuming it to be a fact that wells and springs have been known to rise before rains have fallen in the neighborhood, I imagine that in searching for a cause one would have to pay particular attention to the matter of locality. If the springs were in an area influenced even remotely by the sea, the thing might happen as a result of the piling up of water on the coast and in tidal rivers; which, again, comes habitually on our Atlantic slope because of east winds, just the kind of winds that are apt to bring rains with them. The pressure of the heaped-up masses of water may easily, by way of underground strata permeable to moisture, have a more wide-reaching effect than would be anticipated, and might also act very quickly.

"The more I see of natural forces and their action, the more I am struck with a certain elasticity running through everything, whereby a force makes itself felt very quickly at a distance comparable (to borrow an illustration) to a pipe filled with balls. No matter how long the pipe is, if another ball is forced into the end, one instantaneously drops out at the other end. So, in the case I have supposed, when the water is at a low level, but yet still there, the stratum in which the well is situated must be saturated with the fluid. Force drives more into it by heaping up water on the shore —even many miles away — and immediately, without regard to distance or crookedness of route, some of it is squeezed out at the other end of the system.

"When the same phenomenon occurs in a hilly country, in such a situation that the tidal influence is clearly out of the question, if it ever does so, the cause might be found in precipitation at a distance, whereby pressure becomes greater in the water strata of a whole district. I feel convinced that our upland springs are connected underground over wide areas, and that rain in the mountains has a more or less immediate effect on many of the water strata of Delaware County. But whether the effect is great enough to be easily not is another matter.

"It seems to me that some such explana as the above is most likely to prove the one. But I do not claim to be able to ex the phenomenon. I merely offer a few for thy consideration."

The district of country where the two dents above related occurred is a low-lying level one. The subsoil is mainly sand gravel, which would freely permit the tran ence of remote pressure to the water part with which the lower strata are always cha I am of the opinion that to this transfer of pressure, as suggested by T. C. P., the nomona are to be attributed. But I believ source of the pressure is a more widely tended one than the local heaping of the in the ocean and tidal rivers. It is well k that a fall in the barometer is an indicati approaching rain. This fall is caused diminution of the pressure of the atmos at the point. Is it not reasonable to con that the greater pressure on the outside tends to force up the underlying water parts where the storm is approaching? the same principle as water rises in a p when the pressure of the air in the pum is removed by the working of the pump ha

CHEAP ICE PROCESS.—At Claremont, N an original method of filling ice houses fine ice cheaply has been in successful o tion the last winter. The general idea i at all new, but it has now been made a tical success. The ice house has built w it a water-tight tank, just enough sm than the house to allow for the expansio casioned when water turns into ice, na about one-twelfth. The water, taken fro water works, first goes to a tank 60 feet ground ; from this it emerges through tubes and is allowed to fall to the floor ice house below—just as shot are made shot tower. The water freezes on its down. The ice builds upon itself, becc all the time more denser and clearer, an result in the end is a house filled with one 300-ton cake of ice of such pure color one ever saw who has been limited to po river ice. The outside temperature mu course be freezing or colder. The ice is mated to cost only five cents a ton.—finder.

e Cross as the Final Seat of Authority.

LEA FOR THE "SPIRITUAL CROSS" AS THE STRONGHOLD OF PROTESTANT FAITH.

t was inevitable that man should be forced n that spiritual selfhood which the Refor-ion brought, and perilled on the edge of individual freedom. No obedience is sound ch is not free. The world had long worked pon him. As Nature or as Empire, as Pa-ism or Catholocism, it had crushed the l. It was quite necessary that he should n and work outward on the world. If the l was as eternal as the church had declared o be, it was bound to realize that it was in mand of Time, which was at most but a t of Eternity. But if of Time, then of His-y, and if of history, then of an historic rch. The soul claimed the right to revise Church, and to judge the Church, and con-n it—yea, to reject it. It could by grace eate its master. If the destiny of the soul everything, it must surely take its true e one day even over the pedagogic institu-s which had taught it its royal worth. It is e that the downfall of the old authority left a naked and perilous state. The infant self ld not but feel in the course of time the l and terror of its new and imperial soli-e. The paedagogia servilis, from which ther and Melancthon had freed the Church, outgrown only in principle. Even to-day release is still far from an actual and com-e one, and we have masses of people, in-ased by the debut of women on public and et influence, who are psychologically in the dle Ages still: They flee shivering into the , warm air of the church climate sub-tropi-if not torrid, clerical, if not priestly in its scriptions, guidance and claims. How ld it be otherwise? "The monk is always inor," and the priest tends to be a dwarf. vas a too long tutelage that these exercised urope—longer than our three centuries even yet outgrow. Europe had been immersed spiritual lycee till its powers and passions e a man's while its soul remained largely a d's. Such things are but slowly repaired. h the unity of Church disappeared the er which for a thousand years had been only an outward authority, but an outward hority of a very inward kind. An institu-like that cannot be plucked from the mind t it has so long made without a shock, and ock which can only be steadied by an au-rity greater still. And where was that to found? There was nothing on earth that ld claim it; no body had been slowly pre-ed for it. It could not be transferred. hority is not easily transferred; it must w. The new churches could not claim it, east in the sense of the old. They arose n a breach of church authority, they bore stamp of their origin, and it was not far t they could go in any authoritative claim. they strove to fall back on two things. y fell back on the authority of the civil ver, which made the Church at last the flat endage of the State that it is in Germany England to-day. And they fell back on Bible. But what was the Bible? The urch had put it there—as a canon at least; the Church had claimed to interpret it r since. If another interpretation was of-ed it must be the result of private judgment and sectional experience. At least it could not impress itself upon the outer world, or against the Church with any greater weight than a personal experience gave. Protestantism, when the glow of its first mighty impulse had cooled, found itself in a condition of spiritual anarchy, which is our dread inheritance and our supreme but not insoluble problem. The Roman Church has not ceased to go forward in the line of its magnificent and unholy audacity. The dogma of Papal Infallibility has in it something sublime in its self-certitude, to which we can no more refuse a certain æsthetic admiration than we can to Milton's Satan. What has Protestantism with which to confront that, still more bold, commanding, and thorough? The disintegration of the Bible, say some cynics. No; but the release of the Gospel from wrong views of the Bible; the growing consolidation of a great Evangelical Church, which the sects do not distract, but enrich. The Gospel, and the Gospel alone, is the religion of Protestants. One thing is sure. We can never solve that problem by the silly device of overleaping the Reformation and picking up the mediæval state of things. Such could only be the view of an archæologist and not a historian, of a cleric and not a prophet.

The new universal could only be found in the soul's interior, in the soul being forced inward and downward upon itself. If there is no universal and final imperative there, there is none anywhere. The Reformation took an indispensable step, a step that the best work of the Church had made inevitable, when Luther transferred the supreme problem of life to the area of the personal conscience. And though the awful scope of the problem might burst and break the individual soul in the conflict, yet it was in these very ruins that the new life and the new reign arose. The new creation must begin from the soul's chaos and night. Whether you take Peter, Paul, or the Lord, or both, the new man arises from a broken man, the new Church from a broken Church, and the victory of faith is on the field of blood. Revolution is an idea more central to the Church's gospel than evolution. . . So the self-complacency of the soul, yea, its very self-respect, was annihilated; and it was shut up into the new authority of a direct and personal Redeemer.

The Cross and not the Church becomes the new seat of his authority—the Cross as Christ crucified afresh in the evangelical experience of the desperate soul (?) and rising anew in its new trust and new life. By such individualism, individualism was in principle destroyed. In the extremity of personal concern, belittlement and despair arose a life which was a world in itself. The Redeemer was also the kingdom. To the soul He "became its universe that sees and knows." And a Church of those who are in Christ took the place of a Church of the baptized. A Christ who placed men in a Church took the room of a church that placed men in Christ. Such is the principle which as yet, however, Protestantism has but half actualized. That great movement has fallen under the fate that befell Christianity itself before it was 200 years old. It has been captured by culture, by another freedom than the redeemed, by another subjectivity than the sanctified. . . . .

We have slowly, wisely and indirectly to import into the social world the principles of the brotherly Church; and the tough colossal egoism which has been pruned and curbed in the spirit-world of repentance must not seek compensatory scope in the social or industrial world. But the obedience and serviceableness learned in the one must be carried out in the other. The communion of the saints must become the brotherhood of man; there is no other real meaning in the kingdoms of this world becoming the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ. the conversion of the human soul must mean, in the long run, the conversion of the social and industrial organization to the uses and principles of the soul. The same God who drew human society out of wild* nature must out of human society draw the kingdom of Christ. And the agent of this change is the miraculous Gospel. And the principle of the Gospel is the final and irresistible authority to bend to this end the unruly passion of human self-seeking and self-will. It is one authority, theological or social. That which regulates what we believe inspires and prescribes what we are to do. . . .

The Bible is really a word of two meanings, with which we unconsciously juggle. It means [to some] the canon, and [to some] it means the Gospel as the living soul of the canon ; and the two things are not the same. [Whatever men are saying about] the whole of the Bible, the soul of the Bible is authoritative. The grace of God to the conscience in the historic but perennial Cross of Christ, must be the one source of morals and the final seat of authority to a race that is redeemed or nothing—redeemed or lost. Natural and theological ethics may be separated for convenience of academic discussions ; but in the final experience of the race there is no ethic but a theological. The ethics of the future must be the explication of the Cross—and of the Cross understood as a gospel and not as an ideal, as an atonement and not as a classic sacrifice. The whole race is not only weighted with arrears, but infected with a blight. The train of history is not simply late, but there has been an accident, and an accident due to malice and crime. . . The Lord and Master of the race intervenes with his goodness as the only condition of our release, and of our power to fulfil ourselves and share his life. My King and Lord is not only my helper, but He who gives me back the life I had thrown away and lost the power to regain. My Sovereign designs to contend with rebel me, and, when He has disarmed me, gives me back my sword and takes me into his service. . . He redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. He satisfied for us that holy law which our sin could break but never unseat, whose wounded claim no future obedience or even penitence of ours could ever extinguish, which at once lifts us from the dust and grinds us to powder. . . Because He took man's judgment He became man's judge. Because He [came under] the curse, he acquired the monoply of blessing.

He who met the whole law became the law's Lord. . . A true and deep Evangelicism, therefore, is not a party in the Church, but it is the very being of the Church. The coming Church must be an Evangelical Church. While she has this note the Church has the secret of the social future. Everything turns on the Cross and the nature of the Cross's grace. Is the spiritual power of society the moral mastery of Christ's Cross? There is no question in the world so vital to society as this of the spiritual power. The temperance question, the sexual question, the war question, the Irish question, the negro question, the question of labor, the question of the proletariat, and other such, are most grave and pressing. But none of them are so grave and deep, in the long run, as the question of spiritual power. Society coheres without a spiritual power. What shall that be, and where is its seat? It is really the Church question. No question of philanthropy, however urgent and moving we feel it, has the importance of this. For it has the future and permanence of philanthropy itself within it. . . . It is through a society that the Saviour wills to save society, and when we make our choice we have but to ask which Church gives effect to the New Testament Cross, to the moral authority of the spiritual Cross. Which is built on the Gospel as I have explained it—as an act and a power, rather than a creed? Which has that authority? Which, therefore, has the Divine commission? Is it the Church whose secret is in its organization, or in its Gospel?—which is institutional, or moral?—which is graceful in its sacraments, or sacramental in its grace?—whose word asks for mere assent, or for the obedience of faith?—whose authority has its seat on a venerable spot of earth, or utters its still more venerable and awful voice seated in the centre of the redeemed conscience? We must have for these days an authority which is in its nature emancipatory and not repressive, empowering and not enfeebling. That authority is the Redeemer's. The object of human faith must be the source of human freedom, individual or social. Society can be saved only by what saves the soul. The Evangelical contention is that the object of faith is the Redeemer, directly and alone. It is the straitness of the Cross that it is the condition of critical, speculative and social freedom for the world. The Church of the future is the Church of one article which has the simplicity of a whole, and the greatness of a soul.—P. T. Forsyth, in Contemporary Review.

Final Test of Religion.

The supreme test of any system worthy of the name of religion is, Will it enable radically irreligious and immoral persons to reform? Is it adaptable to childhood, youth and manhood? Will it sustain a life of piety, with its arduous duties constantly required and its incessant self-denial? Will its motives grow stronger when motives drawn from this life, such as the love of praise, power, wealth, friendship and social life, grow weaker? Will it give to old age a cheerful outlook? Will it rob death of its terror, leaving instead, not merely a negative indifference, but implanting in the heart a lively hope? Since all must die, and none can tell when, a religion that hesitates, falters, or is silent then, is like a pilot competent only on the open sea. And as old age is a period of sensitiveness, weakness, loneliness and apprehension, whatever religion may have done before, if it can afford no help then, he who has trusted in it is like a pilgrim robbed of his staff when so weary as to fall without its aid, though the journey be not done, and the shadows of night are falling fast.—Christian Advocate.

THE LITTLE MESSENGER OF LOVE.

'Twas a little sermon preached to me
By a sweet, unconscious child—
A baby girl scarce four years old,
With blue eyes soft and mild.
It happened on a rainy day;
I, seated in a car,
Was thinking as I neared my home,
Of the continual jar
And discord that pervade the air
Of busy city life,
Each caring but for "number one,"
Self gain provoking strife.
The gloomy weather seemed to cast
On every face a shade,
But on one countenance were lines
By sorrow deeply laid.
With low bowed head and hands clasped close
She sat, so poor and old,
Nor seemed to heed the scornful glance
From eyes unkind and cold.
I looked again. Oh, sweet indeed,
The sight that met my eyes!
Sitting upon her mother's lap,
With baby face so wise,
Was a wee child with sunny curls,
Blue eyes and dimpled chin,
And a young, pure and loving heart,
Unstained as yet by sin.
Upon the woman poor and sad
Her eyes in wonder fell,
Till wonder changed to pitying love.
Her thoughts, oh, who could tell?
Her tiny hands four roses held;
She looked them o'er and o'er,
Then choosing out the largest one
She struggled to the floor.
Across the swaying car she went Straight to the woman's side,
And putting in the wrinkled hand
The rose, she ran to hide
Her little face in mother's lap,
Fearing she had done wrong,
Not knowing, baby as she was,
That she had helped along
The up-hill road of life a soul
Cast down, discouraged quite,
As on the woman's face there broke
A flood of joyous light.
Dear little child! she was indeed
A messenger of love,
Sent to that woman's lonely heart
From the great Heart above.
This world would be a different place,
Were each to give to those Whose hearts are sad, as much of love
As went with baby's rose.

ADAM CLARKE ON DANCING.—I learned to dance; I grew passionately fond of it. Would scarcely walk but in measured time, and was constantly tripping, moving and shuffling in all times and places. I grew impatient of control, was fond of company, and wished to mingle more than I had ever done with young people. I also got a passion for better clothing than that which fell to my lot in life, and was discontented when I found a neighbor's son dressed better than myself. I lost the spirit of subordination; did not love work; imbibed the spirit of idleness, and, in short, drank in all the brain-sickening effluvia of pleasure. The authority of my parents was feared, but not respected, and few serious impressions could prevail in a mind imbued now with frivolity.

Dancing was to me a perverting influence, an unmixed moral evil. It drowned the vo of a well-instructed conscience, and was first cause of impelling me to seek my ha ness in this life. And I can testify that I h known it to produce in others the same evil produced in me. I consider it therefore, branch of that worldly education which le from heaven to earth, from things spiritua things sensual, and from God to Satan. them plead for it who will, I know it to be and that only. They who bring up their c dren in this way, or send them to those sch where dancing is taught, are consecrating t to the service of Moloch. "No man in his se will dance," said Cicero, a heathen. Shame those Christians who advocate a cause by wh many sons have become profligate and m daughters have been ruined.

New Jersey's Buried Forests.

An industry, the like of which does not e anywhere else in the world, furnishes score people about Dennisville with remunera employment, and has made comfortable tunes for many citizens. It is the novel b ness of mining cedar trees—digging from beneath the surface immense logs of sound aromatic cedar. The fallen and submer cedar forests of southern New Jersey discovered first beneath the Dennisville swa seventy-five years ago, and have been a so of constant interest to geologists and sci ists generally ever since. There are stan at the present day no such enormous s mens of the cedar anywhere on the face of globe as are found imbedded in the deep n of the Dennisville swamps. Some of the t have been uncovered measuring six feet i ameter, and trees four feet through are mon.

Although ages must have passed since t great forests fell and became covered r feet beneath the surface, such trees as according to the scientific theory, while were yet living trees, are as sound to-da they were the day of their uprooting. trees are called "windfalls" in the nome ture of the cedar mines, as it is thought were torn up by the roots during some ter gale of the unknown past. Others are f in the wreck that were evidently dead when they fell, and to these the miners given the name of "break downs." The culiar action of the water in the swamp kept these break downs in the same sta decay they were in when they fell as the agency has preserved intact the soundne the living trees.

The theory of those who have made mysterious collection of buried cedar tr study is that they in some unknown age fo a vast forest that grew in a fresh-water or swamp that covered this portion of Jersey, the properties of the soil of w were necessary to the forest's existence. cording to Clarence Deming and Dr. Ma Beasley, eminent geological authorities South Jersey, the sea either broke in upo swamps or the land subsided and the salt w reached the trees. This destroyed the li many of them, and subsequently some p toric cyclone swept over the forest and elled it to the earth. The heavy trees g ally sank into the soft soil of the swamps they reached the substantial earth or roc th it, where they reposed, unknown and unurbed, until their presence was accidentdiscovered in 1812. Ever since then the have been mined and have been an imtant factor in the commercial and business sperity of South Jersey.

he buried forest lies at various depths in swamp, and the uncovering of the trees or king the "cedar mine" is done in a very ple and easy manner. The log miner en- the swamp and prods in the soft soil with ng, sharp iron rod. The trees lie so thick eath the surface that the rod cannot be ned down amiss on its testing errand, for prodding is not so much in search of a tree t is to test whether the tree is a "wind-" or a "breakdown." When the prod kes the log the miner chips off a piece with sharp point of the tool, which brings the or splinter to the surface when drawn out he muck. By the appearance and odor of chip the miner can tell at once whether tree he has tested is a sound or a dead . If the former, he quickly ascertains the th of the trunk by prodding along from end of it to the other.

hat ascertained he proceeds at once to e the log from its hidden bed. He works n through the mud a saw similar to those l in sawing out ice in filling an icehouse. h this he saws the log in two near the roots e cares to. The top of the tree is next ed off in the same way, and then the big ar stick is ready to be released from its ing place. A ditch is dug down to the log, trunk is loosened by cant hooks, and it s with the water to the surface of the h. A curious thing is noticed about these s when they come to the surface, and that hat they invariably turn over with their om sides up. After mining the log is ly "snaked out" of the swamp and is ready the mill or factory.

hese ancient trees are of a white variety of ar, and when cut have the same aromatic or intensified many degrees that the com- red cedar of the recent day has. The od is of a delicate flesh color. One of the sterious characteristics of these long-sunken es is that not one has ever been found to be erlogged in the slightest. It is impossible ell how many layers deep these cedars lie he swamps, but it is certain there are sev- layers, and that with all the work that has n done in constantly mining them during ee-quarters of a century the first layer has yet been removed from the depths. At e places in the Dennisville swamp the soil sunk in for several feet and become dry, there the fallen cedars may be seen lying great heaps, one upon the other. No tree ever been removed from the Dennisville amp from a greater depth than five feet, but side of the limits of the swamp they have n found at a great depth, which shows the rectness of the deep layer theory. Near shore of the Delaware, eight miles from nnisville, white cedar logs have been exned from a depth of twelve feet. At Cape y, twenty miles distant, drillers of an Artesn well struck one of the trees ninety feet ow the surface. It was lying in alluvial posit similar to the Dennisville swamp. Another log was found at Cape May twenty feet ow the surface, and a third at a depth of seventy feet. These deep-buried logs were among the largest ever brought to light, and their location so far away from the Dennisville marsh indicates the great extent of that ancient forest area.

The uses to which the cedar logs are put are many. The principal use is the making of shingles and staves. The longevity of articles made from this wood is shown in shingles, tubs, pails and casks made from it over seventy years ago, and which have yet to show the slightest indication of decay. The shingles and staves are worked into shape entirely by hand, the only machine work that is permitted in manipulating the cedar log being the sawing of them in proper lengths for the uses to which the lumber is to be put. The Dennisville cedar shingles command a price much higher than the best pine or chestnut shingles.

What it is in the amber-colored swamp water and red muck at Dennisville that preserves these trees so that, after the lapse of centuries, their fibre is as clean and smooth and strong as it was when the green branches of the cedar were waving over the swamp, is a mystery that scientific men have as yet been unable to solve.—Selected.

For "The Friend."

The More Sure Word of Prophecy.

In reading afresh some ancient memorials of early Friends, those glorious sons of the morning into whose labors we have entered, and whose memory is now too much set at nought, we have been led into renewed admiration of the "burning and shining light" they were enabled to hold up to the world through their close abiding near and under that inspeaking word which only is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and which "divides between joints and marrow."

While this inward principle of light and life is sorely departed from, and set at naught by the professors of our dignified name, we believe there are many amongst serious professors in other denominations who are looking toward the "more sure word of prophecy" as a thing to be found only within, and as being the fulfilment of the blessed promise, "Lo I am with you alway, even to the end of the world."

In accordance with this principle, it is related that the wife of a clergyman observed to him on their way from home one morning, that his preaching that day was very interesting and tedious. "Why," said he, "how so? did I not tell you the truth?" "Yes," she answered, "you did; it was all truth as to words, and so it would have been if you had stood in your pulpit all day and told me my name was Mary!"

Some remarks on the ministry, taken from the journal of William Matthews, who visited Great Britain as a minister of the Gospel in 1781:

"I have been led in a line that cut me off from flattery and applause, yet I never found any true or solid peace in anything but being faithful to God and man. I believe that our Society has suffered much loss by a floating ministry, that hath a tendency to lead the mind from inward humble waiting on the pure gift. I have been much concerned on account of so many words among Friends, and I have endeavored both by precept and example to promote silent waiting.

"In the exercise of the ministry there is great care necessary to keep down to the gift—waiting for words to be clearly opened, whatever may be the thoughts and expectations of the people.

"When the life lies low, if a proper care is not observed, there may be an overrunning of the gift, and ministering of our own, instead of that which proceedeth from the opening of the pure gospel spring. Thus the life is obstructed, though there may be great warmth of zeal and sound words, and while those who are preserved alive are burdened and oppressed, in others the creaturely part may seem affected. But if what is delivered doth not proceed from the spirit of Truth it cannot minister to the spirit, nor reach further than to that which is of its own nature the creaturely part.

"Were all those who are called into the work of the ministry to keep near the humbling power of Truth, and by example as well as precept to preach to the people, the advantage of a self-denying life, and that a little is enough for a Christian, truth and righteousness would more abundantly spread and increase on the earth."

Unconcern.

When the capital of Russia was occupied by the victorious French some of the officers, it is stated, repaired to a deserted palace for the purpose of holding a carnival. The gay French ladies who had accompanied the invading army, appeared in due time, lavishly adorned for the festivity, while chivalrous officers in faultless garb joined hands in the merriment.

During the night the city was fired, and although the conflagration spread with great rapidity, the merry dancing continued. The fire was readily seen, but the dancers realized no danger. Again and again some of them would go to a window and gaze upon the vast flames that swept over the city, doubtless with feeling of dread—yet they would turn again to their revelry.

Finally it was declared that the fire was quite near, and that it had actually reached the building just adjoining the one which they were then occupying. The tripping of the dancers stopped, and the thought of immediate flight took possession of all. Yet a daring young officer at this moment raised his hand, and enthusiastically exclaimed, "Just one dance more!" The most of those assembled seemed to drink in this spirit of recklessness," and "Just one dance more!" came from many of the doomed people.

The dance proceeded, the music continued, but, louder than the sounds of gay music and pattering feet, all at once was heard the terrible warning, "The fire has reached the magazine!" For a second, as though paralyzed with fear, the dancers stood helpless and awestricken. Instantly an awful explosion took place, the building was hurled into atoms, and in a flash the gay and, it is to be feared, Christless, were hurled into eternity.

The careless man and woman—that is, the pleasure-seeking worldling, is as unconcerned and careless in the matter of their soul's salvation as the gay dancers regarding the fire which caused their death. Again and again they are warned by sermons, tracts, the earnest expostulations of Christians, and above all, by the declaration of the Word of God and the convictions of his Spirit, yet to all they turn a deaf ear. When reminded of death, the grave, judgment to come, and an endless eternity, they often listen for the time being, but soon the impression wears off, and again they rush into the giddy round of worldliness.

"He that, being reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy" (Prov. xxix : 1).—The Old Path.

A Faithful Workman.

None come so near being "independent" as those who make their own fortune. None are so heavy a burden to the world as those who wait for luck to make them rich, or complain that they were not born so.

The contrast between the high-minded and the low-minded way of living and doing is well shown in the following story from an exchange:

Several years ago a large number of men were employed, not far from Boston, to fill some unsightly salt water flats and raise them above tidewater.

One day—it was eleven o'clock in the forenoon—the contractor went out to where a separate gang were at work in building a seawall, and when he reached the spot he found a solitary man busy on the face of the wall. He had a bucket of cement, and a trowel, and was engaged in "pointing" the said wall—that is, neatly filling in the seams and interstices with bits of stone and cement. It was nice work, and required a competent workman. But why was this man here alone ?"

"Where are the rest of the workmen ?"

"It's eleven o'clock, sir, and they've gone to old Cafferty's after their beer."

"Don't you go with them ?"

"No, sir. In the first place, I don't want the beer. I'm better off without it. And, in the next place, I can't make it seem right to take that time that is not mine."

"You are right, young man—perfectly right." And then the contractor looked the workman over more critically. He was young—not more than two or three-and-twenty ; a strong, well-knit, handsome youth, with an intelligent face, and an eye as bright as a sapphire.

"Tell me, my friend," the contractor pursued, after his survey, "if you have fixed upon this course from any principle—that is, if you have a reason for it."

The workman looked, for a few moments, a little puzzled. He did not at first catch the contractor's meaning. But presently his face brightened, and he seemed to grow taller as he answered,—

"Ah, I see. You mean to ask me if I do this because I think it is right ?"

The gentleman nodded, whereupon the other went on :

"Why, no, sir—I can't say it's exactly that. I'd do right anyhow, simply because it is right ; but I do this because I want, one of these days, to be somebody—to succeed in business—to do something better than working on a level with a gang of navies."

"Yes, yes," nodded the contractor, smiling. "I think we now understand each other. Do you know who I am !"

"No, sir."

"Well, I think I once hired the man that hired you. However—you know where your contractor's office—where the paymaster' office—is ?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then, my man, do you call there this evening, half an hour after you have quit your work here."

At the appointed time our young workman presented himself at the office, where he found, first, that it was his employer who had spoken with him that forenoon ; and, second, he found that said employer, or contractor, was in want of a trusty agent into whose hands he could consign the entire charge of overlooking the workmen and the work. In less than a year the young man owned stock in the enterprise, and in ten years from that day he was one of the leading citizens of New England's metropolis—Youth's Companion.

For "The Friend."

Who Shall Inherit ?

"This is the heir ; come, let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours" (Luke xx : 14).

The above are the words of the wicked husbandmen, who failed to return the fruits of the vineyard in their season. The heir is the son who alone is the rightful heir to the father. The whole parable is a lively symbol not only of the high professing scribes and pharisees to whom it was first spoken, but also of all who like them make a loud profession of religion before men, and yet bring not forth the never failing fruits of true religion, such as holiness, virtue, truth and love, fruits well pleasing and acceptable to God, and approved of men.

Behold then the son and heir coming in the dignity of the father demanding his dues, and then turn to the conspirators harboring wicked thoughts, vainly flattering themselves that by violence they can wrest the ownership from their lord. These wicked thoughts become parents to wicked deeds, and they slay the son. "What, then, shall the lord of those wicked servants do? He will come and destroy them and give the vineyard to others, who shall yield the fruits in their season."

Life is ours with all its wondrous faculties and enjoyments, with grace divine, containing promises in embryo of heavenly bliss below, and eternal life and glory above. It is true that the Father sent the Son to die for all, that all might live, but not less true it is, He tasted death for all, because that all have died. If then men have died to God, they live in sin, and such were these who stood before the Son. The wicked thoughts, which bear sway in them, are but the blossoms which bear the fruit of death. Nor are we a whit better than they if in us self reigns supreme, and God is not our chief joy. This self must die if we would that the Son should reign and his will be done in us. In mercy, then, He comes to do this work, to change our heart from hate, rebellion and sin, to love, obedience and righteousness.

The Lord of all as pilgrim man, ascending Mount Olive's slopes, rejoices in his works, and yet he mourns for man, and with tears of unfeigned sorrow, wept over the impenitent ; and even now the same, He comes and cries to such appealingly, "My Son, give me thine heart." Whilst enemies to God, and lost in sin, He so loved us, that to save us from death, our legal due, He died upon the cross, that we might die to sin and live to Him who died for us. Who, then, could doubt his love? Love, so manifest, that Christ sho say, "and I, if I be lifted up will draw all unto me." Oh! let us not, then, refuse s pardoning love and mercy, but believing, co and taste and see how good He is to those w put their trust in Him.

As the Almighty Father by his power rai the Son, and gives to Him his power in all fulness to raise from sin and death whomsoe He will, oh, believe Him, then, to be able succor and to save to the uttermost from ev sin all those who come unto God through H He can and will save me, as I come in the le ings of the Father, and as I believe in the S my Father.

Thou, oh gentle reader, and all they, w touched by the Father's love, with eyes lightened to see themselves as sinners, grieved thereby, do weeping come, and s that Saviour (whoever seeketh them), thes do surely find. Their tears, He dries, t feet, sore walking in the paths of sin, washes, that, made clean, they may tread path of holiness and walk with Him. His and peace is theirs. In heaven's radiance light and love with Him they walk, and, k ing close to his side, He shields them f every danger. Walking in his name, they o come. These, these are they, who when fi battle is o'er, their faith intact, victory s crown their banners ; these shall inherit God's kingdom of glory, as they have faithf served in his kingdom of grace. Introver then, our minds, solemn is the thought, "W is our hope? Shall I, wilt thou, be there?

HELPING THE WEAK.—It is possible the a lesson for others who are not newsboys st gling to make a living, in this little story f the Endeavor Banner:

"Here, boy, let me have a Sun."

"Can't nohow, mister."

"Why not? You've got them. I heard a minute ago cry loud enough to be hear the City Hall."

"Yes, but that was down t'other block know, where I hollered."

"What does that matter? Come, now fooling; hand me out a paper. I'm in a hur

"Couldn't sell you a paper in this here bl mister, cos it belongs to Limpy. He's jus to the furder end now; you'll meet him."

"And who is Limpy, pray? And why he have this especial block ?"

"Cos us other kids agreed to let him it. Ye see, its a good run on 'count of offices all along, and the poor chap is that he can't git around lively like the rest o so we agreed that the first one caught s on this beat should be lit on and thras See ?"

"Yes; I do see. So you newsboys ha sort of brotherhood among yourselves?"

"Well, we're going to look out for a cove what's lame, anyhow!"

"There comes Limpy now. He's a fortu boy to have such kind friends."

The gentleman bought two papers of and went on his way down town, wondering many men in business would refuse to sell wares in order to give their weak, ha brother a chance in a clear field.

A New Revolt From Romanism.

The following letter written by Andre Bourr to the Bishop of Marseilles, renouncing his esthood and interest in the Roman Catholic urch, is one of many similar ones said to e been sent by priests in France to their lesiastical superiors. Andre Bourrier is editor of Le Chretien Francaise, the organ he new Protestant movement among priests, published in Paris :

Monseigneur : In sending you my resignation one of your clergy, I believe it to be my y to give you the motives which have caused to make this decision. Age, experience, above all, the candid study of the Gospel of the first centuries of Christianity have greatly modified the teachings and the judices with which my early ministry was rished. I see myself compelled to recog- that I was born in a Church in which new wths and the interests of men have utterly nged the simplicity of the Gospel. I can- recover in its dogmatic subtleties, nor in rge proportion of its practices and ritual, beautiful religion of Christ.

You have had cognizance, Monseigneur, of se troubles of conscience which for a num- of years have been the torment of my life. have not forgotten my agonies while I e tried these ten years past to break the ds, so strong and so tender, which held me to all that I had known and loved up to t time. You then demanded from me my esion to the declaration of faith of Pius and that I gave you. I submitted myself he examinations which you were pleased mpose upon me. But I did not at all re- er the peace of mind which was promised ne.

You know how to make a man suffer ; you w not how to give peace. With loyalty courage, I forced myself to bend my rea- and my will to the demands of the Roman h. I did everything to persuade myself of truth of that faith, since the Roman Cath- faith consists, not in believing, but in be- ing that one must believe. To-day I have n twenty years in the ministry, and during of these twenty years I have carried on debate with myself in such a crisis of con- nce. The day has come when I see it is ally impossible and culpable to continue this fe. Moreover, I have suffered enough to ognize that it is even more grievous to nple on one's conscience than on one's heart. make my exit from the Roman Church, not the door of skepticism or of unbelief, but reason of my faith in Jesus Christ, the only iour and exclusive Mediator (Acts iv., 12 ; 1 othy ii.: 5).

n your Church you have multiplied saviours have admitted means of salvation the most rse, and indeed the most fantastical, ac- ling to the fashion of the hour. The succ- and popularity of these exhibitions have pletely perverted the principal truths of Christian faith—the Incarnation and Re- ption. But I find in the Roman Church no er the Gospel which has been revealed, that ch the Apostles preached and which I ought refer to every other gospel even were it ight to me by an angel from heaven) Gal.).

I could find again that Gospel in Roman- I would not give up a position which as- sures me of worldly honors, with the material advantages of a life at once easy and agreeable. If I did not believe as I do, I might try, like so many others, to reconcile the exercise of my ministry with a conscience fortified by the subtleties of casuistry, and I would not expose myself to the injuries and enmities which, it may be, will be the consequence of the sincerity of my faith. But I believe it is better to say, with Saint Paul, "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ" (Phil. iii.: 7).

To sum up all, I am convinced that the Gospel alone will save modern society ; convinced that the Roman Church cannot, without abjuring itself, place the Gospel in the hands of the people ; convinced that the Catechism does not compensate for the loss of the Gospel. Such, Monseigneur, are the motives of the decision which I make this day in the full enjoyment both of my reason and of my liberty. Faithful to my vocation, I shall consecrate the remainder of my life to the service of God, only too happy to be permitted henceforth to preach my Saviour, with fidelity to his word, and set free from the fear of men. I declare to you that I shall publish this letter hereafter in case I shall deem it necessary to furnish my friends with this frank explanation of my conduct.

A Talk With Boys.

To be brave is to be willing to suffer rather than to do wrong, or in order to do good. The Bible has a great deal to say about bravery. All the great and good men in the Bible were brave men. Abraham was a brave man ; he dared to leave his home, and friends, and native country, and go out in a strange land to worship God. Joseph was a brave man, and kept up a good heart in slavery and in prison in Egypt, and dared to do right and confess God to be his God when he was brought out of his dungeon into the court of Pharaoh. Moses was a brave man, and was not afraid to obey God and lead the children of Israel out into the wilderness to a land he knew nothing about. David was a brave boy, and was not afraid to attack the lion and the bear when he was left to defend his father's sheep. So all through the Bible ; all its great and good men were brave men. They dared to do right. They were willing to suffer for the sake of doing right. The boy or man, or girl or woman, who is not willing to suffer for the sake of doing good is a coward.

In the stories we read, the boys and girls who are brave are very apt not to suffer after all. Their bravery saves them. It is sometimes so in real life. Daniel was brave, and God saved him from the lions. The three Hebrew children were brave, and were willing to be cast into a fiery furnace rather than to worship an idol ; God saved them and they were not burned. But a great many men and boys have suffered although they were brave. They might have escaped the suffering, but they chose to suffer, and even to die rather than to do wrong. And they did suffer and die.

A train on the Pennsylvania Railroad was running thirty or forty miles an hour. The fireman threw open the door of the furnace to throw in coal, and the flames burst out with a tremendous blaze and roar. They caught on the woodwork and enveloped the engineer. He could have jumped from the engine and saved his life. But if he had the train would have rushed on, and the flames would have rushed back and burned the passengers. He would not desert his post. He seized the lever, reversed the engine, and stood still amid the flames until the train was stopped. The lives of the passengers were saved, but he was so badly burned that he died in a few hours. He was a martyr to his duty. He was a brave man.

One night a fire broke out in a tenement house in New York City. A family who lived in a fourth story escaped to the street, but in the terror of the moment left the baby behind. The baby's older brother, a little boy of twelve, bravely mounted through smoke and flame the three flights of stairs, not knowing whether he should be able to get back or not. He found the baby, caught it up in his arms and brought it safely down. He saved the baby and he saved himself, but he was so badly burned that he had to be carried to the hospital to be nursed and taken eare of. He was a brave boy. He was willing to suffer for the sake of his baby sister.

A little boy and girl were playing by a bonfire. The girl was sitting before the fire when somehow her apron of cotton caught fire and began to blaze up about her. She screamed with terror. Her little brother did not scream or run for help ; he caught hold of the blazing apron and tore it off her, and threw it upon the ground and trampled the flames out. He carried the scar of the burns on his hands for many days. It took a brave boy to do that ; a boy that was willing to suffer to save his sister.

Be brave, boys ! You cannot be like Christ unless you are brave ; unless you are willing to suffer for the sake of others.

WHEN a bell is cast, two moulds of sand are made, an inner and an outer, so arranged as to form between them presisely the shape desired for the bell. The metal is poured in, and then the moulds are broken. But that form is not destroyed, it is only fulfilled, and the bell rings out the glad song of fulfillment.—Peloubet.

Correspondence.

"Things new and old" have life when seasoned with the right leaven.

We enjoy "quotations from others," and judging from my own incomplete modes of expression, am aware that there is scarcity of suitable original matter among our people.

Could not a short treatise be prepared setting our views in a clear outline by a comparison of the Old and the New Dispensations, showing how, when the Spirit of Truth is come, it will lead into all the Truth? The face to face sight for those who are born again is the first essential to a right knowledge of religion.

Items Concerning the Society.

In the original Latin of the Apology, for it was first written in Latin, Barclay does not vouch for the truth of the account of the Arabian "Hai Eben Yokdan" (which was expunged from editions later than 1779 by London Yearly Meeting), but he seems to be quoting it as showing the view held by its author. The question therefore arises whether Barclay is responsible for the different turn given to it in the English version.—Lecture by J. R. Harris.

In No. 29 of our present volume we presented a table of statistics of the several Quarterly Meetings of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends. Some readers may now be interested to note, by comparison, the following similar table prepared from returns sent up by its Quarterly Meetings to the recent Yearly Meeting of those who assembled at Fifteenth and Race Streets. SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The exports of merchandise from the United States during Fourth Month reached $40,000,000, the greatest for any month in our history.

The Washington correspondent of the Public Ledger says: "The new census of Cuba reveals a queer fact as to the population of the island. There is a large excess of males over females. After the Ten Year War the same fact, it is said, was shown by the Spanish census, and now after the four more years of war there are 57,613 more men than women in the islands. A comparison of the last Spanish census, that of 1887, with that of 1900, shows that the excess of males is less than formerly. In 1887 there were 123,799 more males than females. In the interval since the females have increased by 14,294, and the males decreased by 51,202. This was an increase of 2 per cent. in the one sex and a decrease of 6 per cent. in the other. Strange as it may seem, this excess of males in Cuba has existed ever since 1775, and has been a constant characteristic of the population of the island. There is significance in the character of the excess of either sex over the other. For instance, among the negroes there are 10,842 more women than men. Among the mixed bloods, 19,805 more women than men, and among the native white, 15,553. But among the foreign born white there are 89,282 more men than women, and among the Chinese 14,531. The Chinese are gradually disappearing from the island. The climate and the work wear them out. Many leave for other lands. They began to go there in 1847, and in fifteen years there were 34,334 on the island. There are now but 14,857. Cuba has 552,928 "schoolable" children, between 5 and 17 years of age, and but 90,072 go to school. This indicates the large field of work that lies before the philanthropic educator."

A despatch of Fifth Month 23d, from New York, says: "The Compania Trans-Atlantica Espanola, which for some ten years prior to the Spanish war maintained a regular service between this port and ports in Cuba and Mexico, will on June 5 begin running steamships on its new line, which is to engage in a general freight and passenger business between this port and Spain. The first vessel, the Cataluna, is scheduled to sail on the date named for Cadiz, Barcelona and Genoa. Ships will be despatched once a month for the present, and should the business done meet the company's expectations, additional sailings will be arranged. Vessels of this line before sailing from this port for Spain will make the round voyage between this port, Havana and Vera Cruz, Mexico."

The San Francisco Board of Health issued a statement on Fifth Month 22d, that there was no living case of the plague in that city. The house to house inspection is to be continued, but the compulsory inoculation of the Chinese is not to be attempted.

Over one billion feet of logs were cut in the pine forests of Minnesota during the season just closed. The industry in the state employs about 16,000 men.

Lobsters are so scarce along the New England coast that the imports of the live shellfish from the Canadian maritime province promises to be larger than ever for this fiscal year.

The total eclipse of the sun was observed under most favorable circumstances, from Norfolk, Va., through the whole belt of totality in the Southeastern States. The result will be looked forward to with much interest, when the reports from the various stations are received.

There were 424 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 111 less than the previous week and 41 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 210 were males and 214 females; 58 died of pneumonia; 43 of consumption; 41 of heart diseases; 16 of convulsions; 16 of cancer; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of nephritis; 15 of inanition; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of measles; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of bronchitis; 11 of marasmus; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of jaundice; 9 of Bright's disease, and 9 from casualties.

FOREIGN—On the 22nd ult. the British War Office announced that a squadron of mounted infantry of General Methuen's force were ambushed in Natal Colony by the Boers. The casualties number sixty-six, including the Earl of de la Warr, who was wounded.

The actual invasion by the British forces of the Transvaal territory was begun on the 27th ult., and Lord Roberts has his headquarters about eight miles north of the Vaal River, in the South African Republic. Troops crossed at several points. There was some skirmishing, and there are intimations that the Boers are gathering to offer resistance to the advance.

Lord Roberts has wired the War office that there is urgent need of more rolling stock, and the London Daily Express asserts that contracts have been placed in the United States for fifty locomotives and many cars.

The London correspondent of the Public Ledger writes on Fifth Month 11th: "The development of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom from a somewhat indolent and pleasure loving race into an alert and military people, organized on business lines, has begun. The Prime minister has at last joined the ranks of those who consider that the country is not safe until her forces have been reorganized, developed and rearmed. There are many symptoms of the preoccupation, not only of members of the government, but of prominent men in the Opposition and in other walks of life, in the immediate task of strengthening the nation. Domestic politics are practically at a standstill. Questions that would have aroused keen interest even during the Tirah and Egyptian campaigns now fail to catch the public eye. Any one with his ear to the ground may hear the hum of preparation, while the somewhat sluggish and deliberate habits of British statesmen are quickened with a lively sense of danger on the horizon."

The great "celestial globe" of the Paris Exposition which caused the crowd to throng the foot bridge across the Avenue Suffren in numbers so great that the frail structure fell, is the greatest novelty of the exhibition. It is an immense sphere, 150 feet in diameter, resting upon four solid masses of masonry and piling. On its surface are the signs of the zodiac, the objects whence they take their names, the principal constellations and other illustrations of the heavenly chart. At night the elaborate design is brought out vividly by electric devices. Within the great globe is a smaller one, thirty feet in diameter, representing the earth and automatically exemplifying its diurnal rotation. An ingenious mechanical instrument gives the illusion of the moon in her nightly promenade. The machinery presents a complete sidereal picture and story, with at certain moments the phenomena of eclipses. Electric elevators carry passengers up through the interior. They can alight upon the earth and contemplate a cosmic spectacle of extraordinary charm, and not without scientific accuracy. The great globe is on the banks of the Seine.

The German Government has recently caused an inq to be made into the subject of lightning and its ef upon trees, the observations having been entrusted to overseers of nine foresting stations scattered through an area of nearly 50,000 acres in the district of Li It was found that of all forest trees the oak was most susceptible to the attacks of lightning. The forests w found to comprise various kinds of trees in the follo proportions: Beech, 70 per cent.; oak, 11 per cent.; 13 per cent.; and fir, 6 per cent. Of the 275 trees w suffered from lightning during a period of several ye no fewer than 58 per cent. were oaks, 21 per cent. 8 per cent. beeches and 7 per cent. pines. It is worthy that it has been stated by some English auth ties that the beech is seldom or never struck by lightn The truth of this statement has long been disproved, it is interesting to see that the beech in Germany app to be more often the subject of lightning stroke than pines.

A Religious Revolution.

therto the Society of Friends has been ely persuading others of the Spirit of h by the Scriptures ; now the day is dawn- hen a general need is discovered to be aded of the Scriptures by the witness of spirit.

deed this has ever been the secret opera- of convincement, with or without histori- vidences. It has ever been our reliance the first, that "It is the Spirit that bear- witness, because the Spirit is Truth." the first we have held that the product e Spirit is best vouched for by the Spirit. n an age when churches, owning no pri- rule but the scriptural or ritual letter, practically seeming to say, "We have o much as heard whether there be any Spirit," Friends believed it incumbent em that Christendom should hear. And ey mightily convinced many, "and that cly, showing by the Scriptures" that t was the Word, come into the world to witness for the Truth, and inwardly to to every man's condition.

this witness for the inspiration of Scrip- we must still cling, and to it others are ng as to the last hope of scriptural faith h also is the first), although they herald groupings in another dialect than ours, mix it with some conceptions which we the advance of the same light will dispel. e Literary Digest cites R. Heber Newton, otestant Episcopal Rector in a New York ch, as believing that a "new reformation" wning.

e primitive authority in Christianity, he was Jesus himself, who "spake as one ng authority." "To every question as to eason of his faith, the sufficient answer of disciple was: 'The Master taught us thus lieve.' But with the lapse of time, says Newton, this authority necessarily weak- and became second-hand, third-hand and fourth-hand testimony to what Jesus taught. Then an inevitable authority arose—the church —whose right to teach was unquestioned for a thousand years. 'With the incoming of the Reformation,' says Dr. Newton, 'a yeasty process began—the ferment of man's mind and soul.' It was an age when every received opinion was questioned and had to justify itself or be rejected. Yet, as in every new movement, a host of tares grew up with the wheat, and the wildest theories appeared upon every hand. Again, an authority to sift truth from error was needed, and the Bible was set up. No longer was it asked: 'What does the Church teach ?' but 'What does the Bible say ?' Says Dr. Newton:

"Every opinion was haled before this court. Every question was determined by it. Philosophy and science and art—all human knowledge was passed upon by this final court of appeals. Again, a satisfactory authority so long as it remained unchallenged. While men could receive it there was an unbounded comfort thus to be able to bring every doubt to a tribunal that could determine it finally.

"Our age sees an era closely paralleling the period in which Christianity arose and the period in which Protestantism broke from the great Catholic Church. Again man's mind is teeming with new, fresh thought. Novel knowledges are streaming in upon him from every side. The whole horizon of his outlook has changed. His mind is yeasting with new ideas. The old experience renews itself—a vast growth from the soul of man, alike of good and of evil, demanding once more an authority capable of sifting the true from the false and of deciding between the right and the wrong. Never was authority more needed than to-day —provided it be the right sort of authority. Never was authority more craved than to-day —so that it be an authority to which man's mind and conscience can cheerfully bow."

Dr. Newton believes that the ultimate court of appeal is that "Divine Reason" and "Word," called Logos in the original of the first chapter of John, and which means both; which as the witness for truth in man is "not the reason of Thomas Paine and the present-day realistic rationalists; but rather the 'Divine Reason' of Socrates, Plato, and the author of the Wisdom of Sirach. Reason in this sense means not merely or chiefly the rationalizing faculty, but the moral nature—'the whole spiritual being of man.' 'It is what conscience teaches,' says the writer, 'as well as what the intellect affirms, that, together with the voice of the heart, form the trinity of true authority—of Reason.' Dr. Newton thus concludes:

"There need be nothing surprising to the conservative Christian in thus accepting this Reason as the ultimate court of appeal in religion. What is the fundamental doctrine of the Christian Church, if it be not the doctrine of that divine Logos, ["the Word"], imminent in the universe, indwelling man; the light of his intelligence, his affections, and his conscience; the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world—the very light of God himself. We are bowing not to the human reason alone, but to the divine Reason of which it is the expression.

"And so we return, in the cycle of the church's story, to the primitive authority, in another and a deeper sense—the authority of the Master himself.' . . .

"The authority of Jesus was . . . the authority . . finding a voice in the individual man, who brought the spiritual conscience to the full, and so became himself a revelation of the indwelling Logos, or Reason, of God ?"

So with many a halting since the revelation of the Word to Fox and Barclay, tendencies continue pointing towards a more general acceptance of their position, as the doctrine of "the Word" and "right reason" was more safely expounded by Barclay.

A Topic, or a Message?

A daily paper last week quotes the following from the Universalist Leader. We commend the plain speaking and purport of the writer, while yet disposed to carry the subject farther:

LECTURING FROM THE PULPIT.

Preaching has not lost its hold on the people- but a good deal of lecturing and not a little read, ing of "essays" and "papers" in the pulpit, under the name of preaching has failed to draw and hold the interest of the general public. The "all round minister" who knows what his people are thinking about all the week, and who goes to his pulpit to tell them how to think their thinking according to his thinking, is apt to prove a weariness to flesh, mind and spirit. The fact that they have been thinking of secular things all the week and putting these thoughts into the great conflicts of the day is the reason why they want a change for Sunday. They do not want to leave religion out of their daily lives, but they do want to get some religion to put into their daily lives, and they come to church for it, but get too often a warmed-over mess of their everyday experiences.

A preacher may have a great subject, but no message. This, to our mind, makes the distinction between lecturing and preaching—not whether the matter delivered be secular things or religious truths, but whether it be a subject or a message that is delivered.

He who deals out a topic, however religious, scriptural or ably handled, as the fruit of his own talent, study and deliberate preparation, makes his discourse a lecture. But he whose one warrant for handing forth the truth is the immediate authority of the Holy Spirit, both as to the place where, and the time when, and the matter which is to be delivered, speaks such a message from the Holy One as may be called the true preaching. It may not be in enticing words of man's wisdom, as lecturing would naturally be, but though in stammering speech and with humble intellect, it will be in "demonstration of the Spirit and of power," and so only will it be preaching.

The prophets could handle events of their own day, and still be prophets ; we can handle things of their day, and even the prophets' own words, and be nothing but lecturers. It is not the subject-matter spoken, whether called secular or religious,—but it is the divine anointing that makes the preacher, whether he speak to the soul's condition through things of the day, as Jesus could speak of plowing, and house-building, and the weather, and the prophets also bring to view the signs of the times,—and still speak as one having authority.

We would, accordingly, look deeper than any present-day or ancient-day topics to find the lecturer or the preacher. We would look to the Divine spring itself of all true gospel ministry. We are not without critics among ourselves also who depend upon very superficial tokens to judge of a minister whether "he sounded like a lecturer" or was of the savor of life.

Other voices also are of late coming up from the various churches in frequent succession, complaining that entertainment disguised as worship no longer entertains or draws, but has proved its hollowness and had its day. "What is our next resource ?" is the question. Some answer, "a richer service"—that is, an increase of ritual, paraphernalia, ceremonies. What is this but the same principle of outward diversion from the inward seat of worship, under more solemn guise (which we have called disguise), rather than that which would gather the minds of the people inward to spirit and truth ? It is there that the Father seeketh to find his worshippers,—there indeed they must worship Him if they expect to worship truly.

Take these man-made attractions hence ; make not the Father's house an house of diversion, or any entertainment lower than the highest, which is intercourse with Him. Let that engagement be most absorbing, and it will drive out as "by the expulsive power of a new affection," the interests of the buying and the selling, the ear-charming and the eye-pleasing, "the seats of them that sell doves" as for worship. Nothing really draws like Christ lifted up from the earth. Determined to know nothing but Him and Him crucified, a church will find its truest prosperity and its most attractive power.

Seedless Oranges.

Twenty-five years ago there were no seedless or navel oranges grown. A few oranges were raised in Florida, but the bulk of the supply came from the Mediterranean, and the fruit was expensive. The annual yield of California oranges was less than five carloads. Now the annual orange yield in California is upward of 15,000 carloads, and the total amount invested is now something like $43,-000,000, while twenty-five years ago it was only $23,000. The introduction of the seedless, or navel orange has caused these changes. It has revolutionized the orange industry of the United States, drawing 13,000 men out of other pursuits, and has transformed vast areas of sun-baked land in California into beautiful orange groves. The New York Sun recently had an interesting article on the subject, from which we derive our information.

The first seedless orange trees were introduced in 1872 through the efforts of William F. Judson, United States Consul of Bahia, Brazil, who heard from the natives of a few trees in the swamp on the north bank of the Amazon, some sixty miles inward, which had no seeds. It seems that even in those days there were Consuls who were interested in scientific matters, and could foresee the economic value of a discovery of this kind. He sent a native up the river to get some shoots, and bring back some of the fruit. Several of the shoots were packed in moss and clay and were shipped to the Agricultural Department at Washington. They did not excite very much attention at first, but the next year Mr. Horatio Tibbitts asked the Agricultural Department for specimens of fruits and shrubs suitable for experimental propagation in Southern California. Among other things Mr. Tibbetts obtained the four surviving orange shoots from Brazil. They were shipped to Riverside, California, and were immediately planted. Even here the shoots appeared to have had bad luck; one died of neglect and another was chewed up by a cow. Five years passed and the two surviving trees come into bearing, and in the winter of 1878–79 they bore sixteen oranges of the seedless variety—the first ever grown in North America. Specimens were shown to orangemen and fruit-growers. At first they were sceptical as to whether the trees would bear annually such fine specimens. The second crop was awaited with great anxiety. There was about a box of oranges in the second year's crop, and they were even better than those of the first crop. Mr. Tibbetts was sure that there was a fortune in the new variety of oranges. For two years he experimented with propagating trees from shoots and cutting from his two seedless trees. His attempts were a failure, but finally he hit upon a scheme of budding from the seedless navel trees upon the seedling trees. Experiments along that line were successful, and it was found that a bud taken from one of the two Tibbetts trees and grafted into the bark of a seedling tree would grow to b limb which would grow seedless oranges. original orange branches were then cut a and the tree thereafter bore only the new riety of fruit. Work was carried on in ea est in the winter of 1882, and in the follow year the demand for buds was so large th dozen frequently sold for $5 and $1 each finally not considered excessive for a g bud. A fence was built around the two t to protect them, and a year or two later orange trees that had been propagated f the two original trees began to bear, and t furnished tens of thousands of navel b which were as good as those from the original trees. The industry has grown u now no one thinks of planting seedling oran and tens of thousands of seedling trees h been budded into navel orange trees, and t are many navel orange groves in the re which have yielded net profits of from $ to $300 an acre per year. A Plea in Behalf of Peace.

ESSED TO CHRISTIAN PROFESSORS OF EVERY NAME, BY PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

t is with love for our fellow-countrymen of ry class, and in that brotherly freedom ch is permitted and enjoined by the gospel we desire to call your attention to the re- nsibility which we all share in common, in ›ing the present and prospective relations veen our beloved country and other na- s. It has pleased the All-wise and benefi- Ruler of the universe to permit us to l a territory of vast extent and almost lim- ss resources. The form of government un- which we have grown and prospered is ad- ibly adapted to meet the needs of a free, ghtened and virtuous people. This, when inistered with an eye to their highest in- sts, and the favor of the Most High, pre- s a system which other nations may well re to make their own. Are we not, there- , bound in all gratitude to see to it that e rich blessings be not perverted to pur- ss out of harmony with the Divine govern- t?

et, as thoughtful observers of some of the its in which the United States has of late n a chief actor, we can scarcely fail to be essed with their disastrous and far-reach- character. They, and the causes which led up to them, are so fresh in the mem- of all that they need not be here recited. fact nevertheless remains that war, with ts horrors, has engaged our country for a period, and is still being persistently car- on in remote regions.

While present conditions continue, the dan- increases that in an outburst of popular ng, such as carried us into a war with n and opened the way for another with natives of the Philippines, we shall be ot entirely away from that safe position h hitherto the immense territory and the graphical outlines of the United States made it easy to maintain. Our people thus be plunged into the current which is threatening the peace of warlike nations upon self-aggrandizement.

ich considerations should be sufficient to g home to each one of us questions like e: "What is my attitude in this crisis, as ofessed follower of the Prince of Peace?" my influence decidedly felt in the commu- in which I live, in favor of some speedy, and peaceful settlement of the difficult blems that now confront the Federal au- ities?" "Or, through apathy as regards whole subject, or a careless acceptance of sentiments prevailing around me, or from cret fear of incurring the scorn or ridi- of others, am I shrinking from the plain to stand faithfully by my Divine Master, eachings find his example?"

We are familiar with the leading arguments reby it is sought to justify, or even com- d war, as the most satisfactory, if not the method, for settling international differ- es. That upon which much stress is laid nany professing Christians is the authority he Old Testament Scriptures, wherein are ›rded conflicts that evidently received the ne approval, and indeed command. To the consistent followers of Christ must y that, with a change of dispensations, e was introduced a rule of conduct which would substitute love for hatred, forgiveness for revenge, the returning of kindness for injuries—in short, "a new covenant" between God and man, which, as compared with the old, is surely "established upon better promises." Those, therefore, who acknowledge the binding authority of the latter, rejoice to realize that they are no longer "under the law, but under grace;" that the coming of the Saviour, whose name they love to bear, was heralded by the angelic strain, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill to ward men." This, to their view, expresses the whole scope of the gospel. They further remember the plain precepts contained in that memorable Sermon on the Mount, whereby the Master intended his disciples should order their daily lives and intercourse with their fel low-men.

All must admit that the spirit here inculcated is utterly repugnant to the strife, carnage, misery and destruction inseparable from every battle-field. In this connection, we may fitly recall our Lord's gracious declaration concerning himself. "The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them," and again, his express condemnation of war—"all they that take the sword shall perish by the sword." Following closely their Saviour's precepts and example, his apostles and their immediate converts could take no part in warfare, so that until near the middle of the second century of the Christian era scarcely a Christian soldier is upon record. When pressed into the Roman legions, these early disciples responded, "I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight." Nothing was then left them but to suffer.

The argument from expediency, although often urged, must occupy but a low place in influencing one whose standard of righteousness has been lifted above considerations of mere gain or selfish purposes when these plainly conflict with the higher rule received from Christ. Can that be expedient for him, which cannot fail to beget in his own breast wrath, hatred, revenge and deadly strife?

In order to reconcile a demand for personal military service with the repugnance which the Christian believer may well feel toward engaging in it, perhaps no more plausible or successful plea is urged than his paramount duty to the state. The love for one's country has very properly a strong place in the human breast, and is productive of many excellent results. So also is a loyal regard for its wholesome laws, and constituted authorities. But neither of these can be a sufficient warrant for the follower of Christ to violate by any act of his own what he is bound to believe is directly opposed to the teachings or commands of his Divine Master. One course only may be open to him, namely, a meek but firm refusal. The final result he must leave with Him for whose sake he is called to leave all, and whom he should be ready to follow, if need be, "to prison or to death." Nor is a moral courage thus displayed to be regarded as in anywise inferior in its character or results for good, to that of the man who, at the demand of his country, risks life and limb upon the field of battle.

Is war, however, inevitable? as is continually asserted. Indeed, would it occur where there is a disposition to refer the question at issue to one or more impartial judges? Such a method has been so frequently and successfully resorted to that it is no longer regarded as an expedient of doubtful value. Within the past century this reasonable, just and peaceful course has been adopted by our own or other nations in more than one hundred cases, and to more than half of these the United States has been a party. By the late Conference at the Hague a system was formulated that has met the approval of many of the most eminent statesmen and jurists of the present day. The acceptance of such a tribunal by the leading nations of the world, we believe, would go far toward the peaceful settlement of controversies that may hereafter arise.

It is, as we reverently believe, under the constraining spirit of the one Blessed Head of the Church that we have felt led in much brotherly love to call all who profess the name of Christ to divest themselves, if needful, of their preconceptions on the subject before us. These we cannot doubt are largely the result of early education and surroundings, or, it may be, to a ready acceptance of views advocated by the prevailing literature of the day, or, again, they may indicate a lack of faith in the teachings of the Saviour and their applicability to the present conditions of the world.

In order to reach right convictions regarding questions of vital importance to ourselves and our fellow-men, we all need a wisdom better than our own. By its aid we may find the plain teachings of the Lord Jesus directly at variance with those largely prevailing around us; indeed, they may be very difficult to reconcile with the line of reasoning whereby we may have reached certain conclusions. If this be so, let us remember with the deepest gratitude that, when our Lord was about to leave his sorrowing disciples, He sought to reassure their faith in Him by these ever memorable words: "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you; and I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of Truth." Elsewhere, when pressing upon them the keeping of his words or commandments, as the test of their love for Him, He continues: "These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost whom the Father will send in my name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you. He shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine and show it unto you."

When, therefore, we find ourselves confronted with problems very difficult of solution, and that, under our methods of reasoning, we often reach conclusions that are still both faulty and unsatisfactory to ourselves, let us reverently call to mind the gracious promises concerning the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, the sent of the Father in the name of the Son. As we pray for more and more of his quickening power, a light we may have never known before is thrown upon passages in the Holy Scriptures, which will make them plain to our spiritual vision. Misgivings as to the practical application of some of our Lord's precepts will vanish, and we shall perceive very clearly the points upon which they must always differ from that lower standard of truth and duty which man in his ignorance and rebelliousness has set up.

If these be not among the direct results of the enlightening, energizing power of the Holy Spirit, we may in all candor ask where else shall we look for them? How otherwise are we to interpret the offices and prerogatives of the Comforter, as set forth in the declaration of our Divine Master, already referred to? Is it not, then, for want of a fuller acceptance of just this doctrine that we see to-day so many evidences of weak convictions, a wavering faith, and so little of that courage which would lead men to meet loss, or scorn or death itself, rather than forsake "the truth as it is in Jesus." In what other direction, therefore, than among the professed followers of Christ shall we look for stanch and willing advocates of his gospel of love, mercy and peace?

The rightful position of the Church of Christ, as set forth by himself, is that of a leader not to be turned aside in its high mission for the regeneration and happiness of the world. Its voice is to give no uncertain sound, and the men and women who compose its membership are to be "as lights in the world," and as "the salt of the earth." Since we dare not assume that the commandments and teachings of our Blessed Saviour were delivered prematurely in point of time, we must believe they are especially applicable to the present conditions of the world, and that mankind is greatly the loser by not promptly accepting them in all the fullness of their blessing, and faithfully living up to them.

We rejoice to believe there is a large and increasing number, throughout the various branches of the professing Church, who have come to realize that, if the errors and evils and wretchedness that now abound are to be effectually met, it must be largely through the faithfulness of Christian believers. As these follow their own highest convictions of truth and duty, they will surely be drawn into closer fellowship with one another, and sweetly find that, in the one Master, all they are brethren. Thus also will be brought about the harmonious, if not united action, which can deal wisely and powerfully with evils, even so gigantic as war, and through the same instrumentality our own and other nations will be brought to seek the things that make for peace the world over.

When we consider the large proportion which the various organizations of professing Christians bear to the population of our own and other civilized countries; the general intelligence that characterizes them; or the high standard of virtue which they seek to uphold; it is not strange that the Church has come to be regarded as the highest human agency in the upward progress of our race. Let not such a hope be disappointed.

Holding a vantage ground so favorable, with purposes so exalted, and a power when rightly directed so vast both spiritually and numerically, must not the responsibility for the continuance of a system so anti-christian as war, fall directly upon the professing church? As we verily believe, in its hands rests to-day the peace of the world. If then this burden has been laid upon the church by its Holy Head, let it be borne in his name, and in the strength He will give for so blessed a service. While its mission is thus fraught with love and tender sympathy for the whole human race, it has none the less a conflict to maintain against wrong in every form, however specious. But let us remember that, although its weapons are not, and cannot be carnal, they are nevertheless "mighty through God to the pulling down" of those strongholds of evil which spring from the lusts and uncontrolled passions of men; that this contest for the truth and the right, though sharp and long, will in the end be victorious, and He shall thus reign who is "King of kings and Lord of lords." In this crowning victory let us remember every true-hearted follower of Christ will have a part, and in his daily life and the spirit which actuates him, he will be bearing a convincing testimony that "the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

Korean Girls and Boys.

As a little lass the Korean girl is taught all about domestic work, and begins early to assist her mother in making the family clothes. If too young to paste she can at least hold over the stove the long iron rod to be used in pressing seams. The heating of this rod is the first thing taught a little girl. Later she learns how to paste clothes together, then to wash and iron them.

Now, this use of paste instead of thread is a custom, so far as I know, practised only by the Koreans. It is done on account of their mode of ironing. To accomplish this difficult feat they rip their garments to pieces before putting them in water. After the washing garments are laid on a smooth block of wood or stone and are beaten with ironing sticks. These sticks resemble a policeman's club, and each ironer uses two.

Girls and boys wear their hair hanging in two plaits until engaged to be married, after which the boy fastens his on top of his head and the girl twists hers at the nape of her neck. Koreans hold marriage in high regard, and show a married man profound respect, while a bachelor is treated by them with marked contempt. I have seen men greet a slip of a boy wearing a topknot with ceremonious deference, saying to each other: "He is a man; he is about to be married;" while of a much older man, and possibly a richer, who wears his two plaits, they remark that, "He is a pig. He cannot get a wife. He will always be a boy."

In the choice of his first bride the Korean leaves everything to the "go-betweens." But of all other wives, and a Korean may have ten, the man makes his own selection. Women are well treated, and, as a rule, live happy, contented lives. They are gentle, attractive little bodies, and devoted to their homes. This is an interesting picture of the customs of an interesting people, but we must not forget that many of the Koreans are worshippers of idols still, although as a people they seem inclined to accept the teachings of the missionaries.

Ye Are Our Epistles.

Do not forget that your life may be the only Bible your neighbor ever reads. Your words, your actions, are spread ever before him, as so many pages to be read. He is forever scanning you carefully, looking for a blot here, a blemish there, of some absolute mistake. You may think lightly of some inconsistent action; he does not, and is quick to take advantage of such to defend his own short-comings. "[illegible] one argument I never could answer," said infidel after conversion, "was the consist life of my Christian mother."—Presbyterian

Starving and Feeding in Meetings.

LETTERS TO THE "LONDON FRIEND."

One of your correspondents spoke of a sm meeting, usually held in silence as "starvin and made an appeal for the crumbs which from the tables of richer meetings. This id tification of words with spiritual food, tho perhaps rarely so distinctly made, seems to grievously prevalent amongst us, whose p decessors in the faith strove so valiantly "bring us off from words." Not that our e leaders ever, so far as I know, preached t "silence was golden." It was certainly fr no preference for silent meetings, and from lack of the gift of eloquence in themsel that they inveighed against the hunger words, but rather because they knew, as we r all know, that the gift of God is indeed an speakable gift, that the shining into our hea of the light of the glory of God is still "in face of Jesus Christ," and that it is this wh makes the utterances of words or no word matter of no more account than the flitting light clouds between us and the sun. We know that when lighted up by that glory cloudlets may glow with ever-varying lov ness; indeed, I willingly acknowledge tha long succession of cloudless sunsets may h trial to the outward eye, and I can well bel that in meetings usually held in unbroken lence, a natural desire may be felt for o sional words. But is there not great ris our forgetting that the object of our mee together is not that we may teach or be tau by one another, but that we may unit watch for the Divine teaching, which a can never fail, and which is most deeply in the stillness?

The early Friends used to announce after the long night of the apostacy, the was come to teach his people himself. modern habits of thought tend, I believe rig to make us shrink from expressions attribu anything like a "new departure" to the High, whose unchangeableness we are lear more fully to recognize. But may we no far discern the signs of the times, and o man development, as to acknowledge tha world is once more being prepared, by t that has seemed to shake, or that has act shaken, our creeds if not our faith, for a s high tide of openness to the Divine teac and to that, in its directness, alone? Wo not be grievous if, just when the outer w is wearying of mere words and of human c to teach or to mould religious feeling, th Christian body which has dared to aim in t worship at that which is beyond words s allow itself to sink into dependence upon and upon human teaching.

I believe that the remedy for all our di ties about human ministry lies in looking h it, to the one "free Teacher;" who alon "speak to our condition;" in remembering our "meetings for worship" are not mee for hearing sermons, but meetings for un "watching unto prayer." If we steadily before our minds our supreme need of enl together into the immediate presence o ly in us as we are more and more closely brought face to face with the awful discipline of life; as we learn, or seek to learn, more and more of the meaning of life, and death, and judgment. We need each other's help in prayer—the further away from home and from peace we are the more sorely we need it—and to surround one another with the living atmosphere of silent prayer is, I believe (nay, I know, by the experience of what it has done for myself in meetings, mostly silent) the best help we can give to the many spirits wounded and bruised by self will and by doubt, who are yet groping their way toward the father's presence. Helpful as sermons are in their time and place, the most valuable sermon can yet not exert the peculiarly searching and healing power of silence. It cannot be good that the human voice should be forever coming between us and the One whom alone our souls need.

I know that there may be meetings in which the silence deserves to be called dead. I do not wish to make light of the evil of such a condition of things. But I do believe that the real remedy is not to be found inviting speakers, but rather in a truer sense of the great object for which we meet. Is it not best that we should face the truth of our own condition, and if human help fails, turn the more resolutely to the help which cannot fail?

Danger from Wild Beasts.

Lions, tigers and leopards are not necessarily eager to tear human beings to pieces. All the carnivora show a certain ferocity in hunting their prey, but one should remember that they hunt to live, and not only as amusement, says "Our Animal Friends." Undoubtedly, they enjoy the exercise of their powers, as every animal—including man—usually does. But their rule is to live in peace and harmony with one another, even when they are not of the same species.

At the time when they are building or choosing their homes and rearing their young they will quarrel over the best places for that purpose. That, however, is not a selfish quarrel; it means that they wish to give the best to their families instead of to their friends. When the breeding season is over the fox and the badger will share the same hole in perfect good fellowship all through the winter months, because, their young being able then to care for themselves, the cause of the quarrel is past and gone.

We must remember, too, that man is not the natural food of any animal. According to Cornish, "If the item 'man' were subtracted from the bill-of-fare of all the carnivora they would never want a meal." In jungle haunts, however, it is said that more "human beings are killed by tigers than by any other wild beast, except by starving wolves," and yet this is what Samuel Baker has noticed in the tiger:

"There is a great difference in the habits of tigers. Some exist upon game in the jungles; others prey especially upon the flocks belonging to villagers. A few are designated 'man-eaters.' These are sometimes naturally ferocious, and, having attacked a human being, may have devoured the body, and thus acquired a taste for human flesh; or they may have been wounded on more than one occasion, and have learned to regard man as a natural enemy. But more frequently the 'man-eater' is a very old tiger, or more probably tigress, that, having hunted in the neighborhood of villages and carried off some unfortunate woman, has discovered that it is far easier to kill a native than to hunt for jungle game."

The ordinary tiger is anxious to avoid men, and that is why tigers are more dangerous to hunt in high grass than in forests. In high grass they cannot see a man, or be seen by him, until he is close at hand; then who can blame the tiger for putting forth all his brute strength to get the better of an enemy? It takes two to make a quarrel, but it needs one to start it: and the beast is rarely the first to attack a man.

Riotous Persecution of Friends Opposed to War.

RESPONSE OF THE SUFFERERS.

The following letter by the members of the Rowntree family in Scarborough appeared in a Scarborough paper, England. William Smith, who also signs the letter, was badly assaulted, and the windows of his house were broken:

"It is our desire that the sores arising from the recent visit of Cronwright-Schreiner to Scarborough may speedily be healed, and as one contribution to this end we wish to state that it is not our intention to make any claim against the borough fund for property damaged or destroyed during the riots which occurred on the night of the reception given by one of our number. The loss of property, though not light to some of us, is as nothing compared with the peril to which some of those dearer to us than life were that night exposed, or with the loss of free speech won for us by brave men and women of old.

"We respectfully submit to our fellow-townsmen of all creeds and parties that the wrecking of buildings, and especially midnight assaults on the homes of women, children and aged persons, are acts of cruel lawlessness which nothing can justify. Inquiries made seem to show that the violence was chiefly the result of the delusion that the visitor to our town, a Colonial fellow-subject of British blood, who had come to lecture on 'The conditions of a durable peace in South Africa,' was a Boer, whose life might fairly be taken, and that it was encouraged by some who are supposed to know better. Edmund Burke's entreaty to his fellows, 'So to be patriots as not to forget to be gentlemen,' seems still to be needed. We are all at one in desiring the honor and greatness of our country; we are intensely anxious for the good name of the British Empire amongst the nations of the earth. But we hold that the fostering of prejudice and enmity, even against our foes, is in the long run hurtful to ourselves, and that injustice to strangers never leads to justice to our own people.

"Our convictions on some great questions are, we know, different from those of the majority of our fellow-countrymen; but for these convictions we must render our account not to man but to God. If we are wrong, resort to lynch-law will not set us right, whilst it inflicts serious injury on the whole community.

"We desire to acknowledge with sincere thanks many expressions of support and sympathy from both strangers and friends. History often has to reverse the popular verdicts of the day, and we believe it will reverse the verdict of violence which has been given against us.

ALONE WITH MY CONSCIENCE

I sat alone with my conscience
In a place where time had ceased,
And we talked of my former living,
In a land where the years increased.

And I felt I should have to answer
The question it put to me,
And face the answer and question
Throughout an eternity.

The ghosts of forgotten actions
Came floating before my sight,
And things that I thought were dead things
Were alive with a terrible might.

And the vision of my past life
Was an awful thing to face—
Alone with my conscience, sitting
In that solemnly silent place.

And I thought of a far-away warning,
Of a sorrow that was to be mine,
In a land that then was the future,
But now is the present time.

And I thought of my former thinking,
Of the Judgment day to be;
But sitting alone with my conscience
Seemed judgment enough for me.

And I wondered if there was a future
To this land beyond the grave;
But no one gave me an answer,
And no one came to save.

Then I felt that the future was present
And the present would never go by,
For it was but the thought of my past life
Grown into eternity.

Then I woke from my timely dreaming,
And the vision passed away;
And I knew that far-away warning
Was a warning of yesterday.

And I pray that I may not forget it,
In this land before the grave;
That I may not cry in the future
And no one come to save.

And so I have learned a lesson
Which I ought to have known before,
And which, though I learned it dreaming,
I hope to forget no more.

So I sit alone with my conscience
In the place where the years increase;
And I try to remember the future,
In the place where time will cease.

And I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful soe'er it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience
Will be judgment enough for me.

AN artist painted what he thought was a fine landscape. He was curious to know how the public regarded it. So he put it in a public place and posted a note, saying that anyone who saw a defect or bad point in the painting should make a chalk mark on it. When he came back he was driven half crazy, for it was a mass of chalk marks. He was about ready to give up and quit. Another thought came to him: he would change the card make it read that all who saw a good point in his work should mark it. He washed off the first marks and went away, and when he returned his delight was to find it again covered with marks.

For "THE FRIEND."

A Deeper Work of Grace.

"Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" Matt. vi: 27.

As man cannot then by his own will increase his natural growth, no more can he his spiritual growth. By excess and abuse he may retard his natural growth, as by indifference, neglect and rebellion he may his spiritual growth; yet in both cases it is God alone by his power gives the increase, and any work of grace in man is that "which God worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure" (Phil. ii: 13). And like as the potter frames each vessel for its special purpose, so does the Lord, as we yield ourselves to the power of his spirit, purify, mould and fit our hearts as fit receptacles of his grace.

To sustain the life born of the Spirit needs spiritual food. But food is given to satisfy hunger. So Christ Jesus says "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." And this God-given hunger which can be satisfied only with the bread that cometh down from heaven, becomes to us an evidence that we have of that life which cometh from God. The true child of God is not then always full, as some affirm who eat the food their own hands prepare, but rather does he know a hungering and of a being satisfied, as Paul says, "I know —both how to be abased, and I know how to abound . . . both to be full, and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need" (Phil. iv: 12). Again he says to the Corinthians, "God is able to make all grace abound toward you" (2 Cor. ix: 8). It is He who calls, who spreads the table, and who cries, "Eat, O my friends, drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved" (Cant. v: 1). It is the Lord's table.

Humbly yet fervently to desire to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord" is an acceptable attitude of soul toward God. It is "God who worketh in you." It is our place to watch, to wait, to hear and to obey; for the Lord by his Spirit prompts and leads into every good word and work which finds acceptance with Him. In that holy spiritual worship which God seeks at the hand of his children how requisite it is that there be a preparation of heart, as there was of the body under Moses' law. So David says, "Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the humble; thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear" (Ps. x: 17). And those who did not do so are spoken of as "a generation that prepared not their hearts" (Ps. lxxiii: 8 m. r.). No priest could officiate under the Mosaic law if he were not legally clean, nor will Christ Jesus our holier and higher priest, accept the offerings of unsanctified hearts. Nor are Christians a whit behind the Jew in the means of attaining this cleanness of heart, for "In that day (Christ's) there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness" (Zech. xiii: 1). The Jew had the laver wherein he might wash and be clean. Jesus said, "Now are ye clean through the word which I have spoken to you" (John xv: 3). Christ loved his church and gave himself for it, "that he might sanctify and cleanse it by the washing of water the word" (Eph. v: 26). In obedience to t inspeaking word of Christ, his people find me and drink, life and light, sanctification a justification, for they, as the apostle sa "are washed, sanctified and justified" by t spirit of promise coming in the name and pow of Jesus, their once crucified but now ris and glorified Lord, who now sitteth at the rig hand of power on high.

This is the true "grace of God which brin eth salvation, a salvation from the pollutio power and punishment of sin; for as Christ sus had power on earth to cleanse the lep raise the dead and to forgive sin, so now, exalt and all power in heaven and earth his, by grace or spirit can He quicken whom He w cleanse them from their sins, forgiving th freely for his own name's sake."

To be true to our profession as "Frien we must be doers of the word. To be do we must first be hearers, for under Chris dispensation "all shall be taught of Go The watchword of our early Friends was " tire to the inward grace." It is the grace our Lord Jesus Christ. It is a present ma festation of himself in spirit to the unbeli ing world and disobedient, as a reprover a condemner, to the believing and obedient teacher, a guide, a Comforter. It is gr which begins, carries on and completes t work of salvation in the heart, and prepa God's people for an entrance into blessedn beyond the grave. As we cease from our o willings and workings and come better to kn the voice of the Good Shepherd (for it is t as Jesus said, "My sheep hear my voice then shall we come better to apprehend Lord's message by Isaiah, "Thus saith Lord God, the Holy One of Israel; In retr ing and rest shall ye be saved; in quietn and in confidence shall be your strength" xxx: 15). Would we then enjoy commun with the Father of spirits we must retire fr the turmoil of human thoughts, that self t is to be denied, for our thoughts are not G nor are our ways his. Deep under the ten at Jerusalem were the cisterns that supp the waters for cleansing purposes; so dee the sanctuary of the heart is He found says of whoever believes in Him, "I will in him a well of water springing up into e lasting life." The springs and fountains f whence these cisterns received a never-fai supply were found in the hills surrounding city, hills used as a simile in Holy Writ of power and presence of God around his pe the new Jerusalem, forever. So all g cometh from God. "Every good gift every perfect gift is from above, and cor down from the Father of light, with who no varialeness, neither shadow of turn (James i: 17).

As we are found humbly and steadf concerned to hearken to and walk in this g (for to do so is to obey the voice of the l to walk in the grace and spirit of Chris walk with Jesus and with God), we shall surely know of a deepening in the wor grace, and shall be favored with a clearer of the redemption in Christ Jesus and a c communion and fellowship with God the F and our Lord Jesus Christ, and through one with another.

NOW A MAN OF WAR.—Those who know John D. Long only as Secretary of the Navy, and not as the translator of Virgil and the writer of some of the tenderest poems that have recently appeared, may be surprised to read the following lines from his pen written some years ago, and recently republished in the Christian Register:

I would, dear Jesus, I could break
The hedge that creeds and hearsay make;
And, like thy first disciples be
In person led and taught by thee.

I read thy words, so strong, so sweet;
I seek the footprints of thy feet;
But men so mystify the trace,
I long to see thee face to face.

Wouldst thou not let me at thy side,
In thee, in thee so sure, confide?
Like John, upon thy breast recline
And feel thy heart make mine divine?

Items Concerning the Society.

The American Friend's India Famine Relief Fund has nearly reached the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars.

"The Plea on Behalf of Peace" adopted by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has now been issued by its Meeting for Sufferings, and may be had at 304 Arch Street, and found in our present number.

Several Friends from Philadelphia and its neighborhood having visited the scene of Theophilus Waldmeir's labor in Palestine some two months since, we are now in receipt of a letter acknowledging his lively comfort and satisfaction in seeing them. The opening of the Asylum, towards which many Friends have contributed, was awaiting the arrival of the specialist physician, who had been taken sick on the way; and also of the European nursing staff.

Notes from Others.

The Trinity Church (New York) year book just issued, shows that contributions are given to twenty-eight churches, charitable and missionary institutions and funds outside the parish, amounting to $30,140; while collections and contributions throughout the parish amounted to $78,636.

A recent writer takes the view that ritualism is the natural expression of religious devotion and that the use of incense, candles, etc., has a rational basis in the demand of the sentimental nature for objects to fix the attention. There may be truth in the general statement, for it has been noticed that the older a denomination becomes, the more it is inclined toward a show in various directions. This elaboration, has, however, but one result, the substitution of the form for the substance, and when this change is completed, the result is almost certain to be a decadent spirituality.—St. Louis Christian Advocate.

NOT A HIRELING MINISTER.—Stephen S. Wise is about to leave his congregation in New York city for a poorer charge in Portland, Oregon. In his farewell last First-day, he said: "Think you that I could sever the thousand endearing ties that link me to you, and to the even dearer few of my own home; that I could abandon the associations of a lifetime; that caprice or ambition could induce me to go away—at what a cost you will never know—to begin life anew among a stranger people, did I not hear the commanding call to carry the word of God to a part of our country, in which—add your prayers to mine—it may be given to me to help build shrines for public worship, to form circles for sacred study, and to vitalize the word of God by making it live in men, women and children, to bring dignity, purpose and power to the life of Israel? The call has sounded in my heart. Eagerly do I follow it, grasping the opportunity to cause God's word to flourish in surpassing beauty."

WHAT IS A LADY?—There are not a few people who rebel against the terms lady and gentleman. They think man and woman are the most expressive and the most comprehensive designations, and even go so far as to say that the others savor of vulgarity. In the International Journal of Ethics a writer has endeavored to make it clear when we should say lady and when gentleman, and, in brief, he very strongly defends the employment of the two words. Perhaps of the two the term lady is more diffidently used. Somehow we would all rather say woman than lady in speaking, let us say, of Helen Gould, or the Baroness Burdett Coutts, or any other philanthropist. It seems almost undignified otherwise to describe them. But it is said that we are all wrong. We ought to differentiate between women, we are told, according to the degree in which intelligence, and, above all, good will have found expression in the detailed behavior of body and of mind. So that when we call this one a lady, we should, if we rightly used the term, be referring to some one of sterling worth, and thus a lady is higher than a mere woman, though she may have no social distinction whatever. As the writer of the article in the magazine referred to points out, there must always be the danger that the term is brought into ridicule by the sham claimants to the title. But that cannot be helped; no marked type can exist without its caricature. The point is that we should insist upon using the term in its best sense, and possibly its true significance will then come to be understood. For our own part we incline to the Lewis Carroll axiom, that if you take care of the sound, the sense will take care of itself, and there is a good, sound, sterling ring about the term man and woman that falls pleasantly enough on the ear. A careful selection of adjectives will make it abundantly clear whether in either the one or the other "humanity is perfectly achieved."—Ledger.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The monthly statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States shows that during Fifth Month, 1900, the receipts aggregated $45,166,053, and the expenditures $40,351,525, leaving a surplus for the month of $4,814,528. The surplus for the eleven months of the fiscal year is $63,335,000.

The House of Representatives, by a vote of 127 to 75, has agreed to the Senate amendment to the Sundry Civil bill, appropriating $5,000,000 for the Louisiana Purchase Exposition at St. Louis.

Ex-Governor Murphy J. Foster has been elected, and Samuel D. McEnery re-elected to represent Louisiana in the U. S. Senate. They are both Democrats.

A despatch from Havana, dated Sixth Month 4th, says: "Director of Posts Bristow to-day inquired as to the amount of postal funds taken by C. F. W. Neely in Fifth Month, 1899, and ascertained that it was $31,312.95. Neely's monthly average was about $17,000. His system of bookkeeping was simplicity itself. Apparently he merely divided the amounts received, taking one-half for himself and accounting for the other. This morning the examination of Estes G. Rathbone, former Director of Posts, was continued. The most startling fact developed was that on Fifth Month 26th of last year Rathbone ordered Special Agents Leatherer and Sullivan to examine the accounts. They found a shortage, but it was not thought that anything had gone wrong. They reported, however, that there was no check upon the Bureau of Finance, and they recommended that certain blank forms be made such, as all postmasters use when making their reports to the Department monthly. Maynard endorsed the recommendation, and forwarded it to Rathbone. The latter approved it, and sent it to Auditor Reeves, who initialed and forwarded it to Neely. After he had initialed it, instead of putting the scheme into operation, he quietly pigeonholed it. Bristow says he is almost sure that the extent of the steal will amount to something between $80,000 and $100,000, but that this will not touch the item of surcharge stamps, which is $411,000. As to how many of these were burned and how many sold it is impossible to obtain definite information. As many have been traced, it is known positively that not all were destroyed, but if Neely sold $100-000 worth it would not be surprising, Bristow thinks, to find them scattered all over the world. The Postal Inspectors say it is astonishing that a system so rotten could have been concealed beyond the first month. Every day only adds to the surprises."

The receipts of the Porto Rican Treasurer for Fourth Month, 1900, were $105,569.18. The total payments for the month were $86,510.77, which shows a deficit for the month of $80,641.59.

On the 4th inst. Secretray Root made answer to the Senate resolution inquiring as to the number of Filipinos killed and wounded and the number of prisoners taken since the insurrection began. Having no detailed information on the subject, the Secretary cabled the inquiry to General McArthur, commanding at Manila, and received the following response, which was submitted to Congress : "Manila, June 4, 1900.—Adjutant General, Washington : With reference to your telegram of 22d ultimo : Filipinos killed, 10,780 ; wounded, 2104 ; captured and surrendered, 10,425 ; number prisoners in our possession, about 2000. No systematic record Filipino casualties these headquarters. Foregoing, compiled from large number reports made immediately after engagements, is as close an approximation as now possible, owing to wide distribution of troops. More accurate report would take weeks to prepare. Number reported killed probably in excess of accurate figures ; number reported wounded probably much less, as Filipinos managed to remove most wounded from field, and comparatively few fell into our hands. Officers high rank and dangerous suspicious men have been retained as prisoners ; most other men discharged on field as soon as disarmed. Propose to release all but very few prisoners at early date. MACARTHUR."

The transport Hancock arrived at Manila on the 3rd inst. with the members of the Philippines Commission. The latter were formally welcomed by the military and naval authorities and by the members of the Filipino Supreme Court.

A despatch has been received at Washington, dated Vignan, Luzon, Fourth Month 2d, via Manila, Fourth Month 3d, as follows : Major March, with his detachment of the Thirty-third Regiment, overtook what is believed to have been Aguinaldo's party on Fifth Month 19th at Lagpit, about one hundred miles northeast of Vignan. The Americans killed or wounded an officer, supposed to be Aguinaldo, whose body was removed by his followers. The horse ridden by the officer was captured, and the saddle bag contained Aguinaldo's diary and some private papers, including proclamations. One of these was addressed, "To the civilized nations." It protested against the American occupation of the Philippines.

The exact number of census enumerators now at work is 52,631. Pennsylvania leads the list, with 4676 ; New York comes next, with 4492. Alaska has only two, and Nevada 53 ; New Jersey, 1107, and Delaware 103.

In the past six months the Joplin (Mo.) district has sent over $15,000,000 worth of zinc to the market.

Provision must be made annually in the Boston public schools for 2000 additional pupils.

Some temperance people of Boston are considering the feasibility of establishing a hospital in Boston in which no alcoholic medicines shall be used. They say that the Temperance Hospital of London, established in 1873, and the Temperance Hospital of Chicago, established in 1884, have been Successful in their treatment of patients, and their death-rate is lower than that of the ordinary hospitals.

A despatch dated Denver, Col., Fifth Month 28th says : While Professor H. A. Howe was waiting early this morning in the Chamberlain Observatory for the sun to rise and the eclipse to begin he made one of the most important observations of the year, the rediscovery of the planet Eros. This tiny planet, which was discovered only two years ago at the Berlin Observatory, has been looked for since last Ninth Month, the time when, according to calculations, it should emerge from behind the sun. Astronomers all over the world have been scanning the skies for it, but without success. Professor Howe discovered the planet near the first point of Aries.

Respecting the N. Y. City water problem, the Ledger correspondent writes : Water Supply Commissioner Dalton continues to emphasize the necessity for an increased water supply for this city. In a report made public, and covering the first quarter of the year, he says : "At the present rate of increase in consumption we will reach the maximum capacity of the Croton, Bronx and Byram water sheds in 1906, and exceed it before the close of that year. In ten years more the excess of demand and consumption over the capacity of these water sheds will be 395,000,-000 gallons. Supposing that at this date all the preliminaries of detailed surveys of new water sheds, etc., were all accomplished, and we were in the position of beginning the work of construction to-morrow, we would still need all of the time till the close of 1906, all the executive energy and ability that could be commanded, and the exceptional good fortune of placing the work in the hands of none other than contractors of the highest class, to build works of 395,000,000 gallons daily capacity. But we are not in that position. We are as far from it as we have been at any time since Greater New York was established. The people and government of this city afford to remain passive in the face of this situation, and continue to temporize with this all-important subject, wasting time in fruitless discussions of propositions and plans advanced in an immature state or shape from various quarters ?"

Over 1700 trees have been planted in New York city during the past year by the New York Tree Planting Association, of which former Mayor William L. Strong is president. Nearly all the planting was done along the river front and in residence streets. But it is new intended to extend the work to the tenement house district, both for sanitary and æsthetic reasons.

Telegraph wires are better conductors on Second-day than on Third-day, on account of their First-day rest, and a rest of three weeks adds ten per cent. to the conductivity of a wire.

Buckwheat cakes are losing favor in this country. The amount of buckwheat raised is only about one-half of what it was thirty-five years ago, notwithstanding the increase of population.

There were 419 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 5 less than the previous week and 7 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 227 were males and 192 females; 51 died of pneumonia ; 43 of consumption; 35 of heart diseases; 18 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of measles ; 13 of nephritis; 13 of inanition; 13 of apoplexy; 12 from casualties; 11 of cancer; 10 of typhoid fever ; 10 of septicæmia; 9 of old age and 9 of diphtheria.

Words and their Immortality.

Of the writers of the sixty-six books of the Bible, scarcely two or three tell us explicitly what authority they wrote those things which left their pen. It was not necessary that they should. One does not have to bear witness of himself, when his service reaches witness in man. The indefinable quality of inspiration carries an evidence to them that is spiritual, which requires to be helped out by no loud affirmation of the prophet, or preacher or suppliant that what he presents is "in the name of the Lord."

Least called-for of all would it be, to tell the very Inspirer of a prayer himself that it was made in his inspiration or name.

The foundation of prayer has this seal, that the Lord knoweth the prayers that are his. Men also, if they have not found out by quality and savor of a prayer before it pleases its end, that it is in the name of Jesus, may be told of it in vain at its finish.

When a man is used as a pen by an unseen hand, it is not for him always to know either the temporary or the eternal purpose and scope of his writing, or for the thing formed to speak to Him that forms it, "Why hast thou made me thus?" It was not necessary for the divinely moved men of old to know to what prolonged use their writings were to be put, or that they were to be gathered into the volume of the book of Holy Scripture. That much was necessary to their best life was, that fully to indite what they felt inwardly moved by the holy Power to write. They were simply writing, as all simple builders in the Divine plan do, more wisely and more permanently than they knew. Luke went so far as to say, "It seemed good to me also to write unto thee, most excellent Theophilus." Mark could commence with the words, "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God;" but whether this beginning was the work of repentance, John's baptism of which he immediately begins to relate, or the beginning of his narrative of the new dispensation, he states nothing deeper as his impelling motive. John's Apocalypse is indeed clearly pronounced in its opening words: "The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave unto Him to show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass. And He sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John: who bare record of the word of God and of the testimony of Jesus Christ." Paul in a few places calls attention to his divine authority for writing. But mostly the inspired writers seem to trust the Truth to make its own way, observing that inspired reticence which found it wise to say to the undiscerning, "neither tell I you by what authority I do these things."

We do not wish that Paul had written differently, for instance, when he dropped those few words to Corinthians, "Let your women keep silence in the churches." He elsewhere shows plainly enough that this was to be no prohibition of women's speaking or praying by the prophetic gift and anointing, and Friends' principles would include male and female alike in Paul's prohibition of speaking in the churches on any lower authority. But had Paul known, while in the act of writing as to a special church, what an intense interest in those few words was to be taken by future generations, or had he known in any of his sentences that he was writing a continuation of Holy Scripture, and how every syllable would be weighed by men afterwards, would he not have felt so much appalled by a sense of the awful responsibility as to have been disqualified for the undertaking?

The Lord best knows how much blindness and how much ignorance belongs to the due proportion of faith for a special service. "Who is blind, but my servant, or deaf as my messenger that I send?" He who knows what measure of knowledge is a help or a hindrance, and where ignorance of some things is a qualification for others, may be rejoiced in for the saying, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

And should a further book of sacred Scripture be written, the unsuspecting servant who is used to pen its words may as little know what place it is to fill in the church, as did the prophets and saints of a former day. His only question will be, "Am I obedient to the heavenly vision? The Spirit helping our infirmities will take care of the fruit of our faithfulness, whether this be a Scripture for the generations to come, or a word in season to him that is weary.

The present-day message embraced in these reflections has seemed to be, that no one of us knows the immortal future of a little word that may be uttered in the fear of the Lord, or of a tract, or an epistle or a book prepared under living obedience to the leadings of the Most High. "Every writing given by inspiration of God is profitable," and who knows which one of them will so permanently speak to men's condition that men will not willingly let it die?

What if an immortal soul impressed, as all sayings once heard or read must make their impress, with the marks of a profitable or an idle word, carries the register of that word in its eternal being? Should it not stand as a witness for or against the speaker; and the utterer thereof also carry the record of his utterances on the tablets of his own character, to be judged when "the books are opened?" Truly we know not what we are doing, nor for how long, when the words of our mouth, or the meditation of our heart from which the mouth speaketh, do despite unto the spirit of grace; nor what other immortal Scripture we are writing, not with pen and ink but on the spiritual tables of the heart, by every work of faith and labor of love; by words which are not syllabled, but are spirit and life of Him with whom we suffer or work or watch as men bought with a price, and concerned to make all things according to the pattern shown us in the mount.

Spreading the Truth.

The season of the year is approaching, when many are looking toward a temporary absence from home, seeking renewed health and vigor in the country or mountain districts, or by the seaside.

Nearly always, when thus away from home, we come in contact with those who know little or nothing of Friends' views, and occasionally we meet those who have never heard of our Society, nor seen any of its members.

In the large number of Tracts (180) now issued by the Tract Association of Friends, there are many which are valuable for the clear and concise manner in which our doctrines and testimonies are set forth, showing that the views we hold are in accordance with the Holy Scriptures, and giving the reasons why we do not conform to some of the practices of other denominations.

Especially suitable to hand to inquirers, is number 82,—"A Concise Account of the Religious Society of Friends,"—a pamphlet of 24 pages, that is just what its title implies,—a brief history of the Society, with a short explanation of our distinguishing views. Numbers 60 and 75, on Baptism ; number 154, on Communion ; number 24, on Ministry ; number 138, —Heathen Names for Days and Months ; number 150, on Language, Dress, and Manners ; are all of especial interest to those who want to know about Friends and their doctrines.

Biographies, and narratives of impressive and interesting occurrences, form no small part of the publications of the Association, and it would be an encouragement to the latter, if more of our members would supply themselves with Tracts, and accept the many openings which present for their distribution, and thus assist the Association in its work.

Catalogues will be mailed, by applying to the Depository, No. 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

The "Plea in Behalf of Peace, Addressed to Christian Professors of Every Name," is also now to be had at the Book Store, and is a very suitable pamphlet for distribution at the present time.

Zionward.

As I walk down town of a morning through city streets, lined on each side with rows of tall houses, my eyes are cheered by the sight of the crown of a graceful elm, which, at a certain stage of the journey, appears above the housetops a quarter of a mile ahead. Summer and winter, it is a thing of beauty which, outlined against the open sky, often directs the mind for the time above the thought of earthly cares. But by reason of a slight declivity in the street, the tree as it is approached more closely, disappears from view behind the housetops. Then, although every step forward bears me yet nearer to it, it remains hidden until an ascent in the street suddenly brings me abreast of the large yard in which the elm grows, and I pass beneath its shadow.

So, in some measure, it seems to me, is the Spiritual progress which is called the journey Zionward. It is not, at least in those stages which are best known to most of us, if we know the way at all, a level road, lighted continually by the radiance shed upon it by the heavenly city, constantly beheld ; instead of that it is found to be a way of ups and downs, of shadow as well as of light.

If, then, after a time of spiritual gladness, when the eye of the soul has been opened for a season to the indubitable reality of heavenly things, the vision fades and the pilgrim is again shut in by the fogs and walls of this world, there is not necessarily cause for discouragement; the mark, though hid, is not necessarily farther away, but may indeed be nearer. Such experiences must in fact be expected so long as there remains in the nature of men aught of the dross of the earth. The faithful pilgrim presses forward through the encircling gloom, in continued reliance upon his divine Lord, whose Word, having been found hitherto as a lamp to his feet, he knows will not fail him in the end, if he keeps to the faith of Jesus.

Wells and Springs.

The article in The Friend of the 2nd inst., under the same heading revives recollections of incidents observed in course of years past and gone. From a habit of thoughtfulness as to matters unfolded to view, much interest has oft been realized in tracing to probable causes interesting phenomena which have at first seemed enigmatical.

A friend had salt works on the sea coast of Egg Harbor. There was a basin in the midst of large, flat sands, which was filled occasionally by "spring tides." Being thus exposed to evaporation, the sea-water became brine. A shallow well in the side of the basin or pond, gathered this, for pumping by a wind-mill into an elevated shallow vat, from which it flowed to a similar vat on which one edge of the first rested, and so on down a slope to the twelfth vat. As the sea water grew stronger by evaporation, in about the sixth vat "glauber salts" crystallized, which, with other impurities, was cast out. The brine flowed on and in the eleventh, beautifully formed white crystals began to appear, and in the twelfth but little remained in fluid state; the pure salt was shoveled out several times in the course of a day, ready for the market. The point aimed at in this description is the fact that the Second and Third Months were usually the best of the year for this process of salt making. Frequent snows and rains in those months relieved the atmosphere of its moisture to such a degree that in clear weather evaporation went on very rapidly.

Again. Being for many years engaged in the leather business, and dealing chiefly in that made of the largest, heaviest hides — in dressing these they are hung up quite wet and coated on both sides with grease, to dry—the process usually requiring a week or more of fairly good weather. But I had some such to dry in two favorable days of the Second Month. The most tedious drying was either in fair weather, during protracted drouth, or in continued wet weather.

Again. The domestic laundress has often found the clothes long drying on the line, though in clear weather ; at some other times they are found to dry very quickly.

Again. In regard to the interesting fact that the farm soil in course of cultivation during a dry spell is at times found to be moistened on the surface, without apparent cause. My apprehension is that if, in a region of country, watered and not very distant from us, dry weather prevailing there for considerable time with little wind, the atmosphere of such a region would be borne to us by gentle breezes, highly charged with moisture and coming in contact with cooler soil or stone, moisture would be precipitated in degree proportioned to the difference of temperature in the two districts. The effects of drouth may be mitigated by this natural process, that is characteristic of the atmosphere in which we live and move and have our being. The beautiful phenomenon is, I doubt not, oftener realized than observed by tillers of the soil.

Breezes from the desert region west of Kansas come at times, hot and dry, upon fair cro of corn, destroying them and much other veg tation in a few hours. Could that desert r gion be plentifully irrigated by the melte snows from the mountains adjoining on t west, breezes might come eastward less heate and laden with moisture. This is a subje touched upon with a measure of awe, for trul "God made the country," and our blessings its make-up, wonderful and manifold, are mo than is generally appreciated.

In regard to the appearance of moisture a dusty road in time of drouth, I have suppos that in protracted dry weather the ground hillsides may become dry to considerable dep —that certain strata of soil, becoming dr might liberate water that moist earth h pent up, which, oozing out, would cause t moist spots.

cape of Archibald Bonner from the Inquisition.

Being much interested when a lad in this count, I feel like reproducing it in substance. rchibald Bonner, author of "The Lives of the pes," was of Scotch parentage, but, being ft an orphan at five years of age, was adopd by an uncle residing in Italy, a Roman Cathc by profession. He displayed such aptitude learning as to become eventually a professor a college at Marurita. In this city there is office of the Inquisition, consisting of an uisitor general, with twelve assistants, each whom has a salary of about £200 sterling. ch honor and many great privileges are acded them, besides certainty of preferments. hen anyone is accused—offences against the th and practices of the church alone claim their care—the matter is brought before se, and anyone has a right to object to the dence, and if as many as four refuse to ction the proceedings, the case must be egated to the high court at Rome.

A detailed account was here given of the thods of procedure, as well as of the differ tortures inflicted, which is too long, as well oo horrible to be rehearsed. While professor the college the inquisitor general contracted reat intimacy with him, and, one day while familiar conversation, said, "Mr. Bonner, I re a design upon you." Such a speech, notbstanding his professed friendship, caused ne anxiety, but he soon explained that one the assistants, being deceased, he had seted Bonner for the honor of being his sucsor, and, kissing and embracing him, said, You are now one of us." After taking the h of secrecy, a book called the Directory, taining rules for the conduct of the inquiions, was given him. Bonner was much ased with his supposed good fortune, soon himself to peruse his book, desiring to be ne acquainted with the nature of his new ployment. But what was his concern and onishment to find it consist of rules more barous and inhuman than could be conceived ules, however, which he thought could not carried out in practice; but he soon found to his horror that they were carried out to letter, and in them he was obliged to take rt. Soon after his admission, a poor man s brought to the office, whose case was thus: s only daughter was ill, and he had prayed the Virgin. "Holy mother of God, comnd thy Son that my daughter may recover!" e daughter died, consequently the Virgin d not heard him, and, being grieved to the art, he threw away a medal of hers he was d to wearing. In the tortures, consequent upon this flagrant act of disrespect, Bonner was obliged to take part. It is not possible to express what he felt on this occasion and continued to feel while he enforced attendance. It being his turn to sit by and take down any confession the victim might make, he chanced to look upon the sufferer's countenance, and, thinking he saw death in its distortions, he fainted away and was carried to his chair at the council board. When he recovered the inquisitor general exclaimed, "Now, Bonner, take your place. You do not reflect that what is done to the body is for the good of the soul, or you would not faint thus!" Bonner replied that it was the weakness of nature, and he could not help it. "Nature! you must conquer nature by grace." Bonner answered that he would endeavor to do so. It is extraordinary that the violent emotions which, notwithstanding his utmost efforts to suppress, would manifest themselves, did not give his companions cause to suspect his lack of sympathy with them, especially as one day, a case being debated, the inquisitor said with some warmth, striking the council board, "Mr. Bonner, you always object." Bonner now projected his escape and revolved in his mind every possible method of effecting it, but when he reflected upon the almost insuperable difficulties attending and the fatal consequences if he failed, the painful circumstances in which he was placed seemed scarcely supportable. At length a circumstance occurred, which fixed his wavering resolutions.

A person was accused for remarking to a companion on meeting some Carthusian friars, "What fools are these to think they shall gain heaven by going bare-foot and dressing so! They might as well marry and do as we do," etc.

This individual was a nobleman, the most intimate friend he had; he was recently married, and, walking in his garden with his wife, had expressed his surprise that anyone should be so infatuated as to suppose that a particular dress would be meritorious, etc. Unhappily, he was overheard by the friars, who reported him. All Archibald Bonner's compassion was excited when the case came up, for he knew it would be considered as a serious offense against the church. But how great was his distress when the name was given as that of his dearest, his only friend, and how much more when it was said, "And you, Mr. Bonner, I order you to arrest him and bring him here between two and three this morning." He faltered out, "My lord, you know the connection." "What, talk of connection when the holy faith is concerned!"

What should he do? To refuse going would be fatal to himself without in the least benefiting his friend. To give him notice was impossible, for the guards were waiting without. What passed in his breast during the time—about an hour—ere he was required to set out or how he felt upon approaching that house, which he had so often entered in endearing friendship, cannot be conveyed by any language. Proceeding to the chamber where he was peacefully sleeping, on being awakened he lifted his hands in astonishment. "Mr. Bonner," he said, and that was all. No wonder the latter was obliged to turn his face from him in delivering his message lest the feelings of his mind should betray him to his associates, nor during the dreadful scenes in the torture chamber did he dare once to look toward him.

Upon delivering the key to the inquisitor and announcing the arrest, it was said, "This is done like one who is at least desirous to overcome the weakness of nature." The nobleman underwent what is called the "queen of tortures," and was released by death three days after the infliction. Oh, that it had been possible for Bonner to have communicated his feelings! Let us hope they were understood in another state of existence.

It may well be believed that Bonner was now fully determined on an adventure, "the most desperate that man ever undertook." The manner of executing it only remained for consideration. Four hundred miles from the northern border of Italy. How should he get there? There is a noted shrine, that of "Our Lady of Loretto," and it occurred to him that by asking permission to visit this he could gain a few days' absence unsuspected, and several times he waited upon his superior to ask leave, but, fearing his emotions might betray him, he could not bring himself to the point. At length, being in familiar conversation, he one day ventured to say, "My lord, it is long since I was at Loretto; will your holiness give me leave to go there?" This was at once assented to and preparation immediately made. His valuable papers, including his directory, were concealed in the lining of his coat and a horse hired for the excursion, but as it was no part of his design to ride it back, he asked, and paid its price, remarking to the livery man he was but a poor horseman and might not be able to manage him. After riding some ten miles, he came to where the roads forked, one leading to Loretto and the other towards Switzerland, and here the dangers which beset the country, to him utterly unknown, so overcame him that he was even now half inclined to abandon the attempt, but the thought of the horrors in which he must otherwise continue to take part decided him, and he pushed into the road leading towards the north. For a few days he could travel openly, but soon he knew that night and the most unfrequented ways could alone insure safety. For the moment it was suspected that he would not return, every possible effort would be made to capture him. After seventeen days of wandering and more than half famished, he concluded to risk the public road and procure a good meal and feed for his poor horse. Accordingly he approached a tavern, and, entering boldly, the first thing he saw was an exact description of himself posted on the wall, with a large reward offered for his arrest. He endeavored to avoid detection by blowing his nose and looking out at a window, till one of several persons in the room, remarking, "This gentleman doesn't care to be known." He felt that to brave it out was the best way, so he said to the speaker, "Look at me, you scoundrel, what have I done to be afraid of?"

The men nodded to one another and went out. He felt that was no place for him, and so, ordering a dinner, he remarked, "I will go and see how my horse is doing." Hastening to the stable he saw these men consulting together. It was evident they had recognized him by the description given, but, fortunately, they wanted resolution to attack. He was fully armed and as fully resolved not to be taken alive, knowing only too well the horrible fate that would involve. Mounting, he immediately set forward, and now he must depend again upon night wandering. At length he had reason to judge that he must be clear of Italy, and venturing in the day-time on to an eminence he saw a considerable city in the distance, and, finding a peasant, inquired what place it was. "Lucerne." This is a Catholic canton and the seat of the pope's legate. This not suiting his views, he soon again left the highway. Struggling along thus one night, he saw a light proceeding from the hut of a peasant, and, approaching, aroused the inmates. "What do you want?" was demanded. "I am a stranger and have lost my way." "Why! how can that be, when there is no way here to lose?" "Can you tell me where I am?" "In the Canton of Berne." "Thank God that I am in the Canton of Berne." "Thank God you are." "Have you heard anything of a Mr. Bonner who escaped from the Inquisition?" "Heard of him! We have all heard of him, after so many were sent after him. God grant that he may escape their cruel hands!" Bonner now felt that he was among friends, and said, "I am the man." The peasant was overjoyed, came down and received him, called his wife, who dressed herself in her best, and proceeded to furnish her guest with a humble but most welcome repast, for, perhaps, the first time in their lives regretting it was no better, and in this humble but safe retreat he enjoyed a comfortable rest. In the morning he secured directions to the residence of the pastor, but, before going, the peasant insisted on his returning some distance over the path he had traversed in the night. This, Bonner in haste to get on, was quite indisposed to do, but it was explained that he only wished to strengthen his faith in an overruling providence by showing him what a most dangerous path he had been preserved in passing over in the dark. On parting, the peasant, notwithstanding his extreme poverty, utterly refused to accept any remuneration for his hospitality, accounting himself amply repaid by having opportunity to aid. At the pastor's he received an equally warm welcome, with the addition of more sumptuous entertainment.

Bonner was advised to leave Switzerland at once, for though secure from public arrest, he was not from secret assassination. He now went forward to Basle, which, being on the Rhine, he was advised to disguise himself as a peasant, and take passage on a boat, which carried a miscellaneous collection of passengers. Something yet weighed upon the mind of our friend, the parting from the faithful horse, who had shared so many hardships and dangers. Desirous he should have a good home, he was given to the preacher at Basle, who promised it should never be ridden by anyone save himself, and, when old, be comfortably cared for. So inseparable are tenderness and humanity from true greatness of soul that Bonner shed tears at parting from the companion of so many dangers and hardships.

Disgusting as was the company on the boat it was with regret that on the Second-day he was obliged to leave it (on account of an accident), at Strasburgh. Here leaving his shabby dress under the bed of his room, he took passage in a stage coach for Calais, and as during the last day or two he had heard nothing of himself, was in hopes the news of his escape had not reached France. But in this he was disappointed, as on nearing the city, it was in every one's mouth. On arriving he hastened to the quay to inquire for a packet for Dover but found to his dismay that none sailed for two days. Upon this he turned to a fisherman, and asked to be taken in an open boat, but was refused, the boatman being astonished at the rashness of the design. This he soon found was a false move, and caused people to inquire who and what kind of person he could be, evidently a great criminal or one bearing extraordinary dispatches. He must leave the shore quickly, but where should he go? By water he could not escape, and to get through the gates he must pass the guards, doubtless prepared to intercept him. He feared being able even to reach the hotel where the stage had stopped, imagining every one he met would seize him, and it seemed so hard to perish now after so many dangers were passed. Reaching the tavern, he heard voices in a tongue foreign to him. Concluding, therefore, that the party were English, and recollecting the face of Lord Baltimore, whom he had seen at Rome, he desired a few words with him in private. The surprise occasioned by his sudden appearance, a pistol in one hand and another protruding from his coat sleeve, with the desperation pictured on his countenance, was increased by his request. Now the English are not cowardly, but this was an extreme case. However, Lord B. said that if he would lay aside his weapons, he would go with him. This he instantly did, apologizing for his unthoughtfulness. On being informed who he was, Lord Baltimore exclaimed: "Mr. Bonner, you are undone, and I cannot protect you; they are above, searching your room." But a happy thought occurring he instantly returned to his company and proposed that they should rise up and taking him in their midst, try to cover him till they got to his lordship's boat, which happily was not far off. The plan succeeded, for they got to it unharmed, and all jumping in, they rowed with four pair of oars to his yacht, which lay not far off, and from which the party had come to drink a bottle of French wine. And here under the broad ensign of England the power and hates of the inquisition were of no avail. Thus happily terminated a most dangerous undertaking, presenting a comforting assurance that a Protecting Providence will aid those who truly seek for it.

This is but a sketch, but I believe it conveys the main substance of the account as I have read it. It just occurs that if this Lord Baltimore was either of the Calverts of that name who were engaged in the settlement of Maryland, he must have been himself a Catholic; and yet I suppose that if he were so, an Englishman could scarcely fail to respond warmly to an appeal made under such circumstances.

EVERY boy must have his own bridle, and every girl must have hers; they must learn to check and govern themselves. Self-government is the most difficult and the most important government in the world. It becomes easier every day if you practice it with a steady and resolute will. It is the cutting and pruning which make the noble and vigorous tree of character. "Keep thou the door of thy lips." "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation."—Selected.

"NOTHING TO DO."

"Nothing to do!" in this world of ours,
Where weeds grow up with the fairest flowers
Where smiles have only a fitful play,
Where hearts are breaking every day,

"Nothing to do!" thou Christian soul,
Wrapping thee round in thy selfish stole;
Off with the garments of sloth and sin,
Christ, thy Lord, hath a kingdom to win.

"Nothing to do!" There are prayers to lay
On the altar of incense, day by day;
There are foes to meet within and without,
There is error to conquer, strong and stout.

"Nothing to do!" There are minds to teach
The simplest form of Christian speech;
There are hearts to lure with loving wile,
From the grimest haunts of sin's defile.

"Nothing to do!" There are lambs to feed,
The precious hopes of the church's need;
Strength to be borne to the weak and faint,
Vigils to keep with the doubting saint.

"Nothing to do!" and thy Saviour said,
"Follow thou me in the path I tread."
Lord, lend thy help the journey through,
Lest, faint, we cry, "So much to do!"

Our Warfare Against Christian Characte historical examination here entered is commended to the reader's attention.

es not many words to present it, but is a force in it which no one can possibly e or ignore:

'e look back into history and see nation
ering nation. Spain seizes Mexico and rules it. We see England possess herself of India and rule it. The mere fact of a conquest gives us no inkling of its utility. If we are to have any emotions whatever about these conquests we must get them from the conduct of the conquerors. If England has shown justice and self-control, she is admired for them. There is no difference of opinion about this. Every human being is in accord as to what is admirable in the conduct of a conquering nation. Not by bloodshed and ruthlessness, but in spite of bloodshed and ruthlessness, has the world received everything it values. The English deny that they have ever been harsh and bloodthirsty. The Spanish deny that they have ever been harsh or bloodthirsty. Why is this? It is because everybody concedes the evil in such qualities. Now, what are the consequences of harshness and bloodthirstiness? The answer is plain. More harshness and bloodthirstiness; so that unless a nation's conquests are more than counterbalanced by the opposite qualities of justice and mercy the nation becomes a nuisance and a horror. No matter how just and how tenderhearted a nation is, it is made less so by wars of conquest, and will gradually grow callous and cruel unless extraordinary circumstances keep calling out the compensating influences. It is impossible not to see in English drawing-rooms to-day the effect of Kitchener's mowing down of old men armed with spears on the Soudan last summer. It is impossible not to see in the speech of every American citizen the effect of the shooting now going on in the Philippines. Both the English and the Americans are becoming brutalized. This is the point of view from which all national conduct, indeed all conduct, must be viewed—its effect upon the actors themselves. Here we have a basis for the philosophy of history which is simple enough, near and domestic enough, to be examined closely. We need not ask foolish questions as to what would have happened if the English had not taken India or if the slave trade had never been introduced into America. We do not know what might have happened. But we have a partial glimpse of what has happened, and we see the great English nation crazed with a desire to exterminate two little republics, and we meet our own college graduates as they return from Manila full of brag about the Filipinos they have shot. The ruling of men by force brutalizes the ruler. It gradually changes him and makes him a beast. This we can see written in large letters on the continents of the old world and of the new."

In this is indicated the point of the discussion, but a paragraph or two must be added to show its development:

"If we are to face the future with any policy that is worth the name, we must take account of the fact that character is changed by conduct. This is one eternal and absolutely certain fact about life. The changes that come over the spirit of nations are always unconscious. I have not met a single Englishman who is aware that within six months he has become many shades more heartless than he ever was before. I have not met an American who knows that he is undergoing any change. And yet from the date of the Maine's destruction we are so much changed that we seem like a people with a new set of ideas. We are grappling with a new set of thoughts. Our horizon is enlarged, if you will: but our passions are inflamed. Every man has a handful of new theories about history, destiny, and progress. That the great mass of our people throbbed with a noble emotion at the outbreak of the Spanish war is indubitable. But that this fact will save us from all the evil effects of the war—the greatest evil being a precedent for more war—is inconceivable. If we had come into possession of the Philippines in any way except by conquest, we should not have war there to-day. The American people would not have permitted the bloodshed to go forward under the plea that we have no other means of convincing the natives that we do not desire to shed blood. Every day that the war goes forward a damage is being done to the spirit of five million school-children which some influence must counteract if the character of our civilization is not to undergo degradation. It is to ourselves that we must look if we desire so much to benefit the world and spread the light of Anglo-Saxon institutions. Who is then left to preserve the tradition of clemency or the belief in human nature if these things are to die out in the United States?"

Britain is having a taste of blood, and we are seeing every day what effect it is having upon her and her people, but rightly it is said:

"Americans are not safe from this disease. They are particularly exposed to it and are catching it daily. The scrofula is not yet bred into our bones, but it is in our manners and talk—there is a gleam of savagery in our eyes. We have had a taste of blood. You must at every instant think of the nation at large—not other nations, but your own nation,—if you would have a comprehensible foreign policy for the American people."

MY PRAYER.

My God, I ask of Thee
That Thou my Guide wilt be.
I'm blind and cannot see,
But give my hand to Thee.

The way's unknown to me;
The choice remains with Thee.
Then let me leave to Thee
The things concerning me.

ANSWER.

To-day's enough for thee;
To-morrow cannot be.
Thy cares are left with me—
The captive bound is free.

Sixth Month 7th, 1900.

To take thy yoke? It is to walk
Forever with the Lord; to talk
With Him in converse sweet and pure;
To know the path of life is sure
Beneath my feet; to let Him bear
The whole, not half, my load of care;
To be held steady, lest I slip;
To have his hand dash from the lip
Each dangerous draught; with Him to work,
And so keep fair through all the murk
And sin of this bad world; his friend
To be, and He mine to the end;
And then to walk with Him in white
Worthy to tread the halls of light.
Thine easy yoke? I humbly kneel—
Let me Thy fastening fingers feel;
Then let me rise, henceforth to be
A true yoke-fellow, Lord, with Thee!

Seasonable Literature.

To the Editors of the Friend:—

I have been desirous that more persons of religious experience in the Society of Friends might feel it a sense of duty laid upon them to wield the pen under the direction of the Divine hand for the defense of Truth; and have wondered why there were so few contributors to the pages of THE FRIEND. I am unable to search out the cause of this delinquency, but surely there is indifference and neglect of duty somewhere. Let each one who is qualified for this important service examine themselves with the light afforded and put the searching query: Is it I who is shirking? While the writings of ancient Friends are valuable to be read and copied and should be held in high esteem, yet there are innovations, doctrines and practices adopted in mode of worship which were not in existence when those were written. These new developments claim the thought, attention and careful comparison of writers of the present time and also exposure by modern journalism. Hence our religious literature is not complete unless both the former and the latter concerns are included in the publications.

Some of us who are isolated, deprived of congenial society or attending meetings of our kind, realize that we are living in perilous times, when we observe the desolating influence of a superficial system of religion practised by an organization professing to be Friends; yet amid all these surroundings the promises of a compassionate Saviour in whom alone there is life, remains for edification and comfort, whom we can approach and with whom we can commune, independent of any organization or of priestly intervention.

"If any man will do my will he shall know the doctrine." This, like many other precious promises of the gospel, is revived for our encouragement. Instead of criticising those who are not wholly responsible, let us rather strengthen the things that remain and look to Him who doeth all things well.

And may the editors of this periodical keep an eye single unto Him who has said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee, and be enlarged in their efforts for the spread of righteousness in the earth!" SARAH JONES.

PLEASANT PLAIN, Iowa, Sixth Month 1st, 1900.

TO DO RIGHT IS NOBLE.—In the heat of passion Robert had done something that he was ashamed of and sorry for after the excitement had passed away.

"I wish I hadn't let my temper get away with my good sense," he said, "but it's done, and what's done can't be undone."

"But isn't there a way to overcome the effect of wrong-doing to a great extent?" asked a voice in his heart.

"How?" asked Robert.

"By owning to one's blame in the matter," answered the voice. "Confessing one's fault does much to set wrong right. Try it."

Now, Robert was very much like all the rest of us—he hated to admit that he was in the fault. "I'm wrong—forgive me," is a hard thing to say. But the more he thought the matter over, the more he felt that he ought to say just that.

"It's the right thing to do," he told himself. "If I know what is right and don't do it, I'm a moral coward. I'll do it."

So he went to the one he had wronged and confessed his fault frankly, and the result was that the two boys were better friends than before, and his comrade had a greater respect for him, because he had been brave enough to do a disagreeable thing when it was presented to him in the light of a duty.

My boys, remember that there's quite as much bravery in doing right for right's sake as there is in the performance of grand and heroic deeds that the world will hear about.

George Withy.

[At the desire of an esteemed Friend we reprint the following account from a publication of Friends' Tract Association, believing it will be interesting to not a few readers who have not yet met with it.—ED.]

George Withy was the son of an ale-house keeper in Bristol, England, who was a dissipated man, but his wife was a religious woman and much concerned for the welfare of her children. Thomas Carrington, a minister of the Society of Friends, from Pennsylvania, while on a religious visit to England, felt a concern to visit the ale-house keepers of Bristol.

Among others was the father of George Withy; the latter being thirteen years of age, was engaged in carrying round the ale to his father's customers, and having a remarkably sweet voice, he was often asked to sing. The exposure to which he was subjected was cause of great concern to his pious mother, which she had expressed to Thomas Carrington. Before the interview closed, George Withy came in. T. C. looked attentively at him for a while, then placing his hand on his head, remarked to his mother—thou need feel no concern for the lad, for he will be met in a narrow place, he will become convinced of the principles of the Society of which I am a member, and will have to visit my native land in the love of the Gospel. George mentally resolved he would never become a Quaker, never become a minister, and he would certainly never visit America.

In reference to this period of his life, he writes: "I often felt the secret convictions of something within that I was convinced would, if fully obeyed, have led me into the paths of virtue; yet I did violence thereto, and often eluded the gentle intimations of God's Holy Spirit thus striving with me. I found that I had a corrupt heart, from which no good fruit could be produced, and that I never could be brought to the enjoyment of the peace of God's children, but as my evil heart became renewed by the operation of the one saving baptism of which John's was a figure." He frequented for some time the meetings of various religious denominations. At length he had an alarming attack of sickness, during which he was waited upon by his anxious mother, whose exercises on his account were very great. He was indeed met in a narrow place, and became convinced of the principles of Friends. While relating this circumstance to Thomas Evans, he said: "When I left my sick room, I appeared in the garb thou now see'st me in."

He was received into membership about the twenty-second year of his age, and first appeared as a minister in his twenty-fifth year. After his marriage he and his wife settled several miles from Bristol, and were in the practice of regularly attending the meeting twice in the week, and having no convey were obliged to walk, which they continu do, until they had six children old enou walk with them; never omitting a meetin cepting in case of sickness, and always t the children along with them.

He removed in the year 1805, to reside w the compass of Frenchay Meeting. Some after this, feeling a religious concern to America, which he long resisted, reasoning he could not leave his dependent famil aged mother, who was then about eighty- years old, he was brought to a state of mission by a remarkable circumstance. was lying on his bed one afternoon with eyes, under a feeling of deep distress o count of this prospect, it appeared t that two men entered the room, each ca a stool, such as are used at funerals, an them at the foot of his bed, they then le room. Soon afterward they returned bri in a coffin, which they placed on the Observing a plate on the lid, he read t scription: "George Withy, died Ninth 30th, 1822, aged fifty-nine years." Th creased his distress, when he heard in his ear the language: "If thou wilt be f and yield to my requiring, thy family sh cared for in thy absence, and I will add years to thy life, and thou shalt return t thy mother's eyes in death."

At one time when travelling alone, pa religious visit in Wales, having been at a ing in the morning and was going to a to be held in the afternoon; as he was along, he felt a sudden impression that it be right to turn around and go directly So unexpected and sudden an impression some hesitation, and he stopped and w the thing in the best manner he could. result was that he must go home, and as e as he could. He did so, and travelled all reaching home in the morning. Here he that his niece had been drowned about t that the impression was made on his min wife had the care of their children, a presence and assistance were almost in sable.

The visit to America was performed in 1 and while in this country, George Wit quently had Thomas Evans of Philadelp his travelling companion. One day seemed thoughtful, and was evidently through religious exercise. He infor Evans that this was the day that he h on the plate of the coffin should be the his death. He feared that he had no sufficiently faithful, and that his death fore, would really occur. This, howev not prove to be the case. Thomas Eva vately made a note of this date at th and on hearing of George Withy's death occurred in England, he found on refer the note, that it was exactly fifteen year ward, to a day.

G. W. and T. E. visited Washington the sessions of Congress, and G. W. wis hold a public meeting, T. E. consulte persons of prominence, who encourage proposed to have it announced by han which were accordingly posted in d parts of the city.

On their way to attend the meeti Friends observed a large number of collected in the neighborhood of the

Concerning the Doukhobortsi.

May 28th, 1900.
Village Terpenie.

Dear Brothers and Sisters:— We received your letters, which gave great pleasure and comfort. We reciprocally greet you all heartily with our brotherly greeting. We are thanking our Heavenly Father for the preservation of your lives. We thank you with all our hearts for your kind remembrance of us.

We consider it our duty to answer you, may God bless you for your love to us. We are not in a position to repay you for all you are doing for us.

We extend you an invitation to come see us and be our guests, we are gradually improving. We raised cattle to a certain extent, built dwellings and sowed crops. The crops and vegetables are promising very well and the further development we are leaving to the will of God. The winter was not a cold one, but one we could easily stand.

We kindly beg your pardon for our long silence and delay in replying.

We remain your brothers and sisters of the Christian community of the Universal Brotherhood of the village Terpenie (Karshi). The village consists of two hundred and fifty persons. We are all living together. We are also all well. We will await your kind reply impatiently.

For a long time but little information has come to the committee through Commissioner McCreary, presumably, owing to his being much occupied with the duties of his office. We are however, just in receipt of the welcome intelligence that the crops in the settlements near Yorkton seem at present very promising, timely rains having fallen. In some places the grass on the prairies is so forward that the Doukhobors were getting ready to cut it. Sixty-five men have gone from the Yorkton districts to work on the Rainy River road. Jas. S. Crerar writes, under date of Sixth Month 3rd, that he had, that day, sent Leonhardt, the interpreter, to select one hundred men from the thirteen villages of the Cyprus colony, to report for work at Swan River

A Long Delayed Publication.

Gov. Bradford's famous "History of Plymouth Plantation," sometimes erroneously styled "The Log of the Mayflower," which is now proudly sheltered by Boston's gilded dome, is, despite its age and wanderings, clear and legible as print, and, withal, much of it is so fine that no type of ordinary size will reproduce it line for line.

Since the days of printing, probably no author has waited longer for a publisher than did Gov. Bradford, or furnished more legible, precise and accurate copy when the allotted time came. Twenty-five years were devoted by him to writing this history, which, although well known at the time, and used and quoted from by several historians, mysteriously disappeared at the time of the American Revolution, and was believed to be as irrecoverable as the lost books of Livy. In 1846, however, Bishop Wilberforce, of Oxford, made quotations from a manuscript said by him to be in the library of the Lord Bishop of London, at Fulham Palace. These were recognized some years later by an American scholar as probably of Bradford's authorship, and subsequent investigation identified the manuscript, which was for the first time printed in 1856, more than two centuries after it left the author's hands.

This important manuscript consists of 280 large folio pages, written on one side of the paper only, the whole strongly bound in vellum; it was recently restored to the custody of the State of Massachusetts by the Bishop of London.—Selected.

MARRIED HIM TO REFORM HIM.—I knew a young lady who had everything which utterly constitutes the happiness of those who have not yet climbed the golden stairs of matrimonial paradise. Her age was twenty; she was a brunette, of graceful figure, with a peculiarly animated expression of countenance. Her complexion was rich and warm, her large gray eyes were merry, and her features would pass muster among sculptors. At receptions held in the armory of the Twenty-third Regiment, she was always observed with admirable interest. Well, at length she came to a decision, and I heard of her marriage. I knew the young man whom she chose, and was startled. That was five years ago. A year ago I was riding up-town in a car. The car was crowded, and I stood by the front door reading. I heard my name pronounced, and looked down, but did not at first recognize the face, which was faintly smiling at me. It was wierdly pale and wrinkled and careworn. I looked puzzled for a few moments, and then it dawned on me that this was the wreck of one of the prettiest girls in Brooklyn. I accompanied her as far as the door of her house. It was a tenement-house. "I won't invite you in to-day," she said, "my rooms are somewhat disordered." I said nothing, but I understood. It was pitiful to see her try to keep up the pretense of being high-hearted, happy and prosperous. A week ago I heard her husband was in a lunatic asylum and her baby dead. Now she has gone home to begin life over again. She had married a man to reform him.—Brooklyn Eagle.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Congress adjourned sine die, on the 7th inst., at 5 o'clock P. M.

The appropriations made by the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress reach the enormous total of $709,729,476. This includes the sum of $131,247,155, estimated to be incidental to the war with Spain, leaving $578,482,321, or what may be designated as the ordinary appropriations made during this session for the support of the Government during the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1901. This is an increase of $49,747,242 over the appropriations for the year 1898, which immediately preceded the Spanish-American war, and an increase of $62,636,127 over the appropriations for 1897. Included in the outgo for the next year is the new and large item of $9,000,000 for the census. The principal increases in the old items of expenditure over those of the year 1898 are: Navy, $7,081,916; pensione, $3,991,350; postal service, exclusive of recently acquired island possessions, $17,782,900.

Out of 17,000,000 pieces of registered mail handled annually in the United States, total loss has been one-thousandth of 1 per cent., and in the transmission of ordinary letters the loss is but seven-thousandth of 1 per cent.

The situation in China was considered at a cabinet meeting on the 8th inst. Secretary Hay read a cablegram from Minister Conger, at Pekin, in which he stated that there was no improvement in the situation, and asked for instructions. The Secretary stated later that a reply would be sent to the Minister, reaffirming the one sent recently, that he will be expected to do whatever is necessary to protect the lives of Americans and their property, and to maintain the dignity of this Government. He will be instructed to form no alliance with any Government. It is understood that the representatives of the Powers in Pekin will call on the Dowager Empress, and present the necessity of her taking immediate and vigorous action to suppress the rioters.

The Fourth Month Summary of Commerce and Finance, just issued by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, shows that in the ten months ending with Fourth Month, our imports of tropical products have been over $300,000,000 in value, thus averaging fully a million dollars a day and indicating that for the full year they will reach 365,000,000. The importation of raw materials for use in manufacturing has increased steadily and now forms more than one-third of our total imports, and the large proportion of this comes from the tropics. Of India rubber alone the imports of the ten months amount to more than $27,000,000; of fibres, to $20,000,000; of unmanufactured silk, $40,000,000; of cotton, over $7,000,000; of gums, more than, $5,000,000, while cabinet woods, dye woods, indigo and ivory also aggregate several millions.

The troubles of Estes G. Rathbone, former Director of Posts, in Havana, seems to be increasing. The Auditor's Department has thrown out $15,000 worth of vouchers, including $8000 worth of bills, which have been paid twice, most of them at Muncie, Ind. The Fidelity Company is that place has been notified that it will be held responsible on Rathbone's bond.

General Otis, recently returned from the Philippines, is in Washington. In speaking of the condition of the Islanders, the General made one statement in particular, which came as a distinct surprise, in view of the fact that he has spent a year and a half in fighting the Filipinos, for he declared that these same Filipinos were, without question, the very best of any of the Asiatic races living on the Pacific coast and islands. He paid a high tribute to their acquisitiveness, saying that young and old were alike anxious to learn from the Americans, and quick to do so if given any opportunity. The demand for schools on the American plan was insatiable. It had not been possible to secure a sufficient supply of Spanish-American text-books, the market having been denuded of such. When the book-hungry Filipinos were told this, they begged for American school books, and declared that their children could learn from them even without the Spanish text and translations. General Otis found to his astonishment that such was the case, and says that in the course of a very few months the Filipino children pick up a very fair knowledge of English. Even the old natives con the text-books, in the effort to fix English phrases in their minds. There was a dearth of teachers, too. General Otis often had recourse to the soldiers in his ranks who knew a little Spanish, and so were suitable for detail as teachers. General Otis said he looked upon this educational movement as the only solution of the Philippine problem, and was confident that the spread of American ideas throughout the Filipino schools would in the end make good citizens of the Filipinos.

The Russian syndicate, headed by Count Charles Begendvitch, to prospect the Siberian coast for gold, sailed from San Francisco Sixth Month 10th, on the steamer Samoa.

Complete returns from the city of Portland, Oregon, show that Rowe (Rep.) is elected Mayor by 1073 plurality in a total vote of 11,870. There were three candidates. The two Republican members of Congress also were elected in the State.

A. A. Putnam, an electrical engineer, of Rochester, made an oral will recently by talking into a phonograph. He signed his name on the wax roll of the machine with a hot copper wire, and the witnesses did likewise. Legal authorities say that the will is valid.

The output of oil in California has increased from 1,245,339 barrels in 1895 to 2,292,123 barrels in 1899. The output for 1900 will be much larger.

Catching butterflies is not usually regarded as a lucrative employment; but a clever English girl, Mary Yeomans, originated the idea, and continues to make a good income from the sale of these insects. Before going to California she had collected butterflies for her own amusement, and realized that many of the rarest varieties were to be found in California. The first butterflies she found proved to be of a species seldom to be met with except in the higher Alps; and, on sending them to England, she was paid $25 each for them. Encouraged by this success she steadily increased her stock, and is now doing a large business, and thereby making handsome profits.

Recent tests in European manufactories have demonstrated conclusively that the hard wheat of Northern Texas is particularly available for making macaroni and other so-called "pastes."

There is a servant girl famine in St. Louis. The State Employment Bureau, which is looked on as a last resort by most housekeepers, is more than 200 applications behind with this kind of help.

There were 409 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 10 less than the previous week and 69 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 205 were males and 204 females; 41 died of consumption: 41 of pneumonia; 38 of heart diseases; 17 of cancer: 21 of nephritis; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of convulsions; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of uræmia; 11 of measles; 10 of marasmus; 9 of typhoid fever, and 9 of apoplexy.

FOREIGN.—The highest court of appeal in Great Britain has sustained the decision that a circulating library can be held pecuniarily responsible for libelous statements contained in any of the volumes which it circulates.

Lord Roberts has wired that he liberated 151 British officers and 3,500 of the rank and file at Pretoria. The Boers, consequently, only took nine hundred prisoners with them.

Belated reports of the casualties when the Yeomanry Battalion was captured last week show them to have been more serious than had been expected, including the killing of a British baronet and the wounding of an earl.

General Kelly-Kenny, at Bloemfontein, reports that the telegraph has been cut at Roodeval, Sixth Month 7th, north of Kroonstad, by a body of Boers estimated to be 2,000 strong, with six field guns.

It was not made public in London until the 11th that when the Boers cut Lord Robert's line of railway communication at Roodval, an entire British battalion, except six men, were either killed, wounded or captured. Seventeen officers and men were killed and seventy-two wounded.

General Buller has cabled the War Office that he has had a fight in the Free State with Boers, and "hopes he has obtained a position from which he can render Laing's Nek untenable."

Machadodorp has been officially proclaimed the capital of the Transvaal. The village has swollen into a small city, the majority of the inhabitants living in tents.

An interesting calculation has recently been made by an English statistician, in which he shows that when the electric light has entirely displaced gas, oil lamps and candles in the United Kingdom, there will be 40,000 less deaths annually, these illuminants being as much more unhealthful than electricity.

Great Britain last year imported nearly 2,000,000,000 eggs, having a value of $24,550,000.

A man walking ten miles a day would require nine years to cover all the streets of London.

Despatches from Manila dated Sixth Month 9th state that General Pio del Pilar, the Filipino leader, has been captured near Manila by the Filipino police.

As a result of last week's operations in the Philippines more than 200 Filipinos were killed and 160 captured. The American loss was 9 killed, 23 wounded, and one taken prisoner.

It is the humidity more than the heat, in the Philippines, that hurts people from Europe and America. The thermometer, in the shade, rarely ranges above eighty degrees. Humidity does the rest—saps vitality and renders men extremely susceptible to disease.

Dr. Studt, Prussian Minister of Education, has instructed the Statistical Bureau to collect material regarding the disastrous effects of alcoholism upon the nation.

In Iceland men and women are in every respect political equals. The nation, which numbers about 70,000 people, is governed by representatives elected by men and women together.

In a letter to the Lord Mayor of London Lord Curzon says: "Fifteen per cent. of the population of India are now supported by the Government. If the famine continues until December it is estimated that the Governm will have spent £9,250,000."

The hostile attitude of the Boxers and their adher in China towards all foreigners continues, and the fo of the world's Powers, gathering at Tien Tsin, are mak preparations to move on Pekin for the purpose of res ing peace and affording protection to missionaries other foreigners. Minister Conger has instruction continue to safeguard American interests, and to a any act that may bring the United States into comp tions of an international character that may arise.

A cablegram from London Sixth Month 11th says the foreign Admirals at Taku, acting in concert, ar pairing the damaged railway line between Tien Tsin Pekin, and armored trains, with troops, may start for Chinese capital that day. If necessary, 10,000 sail will be sent to Pekin, to enforce the demands of Powers, or, if necesary to suppress the Boxers. Mob prevails at many places, and at Tien Tsin Russian tr were fired upon.

A special cablegram from London says grave appre sions are expressed in financial circles that the comp tions in China may lead to a war between Japan Russia.

The Literary and the Laboratory Culture.

Now and then a youth is found at school whom books and letters appear well nigh meaningless. His mind does not seem to be constituted as to gather conceptions without hard difficulty from a printed page. Also the spoken language, given forth to impart knowledge, falls upon his ears as tedious sound. He is to our attempts at instruction the too full dose of denunciation, or a show of impatience over stupidity, and to his lack of perception we add a lack of heart in him to learn well. So he stoically endures the reputation of dullard, because he does not take to books. We notice that when occasions for action arise, as on the play-ground, in the shop, or execute some practical business, he seems to be in his element.

Years afterwards we wonder if we see that the failure in the school-room has now become a leading man of affairs in the community, or a prominent civil engineer, or inventor in command of the political situation, or university professor in some special branch that has engaged his interest. And where the gifts have been needed for success in his vocation, he shows now a mastery of their contents. In intercourse at the table or in society with those of the literary culture, these practically cultured men may not suffer by comparison in evincing the fruits of a liberal education. They have received, indeed, a liberal education by what we have sometimes chosen to call the laboratory method, as others differently constituted have received theirs by the literary method.

The process has run somewhat as follows: In despair of book-learning he, being put into practical life, some day discovers an interest in a special line or article of industry. Thereupon his mind becomes alert to learn all the facts and bearings of his subject of work. Not only does he practice his favorite pursuit correctly, but a time comes when he has recourse to reading all he can about it. Through his experimental interest he begins to become book-taught also on the subject. And so from book to book treating on the art, and from science to science elucidating his specialty, a literary culture is ensured along with his practical work. This has in some cases carried a man over varied fields of letters and made him a scholar.

An extreme instance has come under the writer's personal acquaintance. A shoemaker who was out of health was directed by his physician to bring home from the fields a new flower every morning. This allured him into the study of botany. He found one day a flower which his book did not describe. He was referred to some fuller botanical works in Latin. This set him to learning Latin, with the usual success of a man of purpose. Other investigations led him to need a knowledge of German, and German he studied and learned. So not only from language to language was he carried by the laboratory interest, but from science to science, including mathematics to the extent of making in advance the calculations of an almanac for a certain year.

So it is that he that will do, shall learn; and the Master taught this new education when He said, "He that will do the will of God, shall know the doctrine." His Scriptures teach that the only true knowledge of Divine truth is experimental, and not in the letter only. Schools are now earnestly advancing in the principle of teaching theory by practice, and opening the intelligence of books by manual and experimental work. We are relieved of much of the expression we had been of late desiring to bring out on this line by the article following this, which we will now use by preference:

We would, however, warn the dull boy whose listlessness comes from sloth and idleness, to take no comfort in shirking his book-lessons by any prospect of his becoming an educated man through business. For the slothfulness of the school-shirk is a habit preparing for the same sloth in any other business; and that which makes such a boy a failure in the method of letters will, unless overcome, make him the same failure in the laboratory of life. Those cases of success that we have referred to were not born of minds wilfully indolent.

THE LABORATORY METHOD.

It is doing, not thinking, that keeps people in touch with reality. Thinking has its place and work in the world, but when it does not resolve itself into action it becomes morbid or fantastic. This is especially true of the spiritual life which we are called to live in Jesus Christ. "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them." Indeed, the truest knowing begins with doing, and grows with doing, and cannot be obtained without it. It is when we are living the life of Christ through the Spirit that we know Him and the power of his resurrection. It is not by merely thinking about Him, and wondering at Him, that we come into the circle of those who have his secret. It is by obeying Him.

A young man once applied for admission to an advanced class in one of our universities, and was required to pass an examination in chemistry. It appeared that he had committed a standard text-book of the subject to memory. He had never heard a lecture or seen an experiment, nor had he even handled any but the most common of the substances of which chemistry treats. But he could describe all the experiments mentioned in the text-book, tell the color of every element and its leading compounds, state their specific heat and other qualities. It was a remarkable feat of memory, but, if the world had to depend on such knowledge as this for its applications of chemistry to the arts, it would not advance very fast.

A little better was the method of teaching the subject which prevailed in the universities forty years ago. The student provided himself with a note-book and a pencil, and sat patiently and passively under the lectures of a professor, who illustrated his statements by experiments, and examined the note-books at the end of the term, or asked questions on his lectures. The student never, or rarely, touched any of the substances which the lectures discussed. He scarcely ever tested for himself any of the statements he heard from the teacher. He had a certain amount of chemical fact pumped into him, to do as he pleased with it. This was a good deal better than committing a text-book to memory, but still very inadequate. Masses of undigested fact are not stimulative to mental growth, nor likely to prove very useful in actual life. Such work is neither educative nor practical in a high degree, unless it be a preparation for something more active. Students thus trained hardly could carry on the work of the world of chemical progress and application.

To-day chemistry is taught—as are nearly all branches of science—by setting the student at work. Lectures and experiments may come first, but some excellent teachers avoid even this, and send their students into the laboratory first. As "the smith learns his trade at the anvil," so the chemist learns his science by practicing analysis and combination at the working-table. He has his use for chemical text-books and for the living voice of the teacher. These, indeed, are much more to him than when he was passively accepting them as authorities which required no verification at his hands. He hears and reads with a vivid sense of what is written or said, such as he never could have had if he were not working out the problems for himself. The wide gap which might have existed between him and the lecturer or the writer of the text-book is daily narrowed as he does the work of investigation for himself, and thus approximates to their experience. He knows because he does.

There is a joy in knowledge taken by itself, but there is a deeper joy in knowledge we have reduced to practice and made a part of ourselves. The truth lived is more to us than the truth merely known. Our Divine Master calls to that higher joy. To know Him as Lord, and even to call Him such, avails nothing. It may puff us up, as Paul says, but it cannot build us up (1 Cor. 8 : 1). It was the temptation of the religious class of Paul's time, and it has been the temptation of that class in every age since, to put knowing into the place of obeying, and to suppose that the habit of saying "Lord ! Lord !" has something about it more worthy of God's blessing than plain attention to duty. But nothing is worth having that is out of relation to obedience, that does not enlist the will into a willingness to do the will of God. For the spiritual element in our nature is not the intellect or even the emotions ; it is the will. Knowledge and emotion are worth having only as they lead us to will to do the will of the Father, and then they lead us on to still truer emotion and still worthier knowledge. When the doing of that will is the leading purpose of our lives, then we come to know as we could not in any other state of mind and heart. Then the Bible seems to draw near to us, and to read as if it were written just for us. Then we understand the story of God's fighters against evil, when we are fighting that battle ourselves. Then we feel the nearness and reality of the Son of God, when we are growing to be sons of God through the ability he gives his brethren (John 1 : 12).

It is out of Christian living that we come to know the truth of the gospel, the truth of the Bible, the truth of all that it befits us to know. We need no longer the crutches men call evidences. When we are acting under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit ourselves, we recognize his voice in the holy men who were moved to speak worthily of the things of God and of the spiritual life.

And then we are brought into true fellowship with those whom we see to be willing to do the will of God as we ourselves are. Notional religion, got from books and talk, leaves us solitary and selfish, The boy who committed the text-book to memory acquired no friends by the process. Even those who sat side by side on the benches of the lecture-room, watching experiments and hearing lectures, did not get very near each other. The boy who works alongside others in the laboratory acquires a fellow-feeling for his comrades engaged in the same labors, facing the same difficulties, puzzled by the same problems. A comradeship naturally springs up between them, and embraces their teacher also, if he be a teacher worthy of the name.

For the true teacher feels the difficulties, rejoices in the victory over them, and cheers his students by his sympathy. He has lived through all that, and is able to guide, encourage, and inspire them. And so the great Teacher takes us into his great laboratory, and bids us do that we may understand,—to live the life of service and sacrifice that we may come to the vision of his glory.—*S. S. Out of Christ While Living in Sin.

You will say, perhaps, that though you are sinners, and live in daily commission of sin, and are not sanctified, yet you have faith in Christ who has borne the curse for you, and in Him you are complete by faith, his righteousness being imputed to you.

But, my friends, let me entreat you not to deceive yourselves in so important a point as that of your immortal souls. If you have true faith in Christ your faith will make you clean; it will sanctify you; for the saints' faith was their victory of old, by this they overcame sin within, and sinful men without. And if thou art in Christ, thou walkest not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, whose fruits are manifest. Yea, thou art a new creature, new made, new fashioned, after God's will and mould. Old things are done away with, and behold all things are become new, new love, desire, will, affections and practices. It is not any longer thou that livest; thou disobedient, carnal, worldly one; but it is Christ that liveth in thee; and to live is Christ, and to die is thy eternal gain: because thou art assured that thy corruptible shall put on incorruption, and thy mortal, immortality; and that thou hast a glorious house, eternal in the heavens, that will never wax old or pass away. All this follows being in Christ, as heat follows fire, and light the sun.

Therefore have a care how you presume to rely upon such a notion, as that you are in Christ whilst in your old fallen nature. "For what communion hath light with darkness, or Christ with Belial?" Hear what the beloved disciple tells you: "If we say we have fellowship with God, and walk in darkness, we lie and do not the truth." That is, if we go on in a sinful way, are captivated by our carnal affections, and are not converted to God, we walk in darkness, and cannot possibly, in that state, have any fellowship with God. Christ clothes those with his righteousness who receive his grace in their hearts.—Selected.

From the Journal of Isaac Martin, Printed 1779:—"In the twenty-first year of my age I returned to New York, and found it necessary to enter into some business. And herein I was brought under great trial. Being by trade a hatter, and not having freedom in my mind to make fashionable hats, and decorate them with ribbons, lace and feathers, as was then the custom of the times, under this exercise I very much relinquished the thought of following my trade, and was minded to go on Long Island and hire myself to some honest Friend, and work at the farming business for a maintenance. But while under these considerations, as I was one day walking the streets, it came into my mind, with a degree of living faith, that I might follow my trade, and sell plain hats. As this intimation, which I believed was a Divine intelligence, ran through my mind, I had a hope that a way would be provided for my support, and the event proved the certainty thereof, although, to the outward eye, it appeared very doubtful.

"I have found, by experience, that it is best to attend to the inward Guide, even in my outward occupation and business, and to beware of the merchandise of Babylon. For, as the faith which overcometh the world is abode in a way is cast up where there appeared to be no way, and the mind learns contentment with a little, because He who feedeth the raven and clotheth the lilies is mindful of his humble depending children.

Sensationalism in the Pulpit.

In Logansport there seems to be a rivalr among the preachers to attract large congre gations, and it is said that they have adopte means to this end, among them the selectio of a series of "catching" topics. In this wa one clergyman has announced a sermon "fo men only." He will then have a service "fo women only!" The obvious resemblance of th kind of notice to things of less sweetness an light need only be alluded to. With full cred for the purity of purpose that animates preach ers in using this kind of announcement to a tract popular attention, we cannot help bu feel that there is something of the kind of ze in it that eats one up. We can hardly imagir the Master doing so.

Without meaning to speak as one havin authority, it seems to us that a fine test fo modern instances might be a reference to th high standard, or to put it in the way in whic Sheldon has put it in his books, which hav become so popular, "What would Jesus do" under such circumstances. It may appear tha if the preachers would be convinced of the fac that the question of attracting the people t their sermons is not the main question, the might more readily get at the main questio which is, to induce in those that come a co dition of heart and mind, a state of soul an spirit that would constrain them toward a be terment of conduct for themselves and for t the world. If a minister have only a score people to hear him, let him seek to implant those few a burning desire to exemplify th standard of the Master in their lives, so th they shall become missionaries, not merely l word, but by deed, in all the demands of ever day life.

If ministers will forget that they are not the pulpit to attract audiences or to entertai those whom they may attract, but are the to convey to those who hear them the pow of the gospel "as it is in Jesus Christ," whi means the state of salvation that cleaves things that are of good report; that is full charity for failure to carry out the high ide that burns with an unquenchable desire st to strive toward this ideal; in short, if mini ters will forget everything but the one pu pose that they are to tell the "good news which is the interpretation of the life of th day, so that the golden rule may be applied it as a living principle, they will not need resort to anything. "The common people w hear them gladly," and the question will so be a place large enough to accommodate t people and not a question of people to fil place. The application is not to Logansport although Logansport furnishes the text. fits almost any city in this broad land in th day.—Editorial in Logansport paper.

Several speakers referred to the im- nce of correctly educating our children, s far as possible, our whole population rrect ethical standards. Among these Felix Adeler of New York gave a most ctive address. He thought that two ob- s to the growth of sentiment against war or arbitration, were first, a false and fas- ng ideal of military glory. This he would t by outspoken condemnation of unjust among which he classed the Mexican and hilippine wars, and by drawing attention heroism displayed by others than mili- nen, in the work of the life-saving crews, omotive engineers, and by such mission- as Dr. Livingstone.

econd obstacle is the disesteem of foreign s which has prevailed among Americans, ed by a habit of self-laudation and by a f acquaintance with other countries than our own. Prof. Adeler has had prepared for use among school children historical information concerning some nations and races whose stars are not now in ascendancy, e. g., information relating to the early progress in civilization in China, and the debt which Europe owes to the ancient Irish monasteries and the missionaries who went out from them. A third great obstacle to the adoption of arbitration Prof. Adeler finds in the fact that ethical standards now applied to individuals are not applied between nations. He said that not many months since a leading congressman had said that the moral law did not apply between nations as between men, and a prominent university professor had attempted to justify him in his position.

Where, asked Prof. Adeler, is the Christianity of the Christian nations? And then he spoke of "the priceless idea of Christianity" that we shall regard every human being as potentially our equal, not because he actually is so, but because we believe that under favorable conditions he may become so.

The speaker then spoke of the necessity of a force to compel nations to resort to judicial means of deciding disputes, to forbid the vendetta between nations as it is forbidden between individuals and families. He thought that the force of organized public opinion would accomplish this result, but distinguished between public opinion and public sentiment, the former being the result of calm deliberation, the latter of sudden impulse or passion. He complained that there is great need especially in a democracy, for new organs of public opinion. The newspapers in general respond to public sentiment rather than lead public opinion. The pulpit, the pamphlet, the platform, and the influence of the intellectual and moral classes are at present our reliance in seeking to educate and form a sound public opinion.

Several speakers emphasized the thought that women can do as much to inculcate right standards of courage and to form sound public opinion by influencing children and others.

At its final session the conference adopted a declaration expressing its feeling of satisfaction at the results of the Hague conference and calling upon our government to endeavor to secure treaties with other powers making resort to the new tribunal obligatory instead of simply permissive.

Regret was expressed that the Olney-Pauncefote treaty should have failed of ratification by our Senate, and on the other hand Italy and Argentine were congratulated upon having successfully negotiated a permanent obligatory treaty providing for the arbitration of any disputes which may arise between them. A committee was appointed to wait upon President McKinley and present the recommendations contained in the declaration and a second committee was appointed to attend, if possible, the Congress of American Republics which meets in the City of Mexico this year and urge the negotiation of permanent arbitration treaties between the nations of the New World.

Edward G. Rhoads.

"There is much said in a carping way which is far more calculated to arouse the feelings of the natural man and irritate him, than to reach the sure witness in his soul."

A Short Account of Rachel Wilson.

She was born in Kendel, in Westmoreland, England, about the year 1721, and received a religiously guarded education. Her parents were valuable Friends, and their example, together with the instructive company of many sound and exemplary Friends, who visited them whilst traveling in the service of the Gospel, appeared to be blessed to her. The visitations of Divine love were early extended to her, and being submitted to, she was much redeemed from the love of earthly pleasures, and those amusements in which the young so commonly delight. She was led in solitude and secret retirement before the Lord, and having passed through the necessary baptism, she was called to the work of the ministry about the eighteenth year of her age. Her friends say "she labored much among those not in profession with us, who flocked to her testimony in the course of her travels, and was eminently qualified for that service, by explaining the way of life and salvation, in a manner that reached the Witness in the hearts of the hearers, whereby many were brought to an acknowledgment of the Truth."

Whilst in this country, her ministry was greatly admired, and she was much followed by those who were not of our religious society, because of the beauty and correctness of the language she made use of. There was, however, something better than eloquence in her public communications and the plain, simple, honest-hearted Christian travellers felt her to be, and owned her as, a sound and baptizing minister of the Gospel of Christ.

At Buck's (Pennsylvania) Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, held at Falls, Eighth Month 30th, 1769, she had a large and lively communication. She was first drawn in an affectionate address to the ministers, exhorting them to watch for the right time, in rising to exercise their gifts. In illustration she used the familiar saying, "Strike whilst the iron is hot;" and adverted to the useless labor of the blacksmith if he delayed striking till his iron was cold. She then addressed those young in the ministry. She knew when elder Friends were present, they often attempted to smother their exercises. She said her way had often been opened by a few words dropped in the simplicity, in the forepart of the meeting. There were those, who, when they apprehend they have something given them to deliver, keep it long to themselves. They chew it, and chew it, until they have taken all the substance out, and then, perhaps, just at the close of a meeting, find themselves uneasy with having let the right time pass by, stand up, and as it were, spit it out, when it is no use to anyone.

At the same meeting in addressing the elders, she compared them to snuffers, and the ministers to the lamps. She said under the law the command was that the snuffers should be made of the same beaten gold as the lamps. She then enlarged on the use of the snuffers. She said without them the tallow, the life of the candle, would be in danger of wasting; that they were of great service when skilfully used to take off superfluous matter. The lamp or candle burned much brighter when the operation was performed with judgment. Yet she had a caution against their too frequent application. She had seen evil effects result therefrom; and some people seemed seldom easy unless they were snuffing. In the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, held at Philadelphia in the succeeding month, she was led in the same line, adding, some are so fond of snuffing, they at length waste the life of the candle, and sometimes put it out. It is much easier to take away the light than to give it. She said for the encouragement of the young, she had been comforted by every communication in the several meetings, which had been in the line of the Truth. None had been in her way that had been in the Life.

An Ideal in the Education of Women.

It must always be remembered that men and women are not a different order of beings. They find their fullest and completest development together. The order of nature does not change, yet Nature's law is growth, and with that growth the position of women has changed, and with that change the cultivation of the individual becomes more important. The problem is not simply that of bringing children into the world, but what kind of children shall be born, what kind of a mother shall be educated, or, if the highest development of motherhood is denied her, how shall she take her place in the world, a useful and honored member of the community, having children of her spirit? For I take it the eternal feminine is simply this. It is the power of love which has its throne in a good woman's heart. Call it altruism, if you like; call it the mother sea, found a philosophy or a system of speculation upon it—it is simply this endless capacity of love and devotion which Mary of Bethany showed when she sat at Jesus' feet. . . . .

"The soul is the supreme power always. To enlarge its kingdom, to bring warring elements under its control—this is the supreme task of education. Intellectual knowledge is so much dead matter until it is vitalized by a union with the soul's wisdom. . . .

"It is because I believe with all my heart in the holiness of life that I stand here to-day. I believe that women have an increasingly important part to play in that life. With enlarged opportunities come increased responsibilities—responsibilities as yet unadjusted to unaccustomed shoulders. It is to cast my mite into the treasury of the world's experience that I come. It is because I believe in divine life among men, in the direct and personal connection of each soul with its Maker, that I dare to take up the great work you are committing to my care. Humanity without divinity is of the dust that perishes. Humanity joined to divinity can compass the humanly impossible. Therefore, on this day, at this solemn hour of accepting a trust, I speak not of knowledge, wide and profitable as is that great field, but I speak of wisdom, the gift of heaven, which must descend like gentle rain to fructify and fertilize, or there can be no harvest fit for the nourishment of man."—Inaugural Address of President Caroline Hazard (author of "Narragansett Friends' Meeting".)

WE cannot choose happiness either for ourselves or others, for we cannot tell where it will lie. We can only choose whether we will indulge ourselves in the present moment or whether we will renounce that for the sake of obeying the Divine voice within us. — The Watchman.

Views on Civil Government.

The representatives of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends for New England [in 1840], being impressed with the importance of diffusing among their own members and in the Christian community, correct information on some points of our faith and practice, have believed it right for them at this time to issue this Address, to the end that the principles that we have ever maintained in relation thereto, since our origin as a people, may be faithfully supported by us, and clearly understood by others.

It is a time of much excitement in civil and religious society, and we are earnestly desirous that our members may individually seek to manifest on all occasions, a meek and quiet spirit, ever demeaning themselves as good citizens, prompt in the support of right order, and in all things adorning the doctrines we profess. This has at all times been the concern of our Society—acknowledging God as the alone Supreme Ruler of the conscience, they have been ever ready cheerfully to submit to all the laws and ordinances of men that did not conflict therewith, and to contribute to the support of well-ordered civil government.

We do indeed believe that war and fighting are contrary to the Divine will, and unlawful for us as christians, and we cannot, therefore, in any way, countenance or contribute to military operations.

We believe that under the government of the Prince of Peace, swords are to be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks, and men are to learn war no more. The nature of the Christian dispensation, in contrast with the fierce passions of man, is beautifully portrayed by the evangelical prophet —"Every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire. For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end" (Isaiah ix : 5, 6, 7).

When our Saviour walked among men, He inculcated the principles of peace in clear and emphatic language, and by his own shining example—"Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth —but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil." "Ye have heard that it hath been said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy —but I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven." And in his own example, when He could have summoned twelve legions of angels to his rescue, He quietly submitted to his persecutors, and in the end offered the intercession, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The apostle James, in allusion to this subject queries, "From whence come wars and fightings amongst you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?"

Believing, then, that under the Christian dispensation, which was ushered in with the annunciation of "Peace on earth, good will toward men," we cannot in any way be engaged in war or contribute to its support; every faithful member of our body has felt bound conscientiously to abstain from all participation in and in our earlier existence as a people, before our principles were well understood, we were subjected to the spoiling of goods, imprisonment and much suffering, on account of religious scruples in this respect—but we do not in the Divine sight do otherwise than steadfastly maintain our testimony, based as it is the precepts of Him who was emphatically Prince of Peace, and consonant with the doctrines and practice of his apostles and early followers.

Nor can we for conscience sake agree any commutations for military requisitions for hereby should we be consenting to the justness and propriety of the exaction. And this we trust that those who view this subject differently from us, will discover no disposition to screen ourselves from onerous duties, will do us the justice to believe that it is the answer of a pure conscience unto God which is dearer to us than our natural life. And for the sincerity of our motives, we appeal to the history of our Society, in which no instance will be found where a consistent member has ever borne arms, or voluntarily paid a fine or tax as an equivalent; but has chosen rather patiently to suffer whatever might be inflicted upon him for the support of his religious belief.

Within the limits of New England, our ex ples as to bearing arms have generally received the favorable consideration of the different State legislatures, and we trust that our members will continue to act so consistently with their Christian profession as that they may still be deemed worthy of the immunity which has been heretofore extended.

But while we have thus felt bound unconditionally promisingly to maintain our belief of the peaceable nature of the Christian dispensation, we have ever acknowledged the propriety and necessity of human government in conducting the affairs of men; and have since our origin, from time to time, declared our views in respect, manifesting our fidelity to whatever government an overruling Providence may place us under. Nor do we believe that in any way our peaceful principles are at all infringed upon.

We find in the New Testament clear and undeniable evidence that civil government was fully recognized by Christ himself and his apostles; and we have ever considered it to be essential to the preservation of good order and the promotion of the happiness of mankind; nor have we as a Society any unity with the views of those who deny the necessity of human governments.

When the apostle Peter was inquired of, "Does not your master pay tribute?" he replied in the affirmative, and Christ upon the occasion wrought a miracle to obtain money to pay for himself and the apostle. Here the authority of civil government in exacting tribute is acknowledged by our Lord, and practically complied with; and in no instance do we find that he refused to conform to it when expressly commanded to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

We may now introduce several injunctions and conclusions of the apostles respecting governments in their own words. "Let every bject unto the higher powers ; for there rdained of God: whosoever, therefore, re-h the power, resisteth the ordinance of ct, not only for wrath, but also for con-ce' sake: For, for this cause pay ye tribute ually upon this very thing" (Rom. xiii: 1

"Submit yourselves to every ordinance ese citations from Holy Scripture we think iently establish the position that civil gov-ent was recognized and sustained by the r of Christianity and his apostles, and we roceed to show that the Society of Friends ways acknowledged its authority and con-ed to its support; and to prove this, we quote from various writers of standard rity in the Society. And, firstly, we adthe testimony of George Fox on this his address to Charles II. from the prison rcester, he asserts that "the spirit which people from all manner of sin and evil, is ith the magistrates' power and with the eous law ; for the law being added be-of transgression, so the spirit which leads transgression is the good spirit of Christ, one with the magistrates in the higher s and owns it and them;" and he expressly res that he and his Friends "are not st, but stand for all good government."

sometimes called upon the civil authority

n, and in an epistle to Friends in some of Vest India islands, when the Governor had ed them to take a part in keeping up a to protect from incursions, and had ed them the privilege of doing so without ing arms, he enters into an argument to the propriety of their complying; and ns them faithfully to perform this ser-and report to the magistrates all cases of e that they may discover, in order that ffender may be arrested in his course and hed—and thus proceeds : "For rulers are o be a terror to the good workers, but to vil ; and wilt thou, then, not be afraid of ower? do that which is good and thou have praise of the same; for he is a min-of God to thee for good, for he should keep down the evil; but if thou doest that which is evil, be afraid ; for he beareth not the sword* in vain; for he is a minister of God to revenge and execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. So he is the revenger and executioner of the wrath of the evil doer, as God hath placed him—on him that steals, or kills, or bears false witness," etc. "And to that power that executes the revenge, and brings the sword* upon the murderer, thief, false witness and other evil doers, we must be subject to that power, and own that power, not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake; which is for the punishment of the evil doers, and the praise of them that do well."

In his letter to Charles II., George Fox thus addresses him: "Thou camest not into this nation by sword, or victory of war ; but by the power of the Lord ; now, if thou dost not live in it, thou wilt not prosper."

The Virtue of Sincerity.

Sincerity is a virtue whether in Christian or heathen, and the vice of hypocrisy loses none of its hatefulness, when exhibited by those who call themselves saints. Most readers will recall the story of the new minister who was advised by the deacons of his church to deal gently with the liquor question because a member of the congregation was a brewer who contributed fifty dollars a year to the church.

"Take fifty dollars a year off my salary," was the answer; "I want a shot at that pew."

The shot was delivered, with the result that the brewer increased his contribution to one hundred dollars; though whether this was done out of admiration of the preacher's sincerity or to ease his own conscience is not recorded.

Every man, however he may squirm under the attack, admires honesty of purpose and sincerity of speech in an opponent. "What makes you go to hear that man preach ?" said a gentleman to a friend ; "you don't believe in what he says."

"No, but he does," was the answer, "and I like in these days to hear a man who has some convictions."

Sir Algernon West, in his Recollections, tells of the rebuke given to the Norwich Bible Society by Lord Oxford. The gentlemen composing the Bible Society, probably in the hope of deriving some financial benefit from their action, had chosen him as president, although his character was well known to be not in keeping with the position. Whatever vices his lordship may have possessed he seems to have had the virtue of sincerity, as the following extract from his reply will show :

". . . I have long been addicted to the gaming table. I have lately taken to the turf. I fear I frequently blaspheme. But I have never distributed religious tracts. All this was known to you and your society, notwithstanding which you think me a fit person to be your president. God forgive your hypocrisy." —The Armory.

LONG ago we remember a celebrated professor telling his class that no one knows anything unless he can state it clearly and with sufficient fullness to make it understood by others.

*The term sword, is used by Friends figuratively, as emblematical of the power vested in the civil magistrate.

"A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver."

We cannot always estimate the value of a word fitly spoken.

A Friend whom the love of Christ constrained for the salvation of souls to visit the sick and afflicted, and who spent much of a period in her life in visiting prisons and hospitals, in one of her rounds in Bellevue Hospital, about the year 1866, one day in passing through a ward containing several that were of her special interest, saw that a new patient had been brought in. She had been placed beside the cot where a good old Christian woman lay, who, through much suffering, was cheerful and magnifying the goodness of her Father in heaven for the mercy extended toward her.

This day she was sadly mourning over the new patient, fearing her soul would be lost. She said, "See, Mrs.—, there is a poor creature that cannot live. She will not heed anything that is said to her." There is a person kneeling beside her reading to her. Her eyes are closed, and she will not pay any attention to him.

When he left, the Friend went and stood beside her, saying gently, "Thou art very sick." When the first word was spoken, she opened her eyes and looked at her with such a sorrowful look, mingled with gratification, as can not be described. When she saw the dress corresponded with the language, she exclaimed, "Ah, you are a Quaker ! The Quakers are the best people in the world." Renewed strength was given her, as she told a little of her history. She said : "My father and mother were Friends and excellent people, and wanted to bring me up in a Christian way, shielding and protecting me from what they believed wrong. But I rebelled, and was induced to privately leave my good home in pursuit of wordly pleasures, and wandered away from my Heavenly Father's house step by step. I plunged deeper and deeper in sin, and here I am without hope dying in this hospital."

The agony of grief as she related her downward course was pitiful to witness. She was pointed to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. For a time her lamentations could not be soothed. She feared it was past the eleventh hour with her, and how could she hope for mercy? The Friend knelt by her in earnest, fervent prayer. The poor sufferer's heart was touched, and in penitential strains joined in the prayer, sometimes with groans that could not be uttered. There was a pleading for her life to be spared until she should receive pardon. In this resting state the Friend left her. The next day she found her longing for peace ; yet a ray of hope began to dawn as she realized one of her father's and mother's people had come to her with messages of love for her soul, and with this dawn of a little faith she took hold of the promises repeated to her, wherein our holy Redeemer said, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Still further, "Come, now, let us reason together, saith the Lord ; though your sins may be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow ; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." And she was assured that she was cared for; it was the Holy Spirit that was striving with her.

Again the Friend knelt by her. A quiet came over her as she felt she was indeed left in her Heavenly Father's hands.

Early the next morning the Friend was again with her. Now was a time of thanksgiving and praise. She was rejoicing in the forgiveness of her sins, and said, "My Saviour came to me in the night and said He would take me to live with Him in heaven. He looked so lovely. I am sure I shall know Him when I get there."

There remains no doubt that in this happy state her redeemed spirit returned to God, who gave it. The Friend was favored to see her peaceful close, and, with other Friends, had her respectably buried, accompanying her remains to the New York Friends' burial ground.

"Spelling-Book Webster."

Noah Webster, whom we sophisticated moderns call "the lexicographer," but whom our grandfathers spoke of as "spellin' book Webster," is to have a monument—as if the dictionary itself were not monumentum aere perennius. He was born in 1758, in that part of Hartford, Conn., since set off as the town of West Hartford. He lived to the age of 84, and he has been dead more than half a century. A charter has been granted to the Noah Webster Memorial Association, organized for the purpose of raising money for a library in memory of the great literary worker, and to erect in the place of his birth a building which shall be worthy of his name and fame. The co-operation of the public is desired in this undertaking, and there are some good grounds for the claim upon national support for the project. "According to Webster" was for a generation, before the flood of the voluminous modern dictionaries, the ultimatum for the American in all matters relating to spelling, pronunciation and definition, and "Webster On-a-bridge," as the old lady called it, has been the arbiter of many hot disputes. But it is to Webster's spelling-book that our orthography owes its greatest debt. In our years of national expansion, when the westward rush of population outran schools and schoolmasters, the speller was one of the two or three books which was sure to find its way to the new settlements. Webster's spelling-book and the Bible were the entire educational equipment of many a frontier community, and very respectable corner-stones they proved themselves. There were decades when the speller was in such common use that it seemed to have become a staple American article like ham and flour, and the reported sale amounted to millions, far surpassing the circulation of other books printed in America, always excepting the Bible. Webster's memory deserves to be perpetuated, for under enormous discouragements he accomplished, singlehanded, a work in lexicography which must always inspire the respect of the learned, but in our opinion Webster's chief claim to the gratitude of his countrymen is not the bulky quarto, but the little blue-covered volume in which the young democracy learned its A B C.—The Chautauquan.

"MOTHER," said a child, "I have found God." "Where have you found him?" asked her mother. "In heaven," said the little girl in reply. Her elder sister laughed at her, and said: "Well, Phebe, have you been to heaven?" "No," the child said, "but the kingdom of heaven has come to me."

Sermon by Robert Barclay.

MY FRIENDS, This is the testimony that was borne of old, and it is also borne this day, that there may be an agreement between the members and the head, the word and the power, the notion and the substance: He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life. So that in this the substance is known, whereby men are redeemed to life unto God, and to life for God, and to glorify Him. This is the end of the testimony of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, that we may all come to partake of his life, and that by partaking of it we may live upon it; and being made alive to Him we will then be made able to serve Him, then shall we be enabled to worship Him, to glorify Him, and to declare of his glory and of his power, and of his wisdom, and of his goodness, to those that are strangers to Him, and to invite all to be partakers thereof. Let all your eyes this day be towards Him, and to the enjoyment of his life, that you may be sensible, and that you may be witnesses of his life.

And this life is not to be obtained but by death; there is a dying before there is a living. Every plant, seed, or grain that is placed in the earth dies before it grows up; there is a dying before there is a living. Those that come to the life of the Son of God, they come to it through death; for it was through dying that He obtained this life: it was necessary that the Son of God, the Prince of Life, should die, that He should be crucified, else He could not finish the work of our salvation, and make way for the revelation and the sowing of that seed, and the dispensation of that grace whereby we might come to have a share with Him in that eternal life He obtained for us. They that come to the life of the Son of God they must obey Him, for they must receive the sentence of death to that life which they derive from Adam, that cursed, that corrupt life of unrighteousness, that life of ungodliness, that life wherein self and the will of man delights, wherein the natural man, the animal man, hath a life. We must die, and by dying come to be partakers of the life of Jesus. He communicates himself to us; and by our receiving Him we receive life: He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life; and the consequence is he that hath not this life hath not the Son of God.

This is the true way for every one to try and examine themselves by, and to make a true judgment of themselves, that they may know whether they have the Son of God or not, whether they have Christ or not. If they have Christ they have the benefits of his death and of his blood and sufferings. They that have this life in them they are in the faith, they are partakers of justification and sanctification, and adoption; and all those that are under the dispensation of the Gospel, that have the benefits of Christ's death, to those He giveth himself; and to those to whom He giveth himself He giveth this life. This is not the life of Adam, a life of unrighteousness, but a life that springs from the heavenly incorruptible seed. Such as partake of it are born again of the Word of the Lord, that remains forever. This is a life that comes from the Lord from Heaven, the quickening Spirit; and this life tends heavenward; it looks heavenward; it carries the affections towards the things that are above; it dwells not in them that have their pleasure in this world; it looks not to things of this world; it comes from heaven and tends to heaven again; it raiseth the soul that is quickened by it. They that are be of it are made heavenly by it; it makes heavenly that are quickened by it. By this may know that we have the Son of God; by t we have an understanding of Him, and brought into Him that is true.

And this is the living manifestation Christ, whereby He cometh into thy soul, into my soul. This is the gift of God: we ceive God's gift that we may receive life fr and by Him, that we may live this life. T is that which make the yoke of Christ easy his burden light, and his commandments grievous to us. The life of Christ doth work of Christ naturally. Those that are the flesh mind the things of the flesh; th that live a carnal life they mind the works the flesh; it is their joy, their delight and th pleasure, that which their hearts are carr after. They rise early and lie down late, all for this end, it is that which their hea run after the day long. What is the reason it? they are in the flesh, in the life of lu that life moves them, and acts them, and g erns them. That life useth and employeth their faculties, their understandings, wills, fections, and imaginations: and it useth all members of their bodies to please the fle fulfill the lusts thereof; these are the cor quences of a life of unrighteousness in th things that are unrighteous.

But those that have received the Spirit God, they have received Jesus Christ the of God; and this is the consequence, they become dead to the life of unrighteousn All that are dead in sin and trespasses He h quickened. Now when you have received Son of God you have received a new life, other life; then your affections are set u things that are above, and you are come to in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. "It is not a good omen for the republic," says the Springfield Republican, that "the Society of Friends continues to decrease in numbers, even in Philadelphia, where it should still be strong. It is, indeed, still strong in that city, and in Baltimore, in the personal representation it has in every excellent cause, national or local — in the moral strength it gives through the men and women of the meeting who are engaged in humanitarian work. Note the membership and the official list of unpaid service in important causes—of the red man, of the negro, of public charities, of the purification of the civil service; wherever there is even a small body of Friends, there will be found the Quaker element strongly in evidence. The time has come for a vigorous proselytization, like that of George Fox, though adapted with judgment and prudence to the conditions of the day—to renew and magnify the Quaker spirit, which is always in behalf of the finest and noblest life. Now more than ever the declaration against war should be emphasized. What thing more refreshing is there in the current news of the day than the refusal of a Quaker business firm to accept a government contract for articles to be used in warships? More of this adhesion to lofty principle, removed from the cheap surrender of the day, is wanted in this republic, if it is to remain a republic, and not to abandon its past for an imperial future."

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, held at Mount Laurel, N. J., on the 14th instant, was believed to be owned as an edifying occasion. The meeting at Merchantville was again authorized to be continued under a committee for six months, and Cyrus Cooper, from West Grove Monthly Meeting, Pa., having a minute for religious service in the limits of Haddonfield and Burlington Quarterly Meetings, was encouraged to pursue his prospect.

Some years ago, when educated Japanese began to make the acquaintance of Friends in Philadelphia, the doctrine of Friends was pronounced by some of them to be peculiarly adapted to gain ground among the larger part of the Japanese people, particularly those who were imbued with the doctrine of Shintoism. We are now reminded of this by a letter in which Inazo Nitobe states that the original teaching of Shintoism was Monotheistic and spiritual; that the Supreme Deity "who appears first in the 'Ancient Record'" as the very creating power, has never had even a temple erected for worship; for an ancient formula makes distinction of two kinds of worship. One of supplication—asking for favors; the other of thanksgiving—gratitude for favors received or for good deeds done. Now, it says the first kind (supplication) is to be addressed only to the Supreme Deity, and the precept said expressly, "This kind of prayer is to be made to a Spirit in (by) Spirit.

"The other kind (thanksgiving) is to be made to the individual powers, agencies or men, that conferred the good.

"It is curious that in the imperial palace, where, of course, the ancient traditions are kept intact and sacred, there is no shrine for this Arch-deity, who is to be worshipped in spirit as to a Spirit, whereas the lesser deities, so to speak (namely) powers or agencies, have their places of worship."

According to a New York weekly paper, "The most interesting feature of the annual meeting of Friends or Quakers, which has just occurred in New York City, was the reaffirmation of the root (?) of Quaker belief. There has probably been no Discipline of that Church which has not contained a positive declaration as to the unrighteousness of all war. The Quaker position on this subject is historic and consistent. In their social and political life, however, Friends are subject to influences tending to weaken their testimony upon this question. J. B. Garret, of Philadelphia, one of the principal speakers, pleaded with his hearers to be firm in their adherence to the principles of peace. 'The spirit of the Gospel,' he said, 'from first to last is peace and love and all that tends to unity. Study the fruits of the spirit as given by the apostle in the Epistle to the Galatians. How can you and I accept the trend of the Gospel and yet justify war in any way?' He declared that Friends should ask themselves these questions: (1) Is the spirit of peace in our hearts? (2) Do we manifest it in our family, business and social life? (3) Are we influencing public opinion in governmental affairs as we are called upon to do?—for public opinion is responsible for clash of arms and for the maintenance of warlike measures. Referring to affairs at Peking, he added: 'The Chinese have a right to an undivided empire, and it is the duty of Christian nations to go to them with the Gospel of Christ. No man or nation is justified in taking human life, even that civilization may follow. It is never right to do evil that good may come.' A later speaker remarked that the beatitude of to-day does not sound like the old beatitudes; that of to-day is, 'Blessed be war, for it extends the Gospel of Christ'—but brute force is not the force Christ chose to promulgate his Gospel. Another popular beatitude is, 'Blessed are the expansionists, for they shall inherit the earth,' but this is not in full accord with what we have been taught of the Gospel of Christ. In reply it might be said that all expansionism is not the deification of brute force."

A writer in the San Francisco Examiner invents a fable to rebuke B. Fay Mills' impious challenge to the Almighty—given during a public lecture in the Metropolitan Temple—"to reveal Himself to him then."

"And the temple did not fall upon his head, nor did the speaker fall dead where he stood. The next day Mr. Mills was out upon the Oakland hills, gazing at the Golden Gate and the incoming waves, musing upon the wonderful works of his unknown god, who rules the universe without intelligence and revolves the world by the uncreated law of evolution. He stepped unconsciously upon a colony of industrious ants, and crushed nine hundred and forty-seven by subsequent actual count ; whereupon, after the ceremony of interment in the ant cemetery had been held and the unfortunate victims of apparent cruel destruction of an unknown cause had been laid at rest, a meeting was held in the great ant heap (Mr. Mills still being within two feet of the massive pile), to discuss the mighty question of the cause of the awful catastrophe. Many philosophers were present, and many theories were advanced, all based upon the absorbing question of whether or not there is such a power as Man.

"At last a particularly eloquent and philosophic ant arose and said; 'I challenge Man now to reveal himself to me, or forever after hold his peace,' whereupon he was loudly applauded by all the bald-headed ants in the heap. But Mr. Mills did not reveal himself to the ants, perhaps because the ants could not comprehend his revelation."

We would adopt no more than the moral of the above fable, and disown the unjust parallel between a destructive man and our Heavenly Father; and would add that as He is not subject to men's challenges for special revelations of himself, the same folly on man's part appears in the use of an oath, which is an arbitrary challenge to the Almighty to be obedient to a man's call for a curse.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—Nothing has been received at Washington from any official source to confirm the alarming reports of the destruction of the Embassies and Legations in Pekin, and the Government is not able to open communication with the scene of the troubles. The U. S. gunboat Concord has been despatched from Manila, under sealed orders, presumably for Tien Tsin, and the Ninth Regiment has been ordered to Manila, whence it will proceed to China.

The commerce of the U. S. in the fiscal year which ends with this month, will by far exceed that of any preceding year; its exports will surpass those of any earlier year by more than $150,000,000, and its experts of manufacturers will exceed those of any preceding year by more than $75,000,000. Its imports, owing to the demands of the manufacturers of the country for foreign raw material for use in their industries, will also be large. Raw silk, unmanufactured fibres, crude rubber, hides and skins, pig tin for use in tinplate establishments, cabinet woods and the finer grades of cotton and the coarser grades of wool, all show a large increase as compared with preceding years. It is on the export side, however, that the year makes its greatest record. The total exports for the eleven months of the year amount to $1,286,214,534, and should the figures this month prove as large as those of last, it would bring the total up to $1,400,000,000, or $173,000,000 greater than the year 1899.

The controversy between St. Louis Transit Company and its striking employes has developed into a struggle between capital and labor along the lines of a boycott. This situation is the result of the refusal of the Transit Company to submit to arbitration the question of reinstatement of the striking employes, as proposed by the Federation of Labor.

Judge Townsend, in a recent decision in reference to the application of tariff laws in Porto Rico says, the meaning of the treaty of Paris is that Porto Rico is "acquired, but not incorporated," and the uniformity clause of the Constitution does not apply. In its relation to foreign countries Porto Rico, under the decision, is a part of the United States, but the island is a foreign country in its relation to the United States, "and within the meaning of the tariff acts," as they stood at the time of the cession. Another decision of the lower Federal Courts lays down the doctrine that Porto Rico is an integral part of the U. S., and that upon the cession all the provisions of the Constitution in respect to personal and property rights became applicable to the island. A discussion of the Supreme Court of the United States is necessary to determine the status of Porto Rico.

She had but four passengers on board, who had between them $300,000 in gold. There were 3000 people at Nome when the steamer left, who had staked every creek in the country, and wherever a hole had been sunk pay dirt was brought up. During the winter at Nome coal was selling at $200, wood $60 a cord and shovels $25 each.

It affords an entirely secure means of escape for children, which the outside open iron fire escape does not do.

Tongue-Sinning and Conduct-Sinning.

I said, I will take heed unto my ways that not with my tongue." Here the axe is at the root of tongue-sinning, and not at act only. We have been in the habit of ing this as if it said, "I will take heed y tongue that I sin not with it." But in r not to sin with the tongue we are incted to cleanse our "ways,"—the ways of heart from which the mouth speaks. Keep fountain sweet and the stream of our lange will be sweet. "A good man, out of the d treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that h is good; and an evil man, out of the treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that h is evil: for of the abundance of the t his mouth speaketh."

o take heed unto our ways, then, is to take l unto the purity of our heart. To cleanse ways is to take heed unto them according he Divine word (Ps. cxix: 9). This inspeak-monitor will check the ways and motions in vhich are about to produce an evil fruit of ls or acts, and will approve the outgoing he fruit of Christ's spirit. In this way by his true and holy witness and word in will bring every work to judgment," as it bout to issue into outward act, "with y secret thing, whether it be good or her it be evil." Happy will it be for us cipient evil ways thus go so far before l to judgment as not to be committed.

iis cleansing word is a sanctifying word.
leanses only as it is heeded and obeyed.
nctify them through thy truth," said the
our. "Thy word is truth." "Now are ean through the word which I have spoken you" (John xv: 3). "That He might tify and cleanse it by the washing of water he word" (Eph. v: 26).

o the holy word of God would touch our ls before they are uttered, to cleanse
n. So would He cleanse our ways by creg in us a clean heart and renewing a right spirit within us. Herein will stand our exemption from tongue-sinning; provided also we do not seek to rest in our own exemption, but are obedient to the Word which cleanses us to "teach transgressors his ways." We are called not merely to repose in the light, but to "walk in the light, as He is in the light," so as to "have fellowship one with another" in harmonious labor for the honor of Truth, and "the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." "Much more being reconciled by his death shall we be saved by his life." Through his pierced side appears not only "the washing of water by the word," but the cleansing blood, that life might be given to love as "the fulfilling of the law" of his sanctifying word.

If the security against sinning with our tongue is a cleansing of our ways by the purifying of their source, are we thus excused from all heed to the tongue itself,—to its words and syllables? A true concern to draw pure water will be the same care over the stream and the hydrant as over the spring. Our words will need watching from the heart to their last lip, else they are not safe. There may be slips of the tongue which were not slips of the heart, but their harm is often the same. Besides, the very exercise of concern to have each word a pure word, is an exercise in and unto pureness of heart. "Hold fast the form of sound words, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus." This ought we to do, and not to leave the other undone. The reflex action of our words (like other outward acts) upon the condition of our heart cannot be overestimated. The heart cannot long remain under a godly concern for truth and holiness, where heed is not given to the tongue itself to shape its words as having their foundation in truth and their source in purity. What a preserving effect upon the character of members of the Society of Friends the observance of its testimonies for truth in speech and address has been! We doubt that those who now abjure the testimonies would be taking the pride in their Quaker ancestry which they now exhibit had that ancestry been the same balkers of the testimonies that their admiring and recreant descendants prefer to be. It remains to be seen how far our posterity also will rise up to call us blessed, for the moral and spiritual fibre of characters not so braced up by testimonies for truth of tongue, in uprightness before worldly conformity, and by walking in simplicity with the Word.

While these thoughts were seeking utterance the following contributions came in by mail, which we welcome as an instance of "harmonious labor:"

CARE OF MY TONGUE.

1st. When I am angry I will never speak till I have taken as much time for reflection as Athenodorus prescribed to Cæsar.

2d. I will never talk to an angry man.

3d. I will not talk to a man intoxicated with strong drink.

4th. I will receive admonition from my friends with candor and thankfulness, and will be careful not to make a peevish reply to any one who gives me advice, though it be officious or even impertinent.

5th. That I may be kept from speaking amiss of my Christian brethren or others, I will pray for them.

6th. With the exception of cases in which Christian prudence requires secrecy, I will consider it sinful to say anything of others privately, which I would not say openly. In general, I will deal in secrets as little as possible.

"Always repeat the twenty-four letters of the Greek alphabet before you give way to the impulse of anger."—E. Porter.

BRIDLING THE TONGUE.

St. James says: "If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain." True religion, therefore, controls the tongue as we control a horse with a bridle; and he whose tongue is like an untamed and untrained horse gives evidence that his religion is defective, whatever he may profess, and however devoted he may appear.

A bridle is used for two purposes—first, to restrain, and secondly, to guide the animal on which it is used. This explains what the Scripture means by bridling the tongue. First, it means to hold it in check, to control it, so as not to allow it to speak untruthfully, uncharitably, unrighteously or in any evil way. Second, to bridle the tongue is to guide its use aright. It is a great thing to know when to speak and when to be silent, what to say and what not to say. The Lord says: "To him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God."

And again it is written, "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body."

The tongue is just as correct an indicator moral and religious as it is of physical conditions. Naturally, however, it is "an unruly member, full of deadly poison;" and it is written, "The tongue can no man tame." The grace of God can tame and sanctify it, however, until its words, fitly spoken, will be like "apples of gold in pictures of silver."—Free Methodist.

STICK TO THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.

A Methodist clergyman was heard to say, in conversation recently, in a public dining hall, "I wish the Quakers would stick to the plain language wherever they go. It is so beautiful, and it designates them as a separate people, or community whom the world can trust." "I wish so, too," answered the other. These men had both passed the meridian of life and had both filled important stations in the Church of their adoption, being at this time presiding elders.

This much in favor of continuing the use of the language of the fathers, the language of the Bible.—Selected.

Instructive Incidents and Selections.

J. P. related that, in early life, she lived a near neighbor to a family of Friends named C——. They were exceedingly kind and hospitable neighbors, bringing up their family in much simplicity, but, being in humble circumstances, had given way to the temptation of neglecting meetings, in order to get through with more work. This so grew upon the parents that neither they nor their children were often seen at a place of worship.

Many years after J. P. had married and removed to Philadelphia she visited her early home, and had a great desire to see these old neighbors, from whom she had received much kindness in childhood. She went to their house, but was told the aged mother of the family was now a widow, and the victim of a high degree of insanity, which made it unfit for her to be seen. J. P. was grieved at this intelligence, but learning that her chamber window opened upon a long piazza fronting the house, she walked out on it, hoping to catch a glimpse of her. Finding the room window was raised, she walked toward it. The insane woman was standing near it, with disheveled hair and distracted countenance, but, seeing her, she quietly said, "Is this J. P?" Having answered, "Yes," she continued to speak in a clear, calm tone. "I remember thee well. Thy aunt, M. Dickinson, was a preacher, and when I was a young housekeeper she paid a religious visit at our house, and warned me against a worldly, covetous spirit, which was eating out our religion, and keeping us and our children from attending religious meetings, saying, if we persisted in this course of living, a grievous calamity would overtake me, in which I would end my days—and this is it." She then walked away, returning to her previous condition, in which she died.

SARAH WILSON.

Sarah Wilson was the wife of Edward Wilson, a shipping merchant of Philadelphia, of great wealth. She was born in England, and her early years were spent in much privation. The writer of this heard her allude to this circumstance in a large Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia.

Endeavoring to extend the language of sympathetic encouragement to those in humble circumstances, she said she had been a bound servant, and was her master's shoe-black, and that she had sometimes walked forty miles to attend her Quarterly Meeting.

Notwithstanding all the abundance, convenience and luxury which surrounded her, after marriage, she ever retained a Gospel humility and simplicity, which prosperity had not power to mar.

She was a living minister, and about the year 1816 felt it required of her to visit the Southern States and the Yearly Meeting of North Carolina on a religious visit, but had mentioned the prospect to no one. About the same time, J. P., a worthy elder, had felt an impression of mind that she should be called away from her family, either by death or absence, the evidence becoming so clear that, for about three months, she was engaged in "setting her house in order," both secretly and openly, having a family of young children. When Sarah Wilson opened her prospect to her friends, J. P. saw, for the first time, in what way she was to be led, and embraced the call to accompany her.

As an evidence of the ever-present and watchful care of the Unslumbering Shepherd over those whose whole trust is in Him and who eye Him in all things, it may be profitable to relate a circumstance which occurred during this journey.

They were attending a meeting at Richmond, Va. Soon after it became settled, J. P. felt a clear intimation that no public service would be required of Sarah Wilson that day, but it was not long before she knelt in supplication, during which the belief that it was unauthorized by the Head of the Church remained on the mind of J. P. After meeting they proceeded to a public house to dine. Sarah, proceeding somewhat in advance, was shown into a private chamber. When J. P. joined her she found Sarah leaning her head on her hand, agitated and distressed. She said, "Oh, Jane, I have disobeyed my Heavenly Father, and his favor is turned away from me," with much more, expressive of grief and penitence. After communing a while, during which J. P. endeavored to console her friend with the plenteous mercy which is in Christ Jesus, the subject passed over.

About two weeks after, as they rode by the way, Sarah Wilson remarked to her companion, "I have never had that near access to my Master since I made that mistake at Richmond that I had before."

A solemn and instructive lesson to all who desire to cleave closely to their Heavenly Leader and to move only at his bidding.

Sarah Wilson died about the year 1820. Richard Jordan was present at the time of her departure. An awful solemnity prevailed for some time, during which he appeared in supplication, saying that he saw the heavenly spirits come to accompany her soul to its glorious home. P. H.

The crowded meeting, the eloquent speech, the fervent appeal, the hearty music, are very enjoyable, but they are not without their perils. The Shepherd's voice may perchance be lost in the excitement of human feeling. To go out of hearing of that voice is fatal to our following Him, but even when we keep within hearing we must be on our guard, lest in the confusion and mixture of other sounds, the one dear Voice should lose all its power and sweetness. For there is but one voice that the flock needs to hear continually. Whatever, then, dulls that voice or divides its influence, is injury which we dare not trifle. H. Bona Mahlon Hocket, a minister among Fri residing in North Carolina, had a neighbor was in the practice of neglecting week meetings. He had built a new house, and fixed on meeting-day to remove thence. In morning one of the children came to Mah on an errand. Mahlon said to the child, " thy father be at meeting?" "No," said child, "we are going to move." He then "Tell thy father he must go to meeting, a he does not go to meeting to-day, before n he will have no house to move to—and tel Mahlon Hocket says so."

The child delivered the message, but father stayed from meeting. A load of g was taken to the new house, and two of children with it. While the father went the second load the children had lighted to some straw near the house. This spre the building, and it was consumed, being blaze when he returned with his load.

ng High Priest and Saviour, for "in all afflictions he was afflicted," need we be rised or feel disheartened when the like gs come near to us? Rather, let us bear ind that "the like afflictions are accomhed in the brethren, "that they are but the ssary fire to humble us before the Lord, urify the heart from dross, and strengthen faith. Christ, by his presence is there, too, gh all unseen to those who suffer; present, le was with the three faithful children in uchadnezzar's fiery furnace, and though the ny would bind them in the bondage of sin, are they freemen in Christ. By the light is presence we see the evil thoughts, the s of the wicked one, we loathe them, we to Jesus, the author and finisher of the ts' faith, and find Him to be a refuge in y time of need, "a strong tower into which righteous run and are safe." As we thus loathe and resist the evil, and give no
e to the evil thoughts presented, examining our own heart to see if its accusations are true as regards ourself, thus watchfully drawing nigh to God, the enemy will soon flee apace, and peace and rejoicing be ours for the victory over sin, not in our power or strength, but the Lord's, to whom our gratitude and all the glory are due.

The enemy of souls, the accuser of the brethren, at times directly, and at other times through those in whom Christ by his Spirit does not bear rule, assaults the poor pilgrims and causes them to walk mournfully on their way. At one time when David, outlawed by Saul, his own father-in-law, returned to Ziklag, he found that the Amalekites had been there, sacked the city and carried away captive the wives and families of David and his men. And even David's own men took council to kill David. Then it was when every earthly helper failed he betook himself to prayer. "He encouraged himself in the Lord," and David's God early turned his adversity into a joyful victory, recovering more than he had lost. In after years, when glory and honor were his, ofttimes did he revert to these sad days, wherein God had proved him, strengthened his faith and prepared him for the office of a king over God's Israel, to which he had already been anointed by Samuel. "Lord, remember David and all his afflictions;" "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in every time of trouble," were lessons God himself had taught David, in this school of the cross.

And now in these gospel days, when David's greater Son, whom he in spirit calls Lord, is not only king over Israel, but the teacher of his people, for "they shall be all taught of God," the Lord uses the same means, this school of adversity, as a training school for those whom He calls to serve Him, and more especially is this the case with those whom He would appoint to more prominent positions in the church militant.

"Seek not," said Jeremiah the prophet to Baruch, his scribe—"Seek not great things for thyself." For Christ's servants, as soldiers of the cross, are called to suffer. To patiently endure hardships is the necessary virtue of every one called to warfare, and it is not less so, to those who are called to this spiritual warfare against wickedness in high places. Rather let the Lord choose thy lot, and place thee where He will, for all his people are taught and loved by Him, and the Lord hath ordained happiness as the lot of all. A call to more active ministry is often accompanied by greater trials of faith. Jeremiah's lot was indeed deplorable, when cast into the dark, filthy dungeon, and knowing that the king's courtiers conspired to take his life. The Lord said to Ananias on sending him to Saul of Tarsus, "I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake" (Acts ix: 16), and Paul subsequently recounts some of the great sufferings he endured for Christ's sake.

But should thou in thy watchful, close walk with God, hear his call to thee for more public service, shouldst thou perceive these trials of faith, and God inclining thee to speak to others of his marvellous works and ways, which He hath in a measure revealed to thy understanding, would it be right to withhold what is his due? Is thy faith not yet strong enough to believe that He who has begun this good work in thee will carry it on to his own glory and thy salvation? Wouldst thou rather choose thy own walk and thus prefer ease to service? If so, couldst thou expect an equal blessing? Zion's ways may languish for want of laborers. It is known to thee, and yet where is thy hand?

The unfaithfulness of others is no excuse to thee, nor in the last day of account will it be accepted as such, rather will it be said to those whom the Great Shepherd calls to water the flock and the service is left undone: "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it not to me." Thy unfaithfulness may prove a stumbling block to others, for, as members of Christ, if one member suffer, all suffer with it. The Lord asks for a willing people in the day of the putting forth of his power. By such Deborah and Barak overcame the hosts of Sisera, and Gideon and his three hundred men those of the Midianites.

Chosen and faithful are those who continue on the Lord's side. Tried and tempted they may be—through honor and dishonor; through evil report and good report, seeking above all to please Him who has called them. Jerusalem and the things of Jerusalem must hold the first place in their affections; then shall all blessings bestowed be a hundredfold sweeter. Wisdom, above that of men, will he bestowed. Christ's promised peace, which neither the world nor the things of the world can give, shall be thine—a glorious hope of immortality, growing brighter as thy eyes grow dim, and the eternal reward of blessedness hereafter. Why not then count the cost, lay these things in the balance of the sanctuary, and give to each its proper place in thy heart. The Lord will abundantly bless thee in all thy works and labor of love, which He calls for at thy hand. The work is not thine, but the Lord's.

Thou art but a day laborer. Leave then the issues to Him, for his blessing and power alone makes the seed to grow. Withhold not then thy hand when He fills it to scatter seed. Thine it may be to sow, another to water and the third to reap. But when the harvest comes both sower and reaper will rejoice together. Paul, a wise and experienced laborer and "master builder" (1 Cor. iii: 10), says, "I would have you without carefulness" (i. e., anxiety), for duty done, is all that is required of us to do. We pass away, He abideth forever. The work goes on and will till the corner-stone is laid, a fit temple for the Lord God to dwell in. God in his grace gave the Lord Jesus as the foundation stone, by the power of his grace He fashions each stone and puts it in its place; and Christ Jesus again becomes the headstone of the corner, a precious corner-stone, the strength and glory of the whole. How can we then ever forget, "We are nothing, Christ is all." To Him and Him alone be all the grace and glory.

Remember, every one has his own peculiar trials. Every heart knows its own sore. These troubles incline the soul to seek help from above. God pours out the spirit of prayer and supplication, giving to each one a sense of his special need. He delights to answer the prayer of the humble and contrite ones. Access to God in prayer is itself a choice blessing. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Thy mourning and prayers will be changed into joyfulness, praise and gratitude. Now may we see how the apostle enjoins us to "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" for if patiently borne they are invariably but a prelude to greater blessings, a cleansing of the pot, before putting incense therein.

THE SEEN AND THE UNSEEN.

ON THE GREAT EXHIBITION, 1851.

BY HORATIUS BONAR.

Ha! yon burst of crystal splendor,
Sunlight, starlight, blent in one;
Starlight set in arctic azure,
Sunlight from the burning zone!
Gold and silver, gems and marble,
All creation's jewelry;
Earth's uncovered waste of riches,
Treasures of the ancient sea.
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

Iris and Aurora bráided—
How the woven colors shine!
Snow-gleams from an Alpine summit,
Torchlight from a spar-roofed mine.
Like Arabia's matchless palace,
Child of magic's strong decree,
One vast globe of living sapphire,
Floor, walls, columns, canopy.
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

Forms of beauty, shapes of wonder,
Trophies of triumphant toil;
Never Athens, Rome, Palmyra,
Gazed on such a costly spoil.
Dazzling the bewildered vision,
More than princely pomp we see;
What the blaze of the Alhambra,
Dome of emerald, to thee?
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

Farthest cities pour their riches,
Farthest empires muster here,
Art her jubilee proclaiming
To the nations far and near.
From the crowd in wonder gazing,
Science claims the prostrate knee;
This her temple, diamond-blazing,
Shrine of her idolatry.
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

Listen to her tale of wonder,
Of her plastic, potent spell;
'Tis a big and braggart story,
Yet she tells it fair and well.
She the gifted, gay magician,
Mistress of earth, air and sea;
This majestic apparition,
Offspring of her sorcery.
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

What to that for which we're waiting,
Is this glittering earthly toy?
Heavenly glory, holy splendor,
Sum of grandeur, sum of joy.
Not the gems that time can tarnish,
Not the hues that dim and die,
Not the glow that cheats the lover,
Shaded with mortality.
Heir of glory,
That shall be for thee and me!

Not the light that leaves us darker,
Not the gleams that come and go,
Not the mirth whose end is madness,
Not the joy whose fruit is woe;
Not the notes that die at sunset,
Not the fashion of a day;
But the everlasting beauty,
And the endless melody.
Heir of glory,
That shall be for thee and me!

City of the pearl-bright portal;
City of the jasper wall;
City of the golden pavement;
Seat of endless festival.
City of Jehovah, Salem,
City of eternity,
To thy bridal-hall of gladness,
From this prison would I flee,
Heir of glory,
That shall be for thee and me!

Ah! with such strange spells around me,
Fairest of what earth calls fair,
How I need thy fairer image,
To undo the syren snare?
Lest the subtle serpent-tempter
Lure me with his radiant lie;
As if sin were sin no longer,
Life were no more vanity.
Heir of glory,
What is that to thee and me?

Yes, I need thee, heavenly city,
My low spirit to upbear:
Yes, I need thee—earth's enchantments
So beguile me by their glare.
Let me see thee, then these fetters
Break asunder; I am free;
Then this pomp no longer chains me;
Faith has won the victory.
Heir of glory,
That shall be for thee and me!

Soon where earthly beauty blinds not,
No excess of brilliance palls,
Salem, city of the holy,
We shall be within thy walls!
There, beside yon crystal river,
There, beneath life's wondrous tree,
There, with naught to cloud or sever—
Ever with the Lamb to be!
Heir of glory,
That shall be for thee and me!

A Yiddish Bible.

Yiddish is the vernacular of the Jews of Eastern and Northern Europe. It is a jargon composed of German and Hebrew, with an admixture of words from other languages. Though all Jews learn to read the Hebrew characters and to pronounce the words correctly, and though also their prayer books are in Hebrew, yet only few really understand the language. Yiddish is the language they actually understand and speak. The Old Testament as usually printed for Jews by their own press contains the Hebrew text, together with a large mass of commentary from the Talmud. It is costly, being in many volumes, and quite beyond the reach of poor Jews, and it is, besides, quite unintelligible to them. Millions of Jews thus grow up in the utmost ignorance of their sacred Scriptures. What they need is a copy of the Old Testament in the familiar Yiddish tongue, printed without note or comment. Such a Bible has been prepared for them by Marcus S. Bergmann, of the London City Mission. Though Yiddish has a number of dialects, M. S. Bergmann has succeeded by a careful selection of language, in producing a Bible which will be intelligible to all. Of this version of the Old Testament 10,000 copies have been printed, and are being circulated in all parts of the world.

Bergmann has also rendered the New T... tament into Yiddish. The four Gospels, ... Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles to the ... mans, Galatians and Hebrews, have each b... separately published and circulated. Of ... Epistle to the Hebrews, 47,000 copies h... been distributed among Jews. Now the c... plete New Testament has been issued.

It has been computed that there are s... six or seven million Jews who do not un... stand the Hebrew Bible, so that the editio... 10,000 copies of the Yiddish version is ... from meeting the whole need. Views on Civil Government.

obert Barclay, in his letter addressed to he ambassadors of the Christian States, asembled at Nimeguen, in the year 1677, to onsult the peace of Christendom, exhorts hem "not to be unwilling to hear one that ap-eared among them for the interest of Christ, is King and Master—not as if thereby he ere to be the just authority of sovereign princes e refused to acknowledge the subjection him-elf owes to his lawful prince and superior, or ere in any ways inclined to favor the dreams
f such as, under the pretence of crying up hrist Jesus and the kingdom of Christ, either ave or seek to overturn all civil government
—ay, not at all, but I am one who do reve-ence and honor magistrates and acknowledge ubjection due unto them by their respective eople in all things just and lawful, knowing hat magistracy is an ordinance of God and hat magistrates are his ministers who bear ot the sword* in vain."

When Edward Pyott, William Salt and George ox were imprisoned in the jail at Lancaster, n 1656, on account of their religious profesion, the former addressed a remonstrance to ohn Glyn, Chief Justice of England, on behalf f himself and his companions, in which their eference to the authority of magistracy is early exhibited by their appealing to the law s "the one common guard or defence to roperty, liberty and life;" as being estabished for the protection of those rights, "so ood and so equal," and which, as to the out-ard, are of "the highest importance to the ell-being of man." He adds, "the law seeks ot for causes whereby to make the innocent uffer, but helpeth him to right who suffers rong, relieveth the oppressed and searcheth ut the matter, whether that of which a man tands accused be so or no; seeking judgment nd hastening righteousness."

Edward Burrough, a contemporary of Fox nd an eminent minister in our Society, when ddressing Richard Cromwell, "The Protector f the Commonwealth," expressly declares that,
s for the magistracy, it was ordained of God,
o be a dread and terror and limit to evil oers, and to be a defense and praise to all hat do well; to condemn the guilty and jus-fy the guiltless"—and in a book which he ublished in 1661 he says that, where any an's "heresy do extend further than only gainst God and his own soul, even to outward wrongs or evils or violence or visible mischiefs committed to the injury of others, then he forfeits not punishment to be inflicted upon the person and estate of such a man."

In a conversation between Charles II. and Richard Hubberthorn, the respect of Friends for civil government is plainly declared.
Question by the king: "How do you own magistrates or magistracy?" Answer: "Thus we do own magistrates—whosoever is set up of God, whether king as supreme, or any set in authority by him, who are for the punishment of evil doers and the praise of them that do well, such we shall submit unto and assist in righteous and civil things, both by body and estate; and if any magistrates do that which is unrighteous we must declare against it; only submit under it by a patient suffering, and not rebel against any by insurrections, plots and contrivances." To which the king replied, "That is enough."

Again, in an address to the king, entitled "The humble address of the people commonly called Quakers," the following language is used, "O, king, we do further declare that God Almighty hath taught and engaged us to acknowledge and actually to obey magistracy as his ordinance in all things not repugnant to his law and light in our consciences, which is certainly agreeable to the Holy Scriptures," etc.

On the restoration of peace they addressed an acknowledgment to William III. over England, &c., king, after this manner, "May it please the king, seeing the Most High God, who ruleth in the kingdoms of men and appointeth over them whomsoever he will, hath by his overruling power and Providence placed thee in dominion and dignity over these realms, and by his Divine favor hath signally preserved and delivered thee from many great and imminent dangers, and graciously turned the calamity of war into the desired mercy of peace."

On the accession to the throne of Queen Anne, the people called Quakers thought themselves no less obliged than others to express to the queen their condolence on account of the king's death, and to testify their affection and fidelity to her, and therefore drew up an address, in which they declare "their sorrow and sense of great loss sustained in the death of their late king, William III., whom God made the instrument of much good to these nations," and assure the queen of their loyalty to her government. "We sincerely declare that with the assistance of the grace of God, we will always, according to our Christian duty, demonstrate our good affection, truth and fidelity to the queen and her government, and heartily pray that his wisdom may direct and his blessings be upon the queen and her great councils to the suppressing of vice and immorality and the promoting of piety, peace and charity, to the glory of God and the benefit of these nations. May the King of kings make thy reign long and glorious, to which temporal blessings we shall pray for thy eternal happiness."

Were it necessary to our purpose, these extracts from the writings of Friends might be greatly extended, but we think that sufficient has been adduced to show that they did not view civil government as an evil, but as an ordinance of God; nor on account of its maladministration were they willing to throw off its salutary restraints. On the contrary, they availed themselves of legal assistance for the redress of wrongs. It is stated on unquestionable authority that, "during the height of the persecution which Friends suffered when the prisons were crowded and many illegally arrested, it was found necessary to make frequent application to persons in authority for the redress of grievances. Though Friends cheerfully endured the penalty of the laws rather than violate their consciences, yet they promptly availed themselves of the means of relief which the illegality of the proceedings against them offered. Many of these cases involved legal questions of intricacy and moment, requiring the advice of the most experienced and judicious Friends, and not unfrequently the judgment of able counsel was necessary to guard them from injury." The more effectually to attain this end, certain Friends in the city of London were appointed, who met weekly, "to whom the accounts of sufferings could be forwarded for examination and proper arrangement, and on whom the duty of applications to the different branches of the government might devolve, as well as that of advising country meetings in difficult and important cases."

If we trace the history of the Society, we shall find that, whenever a change in the ruling sovereign of England has taken place, Friends have ever been ready to acknowledge the authority of the government and to declare their fealty to the throne. And in our own country, when a change of government was effected by the war of the Revolution, we find Friends, on the restoration of peace, manifesting their allegiance to the government then established. Nor can we omit to refer to the example of William Penn, who, as Governor of Pennsylvania, in the administration of the laws and in his treaties and dealings with the natives, illustrated the truth, which we firmly believe, that civil government may be efficiently administered without the aid of military power—moral influence being, as we apprehend, that which mainly supports the fabric of civil order, its "great bulwarks resting on a firmer foundation than any outward visible means of defence."

It being then undeniable, from what we have cited and from abundant other testimony that might be given, that our forefathers in religious profession and their successors to the present day have respected and supported human governments as essential to the peace, the safety and the happiness of communities, we would earnestly exhort every individual bearing our name to be careful that the speculative views advanced by some at the present time do not lead him off from the substantial and practical ground which our Society has hitherto maintained in relation thereto.

May it be remembered by us as a warning, that, among the first evidences of defection manifested by George Keith, who early departed from the faith of the Society, was the imbibing of "notions subversive of all social order, which led him to conduct himself with great disrespect towards the civil authorities in the State, and rendered him dissatisfied also with those wholesome restraints which the Society, in its church discipline, enjoins upon its members."—Diary of Alexander Jaffray by John Barclay.

Believing that the minds of our early Friends were divinely illuminated to understand the teachings of Christ and his apostles—that they were led to discover the Truth and to walk in it—we cannot safely attempt to find for ourselves any other way. The Truth is immutable, it changeth not, it is the same yesterday, to-day and forever, and hazardous, we are persuaded, will it be for him who, confiding in some supposed greater illumination which he has received, ventures to call in question the plain practical doctrines of Holy Scripture and the practices of those who acted in conformity to them. Rather let us, in humility and meekness and with that help which may be graciously afforded us, seek to imitate the virtues and walk in the footsteps of those who, having fought the good fight and kept the faith, have finished their course, and, through adorable mercy, have been permitted to enter into everlasting rest.

*The term sword, is used by Friends figuratively, as problematical of the power vested in the civil magistrate.

Signed on behalf and by direction of a meeting of the representatives aforesaid, held at Providence, Rhode Island, the third of Third Month, 1840. THOMAS HOWLAND, Clerk.

Carrying Liquor to the Philippines.

Theodore L. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, New York, speaking before the Ecumenical Conference, said:

"This conference has worked on many of the problems of the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, but there is another problem, very important, on which I have been asked to address you to-night, and, although it is not allowed to present resolutions to this conference, if I were to do so I would phrase one something like this, 'Whereas, one of the most serious obstacles to the spread of the Gospel among many native races is the importation of alcoholic liquors by Christian nations; Resolved, That our Christianity needs a little more Christianizing at the core.' And I am sure that our beloved and honored Christian statesman, ex-President Harrison, would second this resolution.

"For how many years have ships from Christian ports carried missionaries in the cabin and rum and firearms and opium in the hold! Even Britain and America have held out to the heathen races the Bible in one hand and the bottle in the other, and the bottle has sent ten to perdition where the Bible has brought one to Jesus Christ. Four years ago the Christian chief of Bechuanaland went to London on an extraordinary mission. He went there to tell that he had made a prohibitive law for his tempted subjects, who are negroes, and he said that the principal difficulty he had with it was the smuggling in of liquor by British subjects, and he implored her majesty to second his efforts to make prohibition successful. Think of it! A converted African savage on his knees before a Christian queen imploring her people not to poison his own nation!

"We have something nearer home than that. Of all the honored heads of mission work who have been here upon this platform, none has been looked upon with more reverence than John G. Paton, of the New Hebrides. No one since Livingstone went from his knees to God's throne in Africa has been more reverenced than he. My old friend Paton came here a few years ago. What for? To implore the American Government—yours and mine—to prohibit the importation of whisky and firearms among the new Christians of the New Hebrides. The cross had saved them from cannibalism, but the question was, Could they be saved from the importations of Christian America?

"I am coming home closer than that. All political subjects are, properly, quarantined in this conference, and you may be certain that I am not going to handle the hot-potato Philippine problem in any of its political aspects. But whatever the future rulers of our country shall be to those multitudes of human beings, we are, now, before God and before man, responsible for their condition as much as any mother in that gallery is for the child that she kissed good-night in the crib.

"If there is anything a true American adores next to his Bible, it is the blessed old Stars and Stripes. But, mark ye! It is a most terrible truth that that flag, 'Old Glory,' as it is called here, floats to-night over about four hundred American drinking dens—slaughterhouses of body and soul—in the town of Manila. (Cries of 'Shame!') Yes, shame, shame!" repeated Dr. Cuyler, as he continued. "Then, for heaven's sake, hang it at half-mast.

"What is to be done? Abraham Lincoln once, by a single stroke of his pen, swept away the darkest blot on our national escutcheon. That same pen can be found to-day in the President's mansion, and our honored President, with the same dashing stroke, should extinguish this terrible stigma on our character and our Christianity. If he does we will give him a shout that will make the ovation he received on this platform appear but the murmur of a zephyr. Let this great conference send a protest to all Christian peoples, imploring them to prohibit the importation of alcoholic intoxicants among these temptable native races of the earth.

"Eight years ago, sixteen nations, our own among them, I am happy to say, enacted a treaty forbidding the introduction of alcoholic drinks in the Congo country of Africa. All right. That established a principle. Now, what we want to do is to make an enlargement of it. This conference should ask, should implore, the Christian nations of the earth, in the name of a common humanity, out of pity for the weak races God has bidden us to treat as our brethren, for the principles of Christianity and glory of God, to pass such legislation as shall sweep out of existence this terrible curse of humanity, this destruction of God's children."

For "THE FRIEND."

"And all of the trees of the field shall know that I, the Lord, have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree, have dried up the green tree and have made the dry tree to flourish: I, the Lord, have spoken and have done it" (Ezekiel xvii: 24).

Whilst at Plymouth, England (in the year 1844), Sarah Emlen says in her diary, "I was at a meeting where a woman Friend appeared in supplication with her bonnet on. Oh, how painful this is! At the close of the meeting I said to her that I thought, if she would remove her bonnet on such solemn occasions, she would have her reward. She came afterward to where we took tea, and we had some further conversation on the subject. I told her it was a practice that had obtained of late years, and I believed it was a branch of the 'green tree' that was to be dried up, for that the 'dry tree' must ever flourish."

It is marvelous to me to see, and to be made sensible of a Spirit that is very active in trying to persuade us that this small thing is not necessary and the other small thing is not necessary to show forth the principles of our profession—that faith is the one thing that is necessary and essential, and so it would fritter away all practical obedience to the Word of Life sown in the heart, and centre us in safety if we can only say that "We do believe in the Lord Jesus, who bought us;" "that now we need take no further trouble about ourselves, for we are safe." Oh, what dark doctrine, for, however precious a belief in our dear Lord is and that faith in Him, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world, yet I feel myself no longer safe than while I am on my watch-tower; that when I am not watching unto prayer I am liable to fall into temptation and lose the savor of life. It would seem very easy way of climbing up into the kingdo of God, but Christ hath said, "I am the w the Truth and the Life;" "If any man will my disciple let him first deny himself, take his cross daily and follow me;" and again, is not every one that saith unto me, 'Lo Lord!' that shall enter into the kingdom heaven, but he that doeth the will of Father which is in heaven."

War and Peace Notes.

The British Friends sent to Lord Salisbury Lord Lansdown the following protest agai the bill introduced into Parliament to ame the long disused Militia Ballot Act:

This representative meeting of the Society Friends views with grave concern the introduct into Parliament of a bill to amend the long disu Militia Ballot Act. It cannot but regard suc measure, taken in conjunction with stateme made by members of the government, as prel inary to the enforcement of compulsory milit service in this country. The Society of Frie has ever held that war is contrary to the sp and teaching of Christ; and, believing that his c mands are those that claim allegiance above others, they desire to record their protest aga any extension of that militarism which is the creasingly recognized cause of so much evil. T hold that any attempt to enforce compulsory n tary service is an infringement of the liberty conscience which we have so long enjoyed, which is one of the greatest privileges of citi ship in this country. They therefore earne desire that no portion of these advantages sh be withdrawn, and, farther, that the Militia Ba Act should be repealed and not amended.

So long as men are unenlightened as to real nature of war, and love it more than t do peace, so long as the soldier is the hero, we shall have war, arbitration cour the contrary notwithstanding. Recent eve in many parts of the world show that the l of war and of its pomp and circumstance is dead or even asleep. There is an evident crudescence of the love of fighting, of the bition for martial glory; a powerful impuls test the tremendous destructiveness of the implements of death. Society is still at mercy of waves of war excitement, bel which none of the barriers of civilization h The loathsome immoralities of army life, d onstrated anew in recent campaigns, move public conscience, or even the Christian science, very little. The most senseless irrational military adventures find defender the most unexpected quarters. Not a Christian pulpits are still scornful toward principles of peace; others are weak and du War education still goes on in state, in chu in family.

In view of all this, our peace movement reached the critical stage, when the most rious, intelligent and heroic work must done. "I know that there are in Philadelphia good Christians that do not belong to the American Friend Board. My paper had no connection with the American Friend Board. It is a private concern, founded by me alone. In consequence I pray you tell the Philadelphia Friends that may desire to aid me in the work of printing."

We may rejoice in the extent to which F. G. Cala has been instrumental in opening the eyes and hearts of Cubans to evangelical and Protestant Christianity, a number of priests also being concerned to be obedient to the faith of the gospel, as opened to them through the periodical and tracts of this devoted laborer.

Whether our conception of the principles of the Society of Friends is becoming realized or not in the modes of this movement, so new to such a people, we can consistently bid god-speed to a sincerely evangelical opening among them under whatever name.

Notes from Others.

It is stated that Charles M. Sheldon received $5,000 for his share of the profits of the Christian newspaper venture for one week, at Topeka. He immediately gave $1,000 of it to aid the suffering in India, and the rest to various charities.

The ark of the covenant rests no longer upon the shoulders of men. God's spirit is the custodian of his revelation. The words that Jesus said were recalled to the memory of his apostles by the Spirit himself. He has become the Guardian of all inspiration. The words of Christ cannot pass away. They are more enduring than the earth or the stars. Herald of Truth.

Count Leo Tolstoy has been excommunicated from the Orthodox Russian church. This action was sought for long since, but the synod "feared the wrath of the Russian masses, with whom Tolstoy is very popular. Immediate provocation for his excommunication was found in his latest novel, entitled "Resurrection," in which he openly attacked the Russian Church.

A Christian man, after travelling three years through the Middle and Eastern States, writes to the Christian Intelligencer of New York: "I have not heard a dozen allusions to the sacrifice made on the cross, and not one sermon given to an exhibition of the atoning grace of God in Christ. I have listened to so-called preparative lectures, and sat at communion tables where not the remotest hint was uttered that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. I have heard beautiful and eloquent discourses, ranging through almost every field of Christian literature save one, and that the one which exhibits the religion of Jesus as a gospel to sinful men." Here is the secret of empty churches, forsaken prayer-meetings, worldly church-members, and moral indifference and moral laziness on the part of the world. Nothing but Christ and Him crucified, preached "with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven" is the wisdom and the power of God unto salvation. If men will not use this instrument, they are on a natural plane and can only expect natural results. To preach Christ in his fulness as the crucified and risen Saviour puts us into connection with supernatural power, securing supernatural results.—Watchword and Truth.

DECLARATION OF THE MOHONK LAKE ARBITRATION CONFERENCE (Adopted Sixth Mo. 8th, 1900).—The year has been a checkered one in the history of peace. The war with Spain was concluded with the Treaty of Paris, but even yet the fighting drags on in the Philippines. A still more bloody and bitter war has been carried on in South Africa. These conflicts sadden the hearts of all who love the principles which this conference advocates. Yet friends of peace need not be discouraged. These wars have given to the world a sad lesson of the folly and of the danger to States of submitting to the arbitrament of force such differences as might be settled by the arbitrament of reason.

On the other hand, the friends of peace have occasion to exult in the accomplishment of a work unparalled in human history, by which nearly all the nations of the world have become associated in a declared purpose to avoid war. By the labors of the distinguished members of the Peace Conference at the Hague, in which the representatives of this country had so honorable a part, there has been provided an august permanent tribunal, before which every nation can bring its differences with other powers, assured of an impartial decision. This conference rejoices to know that twenty-six nations have ratified the treaty constituting this international court, the United States being the first power to act. It also rejoices to be informed that the permanent organization of this great tribunal will be soon accomplished, so that it will be ready to do the work assigned to it. This union of the nations of the earth is an event of the first historic importance, fitly rounding out a great century, and giving promise of immeasurable good for the centuries to come.

This wonderful event, achieved during the past year, imperatively settles the next step which the friends of peace should take, namely, to induce this Government to enter into separate treaties with all other powers, under which all such difficulties with them as cannot be settled by the usual diplomatic negotiations shall be referred to the international tribunal at the Hague. The reference of disputes to that tribunal is, under the provision of the treaty, now only permissive. This was as much as that conference could well devise and recommend. What is now permissive should, as far as this country is concerned, be made obligatory. This can be accomplished by new and brief treaties with the other powers, under the terms of which all disputes which may arise, of whatever nature, not settled by ordinary diplomatic methods, shall be referred for final decision to this permanent court of the nations. To this end this conference hereby petitions the President of the United States that he enter into negotiations with other powers for such treaties; and it further appeals to the people of the United States that they create such a public opinion that such treaties shall be promptly ratified by the Senate of the United States.

To the end that such a public opinion in favor of peace and arbitration may be attained, this conference recommends that public meetings be held for this purpose in the larger and smaller centers of population; and it especially urges that the blessings of peace, rather than the glories of war, be emphasized in our common and higher schools; and it particularly requests that teachers of religion shall in their ministrations, and especially at the Christmas season, urge upon their people the obligation to use all influence in their power to bring to the earth the rule of that spirit of peace and charity which sees in every race or nation brothers for whose welfare this nation has a duty as well as for its own.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A cablegram from Admiral Kempff, received by Secretary Long, gave definite news of an ambuscade by Chinese near Tien-Tsin on the 21st, and the killing of four and wounding of seven of the American troops. The President, upon receiving the information, took steps promptly to expedite the work of strengthening the American forces in the Orient.

The Chinese Minister, at Washington, has asked an armistice in the sending of American troops to China, based on the assurances of Chinese Viceroys that they can maintain order. President McKinley, while acknowledging his gratification at these assurances, has made it known to the minister that the United States cannot relax its efforts to get troops to points where its officials are considered in danger. Cable advices from China received in London this morning say that Pekin is guarded by an army of Chinese 360,000 strong, armed with modern weapons, but three-fourths of the men badly drilled.

A despatch of the 25th from Atlanta, Ga., says: Reports received here from many points in Georgia and portions of Alabama and South Carolina show that the recent heavy rains have inundated a vast territory, and caused enormous damage to bridges and farming property. Crops, including cotton, corn and especially fruit which was nearing maturity when the wet season began, have been greatly injured, and caused a loss of a vast amount to the farmers of the Southern States. The rainfall has been unprecedented. The lowlands have been devastated, and only the higher farming lands are untouched. Indications are for a cessation of the rain, which will cause the streams to fall rapidly.

A despatch from Seattle, Wash., says: Captain Heckman, of the steamship Queen, just in from Alaska, says that the earthquake in Alaska in the Tenth Month completely destroyed the sea end of the Muir Glacier. The Queen sailed through fragments and icebergs for five miles, but failed to see anything of the old formation.

A Boston despatch says: At Blue Hill a kite used in the exploration of the air was sent to the height of 14,000 feet, which exceeds the greatest height previously attained there by 1440 feet. The temperature of that height was 15 degrees below the freezing point, the wind velocity was about twenty-five miles an hour from the northeast, and the air was extremely dry, although clouds floated above and below that level. The total weight lifted into the air including wire, instruments and kites, was about 130 pounds.

In a postal guide for the Philadelphia Post Office, lately issued, the Postmaster, Thomas L. Hicks, speaks thus of those faithful men whom the public never see, the clerks who so faithfully handle the hundreds of thousands of missives passing through the office daily. He says: "I venture the assertion that in no branch of business, whether it be private or public, are better results obtained on the whole than are accomplished by the men who are seldom heard from, rarely seen in the performance of their duty, and whose work receives comparatively little consideration or appreciation from the public."

Cars are now being run in St. Louis in the day-time, and on some of the lines at night. Several business firms have been boycotted. This action is declared to be unmerited and unjust.

A despatch from Manila of the 21st says: Two hundred Filipinos met this morning in Manila to determine honorable and decorous methods for securing peace. The results were submitted this evening to General MacArthur, who accepted them. The leaders of the meeting will use their influence to induce Aguinaldo to accept the arrangement. If they are successful, as they hope to be, they believe Aguinaldo will issue orders in conjunction with the American authorities for the cessation of hostilities.

William McKinley, of Ohio, and Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, were respectively nominated on the 21st by the National Republican Convention for President and Vice President of the United States. Delegates from Hawaii were among those present. Among other declarations the party is pledged to the preservation of a currency system based on the existing gold standard, and to a policy of justice and wisdom in the administration of the new territorial possessions won from Spain.

The authorities of Hamburg, Pa., are enforcing an old law, which imposes a fine of sixty-seven cents for every profane word uttered. In default the offenders are sent to jail.

A mining industry has quietly grown up at Joplin, Mo., which fairly overshadows in production of zinc and lead ores that of any other section of the globe.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has held that a bill of sale of an original stamped package of oleomargarine, containing a description of the package and the name of the purchaser, and executed at the factory by the manufacturers and sent from there to the purchaser, completes the sale and constructive delivery of the oleomargarine at the factory, and the subsequent actual delivery of the package elsewhere to the purchaser does not necessitate the payment of special tax at the latter place.

Governor Stephens, of Missouri, has issued a proclamation shutting out the cattle from a number of States, in which he says tuberculosis exists. Among the States are Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and the Dominion of Canada.

It is stated that smallpox was practically stamped out in this country before the Spanish war. Now, principally because of official carelessness, there have been 7267 cases, with 402 deaths from the disease in the United States during the past three months and a half.

The population of Porto Rico as shown by the census taken in the Tenth Month last was 953,243. There are in the island fifty-seven towns having a population of 1000 or more, the total urban population numbering 203,793, or 21.4 per cent. of the whole.

A large party of representative business men, including officials of the Pennsylvania and Reading Railroads systems and steamship companies, architects, representatives of chemical plants, contractors and builders from Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Wilmington and elsewhere, gathered at the yards of the New York Ship Building plant, in South Camden, on the 19th, to witness a practical test of the merits of wood fire-proofed by the Ferrell process. Among other useful tests a large quantity of oil-soaked shavings and wood were piled around a fire-proofed box, made of ash, and burned furiously for twenty-three minutes, when the box was pulled out, somewhat charred and blackened, and was then opened and the contents, consisting of 200 pamphlets, entirely uninjured, were distributed to the guests.

A despatch from Washington of the 21st says: "The War Department has made public the following notice of amnesty, which was issued by General MacArthur to-day at Manila: "By direction of the President of the United States, the undersigned announces amnesty with complete immunity for the past and absolute liberty of action for the future to all persons who are now or at any time since February 4, 1899, have been in insurrection against the United States in either a military or a civil capacity, and who shall within a period of ninety days from the date hereof formally renounce all connection with such insurrection, and subscribe to a declaration acknowledging and accepting the sovereignty and authority of the United States in and over the Philippine Islands. The privilege herewith published is extended to all concerned without any reservation whatever, excepting that persons who have violated the laws of war during the period of active hostilities are not embraced within the scope of this amnesty." Action is made in this proclamation for the surrender of arms, etc., and it is signed by Arthur MacArthur, Major General and Military Governor.

There were 380 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 75 less than the previous week and 1 less than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 201 were males and 179 females: 42 died of consumption; 33 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 13 of apoplexy; 12 of cancer. There were 85 new cases of diphtheria, with 20 deaths, and 40 typhoid fever cases, with 5 deaths.

FOREIGN.—The latest cables from China received in London picture the condition of affairs in the Empire as one of increased gravity. Among the reports are that the foreign settlement at Tien-Tsin has been destroyed, 300 troops of the international forces slain and a British commander killed; and there are rumors of massacres and incendiarism in the Chinese capital. The Chinese forces are developing unexpected strength, and their men are armed with modern weapons.

A cablegram from London says: "United States Ambassador Choate in a conference with Lord Salisbury is understood to have found that the governments of the United States and of Great Britain are generally in agreement as to their views regarding the Chinese situation, and the two Governments will probably be found following the same broad lines of policy in the far East."

A special despatch from Vienna says: "Li Hung Chang has wired the various Chinese legations in Europe, directing them to inform the governments to which they are accredited that he is called to Pekin by the Empress to act as an intermediary between China and the Powers to negotiate a settlement of the points at issue, and he instructs them to beg the powers to facilitate his mission by ceasing to send troops to China."

At the present time the Boxers are said to be composed of rowdies, farmers and boys. They are only armed with swords, spears and bows and arrows. They have robbed heathen and Christian alike, but they are very bitter against the Christians, to whom it is generally bel that much persecution is sure to come.

London cables tell of the arrival at Pekin of the national relief column, under Admiral Seymour, aft arduous march and hard fighting, during which abou Chinese were killed. The safety of the foreign legs is believed to be assured.

No state of war is yet recognized by the Ame Government as existing between the United State China, and it is stated at Washington that should s come for making war, Congress must be called to to act as the war-making power.

The German Foreign Office announces that the P are agreed as to three points only—the relief of Tsin and Pekin, adequate satisfaction for the seve juries European interests have sustained and the e lishment of guarantees against the repetition of suc rages. Beyond this the attitude of the powers will h depend upon what has really happened in Pekin, wh still unknown in Europe.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Sixth Month 28th, 1900.

Sojourning for the summer so near the scene of former studies and of the annual reunion of fellow-students, one feels sometimes more than a permission to run up hither of a morning and witness that "feast of reason and flow of soul," and renew those reminders of youthful aspirations, which he has before known on a Harvard Commencement day.

Arriving in old Cambridge in time to see the long procession moving through the college yard, it was pleasant, when the portion containing graduates of the year 1862 came in sight, to hear one's name called out and himself invited to join them. The revived companionship was pleasant enough to feel sweet, the small enough to feel lonesome, by contrast with that of thirty-eight years ago. For then we were walking as a class ninety-five in number, and now there were but three of us. Yet we learned that some sixty of those ninety-five were still on earth, though it was the class which lost the most heavily in the Civil War. Before we soon came to where the nine hundred and eighty gowned candidates for graduation had, having divided into two lines, to be as a lane on either side of us, and the rest of the procession was passing through, with all hats, save a drab one, lifted.

Within the hall all appeared as in our last visit two years ago—the predominance of summer dresses throughout the sides and galleries, the call to order by a military man pounding the floor with his sword, the offering of prayer in solemn tones by the university preacher—of which these words are remembered, "Sanctifying themselves for others' sake, may they find their own power and peace and joy;" then the calling for "A Latin Oration—By Bauer." Though a salutatory of the regulation type, it bore a freshness of its own. It was new to hear at the very start the old Roman priests' command for the opening of a sacrifice, "Observe favor all ye with your tongues" (that is, keep them silent), a confession from some gleam of the Truth that silence must be the condition of the higher ministration in worship. When the different authorities had been addressed, from the president and the State Governor down to professors and tutors, the orator turned towards Lord Pauncefote, the British ambassador to this country, welcoming him as Queen Victoria's distinguished legate, "whom, when we salute, we salute that noble queen whose affairs among us thou so happily dischargest. May the years be many wherein she shall rule a people joined with us in the bonds, both tender and firm, of love." The usual portion for the assembled maidens contained the charge that they had come "not only for the sake of hearing the dissertations, but in order to see and be seen. Then he addressed himself to his main topic, as follows:

"But there are others whom, though not present, I would wish this day to salute, for, as is well known, two thousand teachers transported from the island of Cuba, are, within a few days to be gathered upon these premises. For what reason? Because since, by the fortune of war, it has come to pass that our people must instruct and train the Cubans until they are in a condition to institute for themselves liberty, laws and education, now all Americans ought to strive, according to our several ability, as soon as that people can be supplied with equal laws and good offices of government, to restore to them the liberty which we have taken from them for the sole purpose of handing it back to them enlarged and improved. For no other cause has this university invited those teachers hither than that they may be qualified the better to prepare their countrymen for the right use of liberty.

"It is especially befitting that this concern should be undertaken by this university. For where is there a home of more numerous illustrious men? Where better may one learn the virtue and glory of antiquity? How many reminders of a former age do we everywhere behold? What is this building? Nay, what is this university itself, but a temple dedicated to the higher culture, the virtue and the piety of men of worth? And no one, on seeing these things, can fail to be affected with a zeal for emulating them. May the memory and the emulation of them long live among the Cubans, and that people acquire not less enlightenment of civilization than this has already gained. Finally, may this university be to them not only a fostering mother, but also, as for us, a light of all citizens. Her work is to train, not only learned, but good citizens. In former years she has often sent sons to war, but now she has proved that she stands ready to discharge her whole duty to our country not less in time of peace than in war. But in this she does nothing new nor wonderful, for it is but a continuation of her zeal to study the highest good of this people. Which high concern, O Alma Mater, I pray give to us, thy sons, every one."

We render this to our readers as a fair sample of the Harvard spirit and savor pervading the alumni speeches of yesterday and to-day and every year, and to note the expectancy with which Cambridge is preparing to entertain the teachers from Cuba. The men are to lodge in the college dormitories, the women in private houses opened to them among the citizens, where we already see cards printed in Spanish to be posted in rooms, to the effect that gas flames must be turned off and not blown out, etc. Publications in Spanish are in evidence at the book stores. Many who can use the Spanish language in help or instruction (and there is a scarcity of them) are summoned hither. A classmate at my side said he was going to take all these Cubans on an excursion of one hundred and twenty miles to his home on the Connecticut River. Seventy thousand dollars is asked for in contributions from all over the country to carry out this enterprise. It was about half that amount, or five dollars for each immigrant, that was collected by Philadelphia Friends to tide the Doukhobors over their ten months of destitution—fifty cents a month to keep each soul in its body! Yet but for that many would probably have died. How many are each one of us letting die in India? But a commencement is not the only meeting where thoughts will wander. We turn our attention to "The Pilgrim as He Was," as held up to view by the next speaker.

Speaking of the evidence of things not seen in which the Pilgrims were sustained, when the winter struck down half their number and they watched the sails of the departing Mayflower, he quoted the words: "No ideal achievement has ever been attained for which its author was not made to suffer." The religion of the Pilgrim Fathers is best summoned up in the parting injunction to them from John Robinson, bidding them, "if God should reveal anything to them by any other instrument of his, to be ready to receive it as ever they were ready to receive any truth by his ministry, for he was very confident that the Lord had more truth and light yet to break forth out of his holy word." This reminds us of a recorded prophecy of our Friend Hannah Gibbons; and also that the truth and light which soon was offered to break out among Pilgrims and Puritans was suppressed by the latter, and some of its missionaries hanged. Yet truth and light in various ways has continued to reassert itself in these parts, and its advance apparent in many expressions valiant for the Truth, especially on this day, has been cheering. "The Pilgrim," said the speaker, "ought not to be conceived of as a grim, uncompromising Puritan. His life was hard and earnest. He was persecuted, was obliged to toil ceaselessly, and had to undergo the hardships of hunger, disease and war. Throughout all, he prayed and searched for 'more truth and light,' and at last, I am persuaded, received an answer to his petition. In a trackless wilderness, separated by the width of an ocean from temple and altar, he heard a voice speaking to him in his own heart. The message may have been the same that came to the prophet of old: 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with you: And this shall be the covenant that I will make with you: I will put my law in your inward parts, and write it in your hearts, and will be your God, and you shall be my people.'"

The declaration of this principle was received with genuine relish, as men looked their satisfaction at each other, and nodded it with their heads, reinforced by voices and hands. Then "Commencement Past and Present" was pictured by Murray Seasongood, who said: "What made those first commencements possible, despite poverty and danger, is evident from a note like this: 'Just as morn exercise ended, Mr. Cotton Mather's child dies, yet he preaches at Charlestown in the afternoon.' Such purpose and power to endure, engendered freedom of thought, and the strength to speak one's belief. . . . Large-mindedness showed itself even in religious disputation. Harvard was founded as a school of Divinity, yet at its first Commencement not one of the fifty-seven questions discussed had to do with matters of faith. Later, . . . we smile at serious argument purporting to show that 'Samson did not commit suicide in the temple of the Philistines,' or that, 'When Baalam's ass spoke there was no change in its organs'—but in such an age, from the midst of a narrow Puritanism, what a doctrine is this: 'That the toleration of every religion promotes true religion.' . . . A minister from Boston, shocked, another time, . . . turned his back, left the house, and penned to the President a long protest 'against young men sharpening their Wits on their Maker.' President Holyoke replied 'he was pleased to see one so jealous for the Divine Honor, but could not believe young men less religious than they had been in his correspondent's day.' . . . In the exercises English began at length to crowd on Greek, Latin, and the Bible. Holmes read an English poem. In the 'thirties a candidate for the Master's degree spoke on Transcendentalism, which John Pierce 'supposed captivating to a few irregular geniuses, but which to him was like the tale of an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.'"

In an oration on Hawthorne occurred the words, "Relief from the sordid, the petty, the mean, the commonplace—in fiction as in life—cannot be permanently attained by running away from the actual and the present, but by beautifying them,"—we would say "with salvation;" he in choosing other terms might at heart mean the same. He spoke of finding "in the life around us the romantic and the beautiful divinely imminent there. They are not easy to discover,"—except, let us add, in the life within us the true and the beautiful are found divinely imminent there.

Then came a very entertaining account of "James Howell,—a Journalist before the Time of Journalism," for whose vicissitudes in a brilliant and tribulated life we have not space to spare.

The liveliest curiosity of the day usually centres in President Eliot's giving out of the unexpected,—the degrees that are out of ordinary course. When the nine hundred and eighty-nine degrees for all the departments had been conferred among those whose names he pronounced and who rose in their turn were:

As honorary Master of Arts:—"Hugh Henry Hanna, the mainspring of the business men's movement to declare gold the standard of the national currency—a well-tempered spring, intent, assiduous and effective.

The spontaneous ovation here accorded second only to that given to the beloved d Then the alumni repaired to their dinner. S tor George P. Hoar presided. When the titude again arose at the call for a pra thoughts would arise that where one cann rising subscribe to the principle of pra made to order, does not his seated attitude tify to others of a seeming irrevere Doubts as to the heartfelt testimony of ot in standing were, however, quickly dispell an impatient whispering about keeping t standing in hot weather,—some minis "lack of terminal facilities," or words of import. And when the audience sat d though the language for prayer had see especially solemn, there was an instantan bursting into conversation by way of re "The religious part ought to be kept sho such times as this!" etc. It ought to be on as long as the meal lasts, was an thought. "Whether ye eat or drink or w ever ye do, do all to the glory of God." then, they meant the ceremonial part,—w indeed we could shorten,to nothing, exce wait for the Master's own putting fort words. It is this praying-to-order that public prayer of so much of its life an spect. A little of this feeling seemed h at by Senator Hoar in his opening speec attempting to translate Virgil's conten Elysium: "'Here are soldiers wounde their country, and the reverend clergy preached as long as flesh and blood could it. And here are authors of religious po and those who made life better by their i tions.' In short, everybody worth any comes up here in due time to get an hon degree."

For "The Friend."

A Railway Incident.

[On looking over a bundle of my FRIEND papers, I discovered one bearing date of Twelfth Month 14th, 1878. The circumstances were witnessed by J. M. Dash, a minister of the United Brethren Church, a sincere Christian, with whom I was intimately acquainted. I request that it may be republished.—F. D. SMITH.]

In traveling we often meet with persons of different nationalities and languages. We also meet with incidents of various characters, some sorrowful, others joyful and instructive. One of the latter character I witnessed recently, while traveling upon the cars. The train was going West, and the time was evening. At a station a little girl about eight years old came aboard, carrying a little budget under her arm. She came into the car and deliberately took a seat. She then commenced an eager scrutiny of faces, but all were strange to her. She appeared weary, and placing the budget for a pillow, she prepared to try to secure a little sleep. Soon the conductor came along, collecting tickets and fare. Observing him, she asked if she might lie there. The gentlemanly conductor replied that she might, and then kindly asked for her ticket. She informed him that she had none, when the following conversation ensued:

Said the conductor, "Where are you going?"

She answered, "I am going to heaven."

He asked again, "Who pays your bill?"

She then said, "Mister, does this railroad lead to heaven, and does Jesus travel on it?"

He answered, "I think not. Why did you think so?"

"Why, sir, before my ma died she used to sing to me of a heavenly railroad, and you looked so nice and kind I thought this was the road. My ma used to sing of Jesus on the heavenly railroad, and that He paid the fare for everybody, and that the train stopped at every station to take people on board, but my ma don't sing now, and I thought I'd take the cars and go to ma. Mister, do you sing to your little girl about the railroad that goes to heaven? You have a little girl, haven't you?"

He replied, weeping, "No, my little dear. I have no little girl now. I had one once, but she died some time ago, and went to heaven."

Again she asked, "Did she go over this railroad, and are you going to see her now?"

By this time all persons in the coach were upon their feet, and most of them were weeping. An attempt to describe what I witnessed is almost futile. Some said, "God bless the little girl."

Hearing some person say that she was an angel, the little girl earnestly replied:

"Yes, my ma used to say I would be an angel some time."

Addressing herself once more to the conductor, she asked him:

"Do you love Jesus? I do; and if you love Him He will let you ride to heaven on his railroad. I am going there, and I wish you would go with me. I know Jesus will let me into heaven when I get there, and He will let you in, too, and everybody that will ride on his railroad. Yes, all these people. Wouldn't you like to see heaven and Jesus and your little girl?"

These words, innocently and pathetically uttered, brought a great gush of tears from all eyes, but most profusely from the eyes of the conductor. Some who were traveling on the heavenly railroad shouted aloud for joy.

She now asked the conductor, "Mister, may I lie here till we get to heaven?"

He answered, "Yes, dear, yes."

She then asked, "Will you wake me up then, so that I may see my ma, your little girl and Jesus? For I do so much want to see them all!"

The answer came in broken accents, but in words very tenderly spoken:

"Yes, dear angel eyes. God bless you!"

"Amen!" was sobbed by more than a score of voices.

Turning her eyes again upon the conductor, she interrogated him:

"What shall I tell your little girl when I see her? Shall I say to her that I saw her pa on Jesus' railroad? Shall I?"

This brought a fresh flood of tears from all present, and the conductor knelt by her side, and embracing her, wept the reply he could not utter. At this juncture the brakeman called out: "H——s!" The conductor arose and requested him to attend to his (the conductor's) duty at the station, for he was engaged.

That was a precious place. I thank God that I was a witness to this scene, but I was sorry that at this point I was obliged to leave the train.

A few months after the above occurrence the writer of the narrative received a letter from the conductor, acknowledging that the circumstance had been a blessing to him spiritually, and giving some additional information respecting the little girl. The letter says:

"I had proposed adopting her in the place of my little daughter, who is now in heaven. With this intention I took her to C—— B——, and on my return I took her to S——n, where she left the cars. In consultation with my wife in regard to adopting her, she replied:

"Yes, certainly, and immediately, too, for there is a Divine providence in this. Oh," said she, "I never could refuse to take under my charge the instrument of my husband's salvation."

I made inquiry for the child at S——n, and learned that in three days after her return she died suddenly, without any apparent disease, and her happy soul had gone to dwell with her ma, my little girl and the angels in heaven.

HE who would return hatred for injury lives a miserable life indeed, but one who sets himself to lay siege to hatred with love you cannot deny to be a safe and happy warrior. With equal ease he faces a single foe or a host, and asks no aid from fortune. Yes, and those whom he conquers yield to him with joy, not with beaten but augmented strength.—Spinoza.

POSSIBLY we shall all revise our opinions somewhat on our arrival in another world. At all events we should all have breadth and grace enough in this world to recognize and appreciate greatness, goodness and usefulness wherever we find it, even in those who differ from us most widely in matters of opinion or belief.

John Yeardley and His Travels.

"We must pass over many incidents of travel through Southern Russia, and glance a moment at John Yeardley's experiences in the Crimea. Here he and his companion found themselves in the heart of the Tartar country, beyond the verge of civilized life.

"'The Tartar villages, says John Yeardley, are the meanest possible, consisting sometimes of mere holes dug in the earth, or huts standing a little above the ground. The men wear wide drawers with the pink shirt over them; the women have a chemise reaching to the calf of the leg, dirty and coarse, an apron round the waist, sometimes so scanty or so ragged that it will not meet, and a handkerchief tied in a slovenly manner on the head. In these three articles of dress they drive the horses and oxen; the sun burns them to a dark brown, almost black. The children we saw were quite naked. Various attempts have been made to civilize and instruct them, but without success. One missionary pursued the work so far as to feed and clothe the children, and collect them for instruction, which they received for a while, but all at once and with one consent it was at an end. When I see the Tartar galloping over the steppe as if riding on the wind, it constantly makes me think of the wild Arabs. When we are anxious to find a well of water where we may take our meal, and when we see travellers assembled to water their cattle and flocks, and the camels running loose on the steppes—which they do till autumn, when they are sought up for work,—all reminds us of the customs of the East.'

"This evening they halted at a Tartar village, where the occupant of the traktir, or house of entertainment, persuaded the driver to take out his horses for the night. The conduct of this man and his companions was suspicious; they eagerly examined the mattresses of the travellers, which were of a superior quality; and when William Rasche came to make the tea, which he did by the moonlight outside the hut, the boiling water which he poured in to rinse the teapot came out into the tumblers a white liquid; and after the tea was put in the innkeeper held up the pot against the moon, and looked curiously into it. Instead of retiring early, as the Tartars always do, the men in the hut kept a watch upon the travellers; and the suspicions even of the driver were awakened, when one of them came to him, as he was lying by his horses, to borrow his knife. His horses, however, were so weary, and he himself so unwilling to move, that the travellers contented themselves with harnessing the horses and making ready to depart in case of necessity. Soon after midnight, finding they were still watched by the Tartars, and apprehending that these waited only till they should all be asleep, to carry off their horses or to rob their persons, they decided to make the best of their way out of their hands. The driver being slow to move, W. R. jumped into his place, seized the reins, and drove quickly off, thankful to have effected a safe escape. It is very common for the Tartars to prowl about in the night, and steal the horses and wagons of their more settled and thrifty neighbors.

"After about three hours' driving, the moon shining so bright that they could see to read by it, they arrived at another village of a less suspicious character."

"'Eighth Month, 26th.—This morning I felt more sweet union with my God in spirit than for a long time; and a strong desire has arisen to live in closer communion with Jesus, the beloved of my soul, the only access to the Father—the only place of rest, safety, and true peace. I long more than ever not to be troubled with cross occurrences over which I have no control, and which have too long perplexed me and disturbed my inward peace. I long more than ever to spend my few remaining days on earth as with my God in heaven, to refer everything to him, and to pray more earnestly and diligently for his grace to preserve me near to himself under all circumstances, until He shall have prepared me to be taken to heaven, to join the happy company there in a blissful eternity. 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee'" (Isa. xxxi: 3).

"On the 1st of the Ninth Month they sailed to Odessa, where they had to remain eight days. In this city they received a visit from a pastor, who conversed with them on the work of the heavenly kingdom then going on in the East, especially in Constantinople and Asia Minor.

"'The Saviour's kingdom, writes John Yeardley, in allusion to this conversation, is spreading, and many instruments are being raised up in various nations to help forward the great work. The kingdom of Satan is in danger; he sees it, and stirs up the jealousy of men, setting them against one another, and, by their seeking through party-spirit to exalt their own particular religion, hindering the Lord's work.'"

"From Odessa to Constantinople they had a quick and safe passage. At Constantinople John Yeardley was deeply interested in the institutions which the American missionaries have founded for the religious and temporal improvement of the Armenians. He visited two of these, the high school at Bebek and the girls' seminary at Has-keui, both beautifully situated on the shores of the Bosphorus. In the former they found forty-eight young men, —sixteen Greek and thirty-two Armenian. The industrial part of the education was particularly gratifying to him.

"'Cyrus Hamlin, he says, who has the superintendence of their studies and labor, is wonderfully adapted for his vocation. He is assisted only by native teachers. The young men looked serious: some of their countenances were peculiarly impressive, indicating that they had been with Jesus. I saw them assembled in the school-room, and addressed them for some time; and C. Hamlin most willingly interpreted into Armenian what I said. It was a sweet and memorable time. The Armenian teacher would scarcely let go my hand after the meeting, he had been so touched with the power of Divine love. In the girls' boarding-school we found twenty-five girls, all Armenians, with the exception of two or three Greeks. It was a lovely sight to see so many of this class under a course of religious and useful instruction. Many of the countenances were marked and pleasing, and were fixed on me, with a great apparent seriousness while I addressed them, along with some of the neighbors.'"

"John Yeardley describes Constantinopl

"'Built entirely on the hills which slope f a considerable eminence down to the Bosp ous. The trees towering among the hou the high spires and gilded domes, have a n imposing effect; but what is the astonishm of the traveller when he commences his asc up steep, narrow, clumsily-pitched streets, could only compare them to the worst-c structed bridle-roads in England which packhorses traversed centuries ago. three days we were in the city I only saw or two carriages,—the most curious vehic indeed, there is scarcely a street in which carriages can pass. Donkeys are the c carriers. As to the dogs, they are born bred in the streets and are the property of town, and in the day-time lie by dozens in streets, young and old, are always under feet of the traveller, and he must consta poke them out of the way with his stick; night they are furious. The shops presen jumble of all kinds of ware; and the Turks cross-legged in the window, or work at t trade inside.'

"They left Constantinople on the 15th, on the 17th went on shore at Smyrna, wh at the house of the American missionary L they met with another missionary, na Stacking, returning with his family from Pe where he had labored sixteen years among Nestorians. The account which he gave J Yeardley of the creed and condition of Nestorian Church, and of the schools w had been opened in Persia, aroused his c sympathy and produced an abiding impres on his mind.

"Smyrna, like the other Turkish cities w they saw, vividly impressed the travellers its Oriental character.

LIGHT vs. DARKNESS.

When we look for the light
If we seek it aright,
It will make its appearance within;

We call night,
And the outward, the day,
Christ tells us the light
Comes the opposite way.

NTELLECTUAL ANTS.—"There are a good ny ants of different varieties on the lot at country place near Covington," said a New eans business man, "and last year I began nake a systematic study of their habits. I nd it a most fascinating pursuit and have ımed it with much enthusiasm during sev- l visits this year. A little investigation will vince almost anybody, I think, that the approaches nearer to man in point of in- igence than any of the lower animals. ne of the things I have seen are so marvellous t I would hesitate to speak of them if simi- wonders had not been fully recorded by ined scientists. Near one of my flower beds colony of small red ants that are extremely ustrious in collecting food, and they fre- ently perform the most astonishing engi- ering feats in transporting heavy burdens to ir home.

"Not long ago I watched a party of about lozen, who had found the body of a small der and were dragging it toward the nest. e spider had hairy legs, which stuck out in ery direction and caught on obstacles, greatly :arding progress. For several minutes the ts toiled away with their awkward booty and en stopped and seemed to hold a council. A nute fragment of dry leaf was lying on the ound, and presently they all laid hold and lled the spider on top of it. They seized the ges and slid it along without difficulty.

"On another occasion I saw a large body of ese same ants start out for a raid on another lony. They marched like an army, with outs thrown out at the sides, and, when sev- al feet distant from the nest, divided into ·o parties. The Origin of the Society of Friends in France.

Joseph Fox, of Falmouth, had a share in two cutters with other owners, who, outvoting his objection, at the commencement of hostilities with France in 1778, armed these vessels under letters of marque, in order to capture French merchantmen. The enterprise was successful, and some valuable ships were taken. His partners then endeavored to keep him from his share in the profits, but he insisted upon it, and lodged the amounts in the British funds, keeping the circumstance secret even from his family, and dealing with the money as not his own. His object was to restore it as soon as possible to the rightful owners. In 1783, on the restoration of peace, the opportunity occurred, and he then commissioned his son, Dr. E. L. Fox, to proceed to Paris, where he first communicated the matter to him by letter. Much difficulty and delay intervened, offering a good excuse, had he desired one, to abandon the attempt as hopeless. While it was yet in progress Joseph Fox died. But his son had received the duty as a solemn trust which he was not to quit until the restitution was made. He had a notice printed in the Gazette de France of Second Month, 1785, in pursuance of which fourteen hundred and seventy pounds were restored. The sufferers thus reimbursed made an acknowledgment in the Gazette. A small balance still remained in Dr. Fox's hands, which he could not assign, especially as the Revolutionary War had now broken out. In 1818, when it had reached six hundred pounds, he was able again to venture abroad, and going again to Paris inquired how he could best appropriate it, and ultimately placed it in the treasury of the "Invalid Seamen of France" for the relief of the non-combatants of the merchant service. The advertisement above noticed drew forth an address from a little body of Christians in and near Congenies, near Calvisson, Gard, who also felt the iniquity and wickedness of war. This was followed by a visit to our Yearly Meeting of Friends by one of their community named De Marsillac. He was one of the old French aristocracy, and he informed English Friends that they were descended from the Camisards or Protestants of the Cevennes Mountains, and that for sixty or seventy years there had existed in that district a Christian Church of about one hundred persons, which, besides its testimony against war, held spiritual views regarding worship and ministry identical with those of Friends.

Thus commenced the Christian intercourse between Friends in England and those in France. At the close of the Napoleonic war a committee of English Friends was appointed to visit them, in 1817. Thus originated the "Continental Committee" for corresponding with Friends, both in France and Germany. Many visits have been paid by English Friends to those little companies, who still hold their meetings for worship at Congenies and at Fontaines.—Australian Friend.

A GOOD book, whether of fiction or not, is one that leaves you farther on than when you took it up. If, when you drop it, it drops you down in the same old spot, with no finer outlook, no clearer vision, no stimulated desire for that which is better and higher, it is in no sense a good book.—Anna Warner.

The Bank Clerk and Infidel Principles.

Some years ago a clerk in one of the banks in Virginia was entrusted with a package of bank notes, of the value of a hundred thousand dollars, to carry into the adjoining state of Kentucky. A part of the country through which he was obliged to pass, was but little inhabited, and highway robberies, and even murders were said to be frequent. The young man was courageous, and of fine talents, but was the leader of an infidel club, and had apparently nearly succeeded in banishing from his mind those religious principles which the care of a pious mother had taught him in early youth. The dangerous portion of his route he had planned to pass in the day time, but having taken a wrong road, he lost his way, and after riding a long time in the darkness and chilliness of a starless autumn night, he anxiously sought a place of shelter.

At length he saw a dim light and pushed forward until he came to a poor, wretched-looking log cabin. It was now near ten o'clock. He knocked, and was admitted by a woman, who told him she and her children were alone —her husband having gone hunting; but she was certain he would return, as he always came according to promise. The young man's feelings may well be imagined. Here he was with a large sum of money, alone, and perhaps in the house of one of those robbers whose name was the terror of the country. He could go no further—what was to be done? The woman gave him supper and proposed his retiring. But no, he could not think of permitting himself thus easily to fall into the hands of robbers. He took out his pistols, examined them, and determined to sell his life as dearly as possible. In the meantime the man of the house returned; he was rather a fierce, uncouth-looking hunter; he had on a deer-skin hunting shirt and bear-skin cap, and seemed to be much fatigued, and in no talkative mood, all of which appeared to bode no good to the young infidel. He asked the stranger if he did not wish to retire; he told him no; he would sit by the fire all night. The man of the house urged him. But no; he could not think of such a thing. He was greatly alarmed, and expected that this would be his last night on earth. His infidel principles gave him little comfort. What was to be done?

At length the rough backwoodsman rose up, and reaching over the stranger's head to a little shelf, took down an old book, and said: "Well, stranger, if you won't go to bed, I will; but it is my custom always to read a chapter of Holy Scripture before I go to bed." A load was at once removed from him. Though avowing himself an infidel, he now had full confidence in the Bible; he was at once safe. He felt that the man who kept an old Bible in his house, and read it, and bent his knees before his Maker, would do him no harm. He dismissed his fears and lay down in that rude cabin and slept as calmly as he did under his father's roof. From that day he ceased to revile the Bible. He became a Christian, and often related these facts to show that no man can be an infidel from principle.—Selected.

MOTHER'S ROOM.

I'm awfully sorry for poor Jack Roe;
He's that boy that lives with his aunt, you know,
And he says his house is filled with gloom
Because it has got no "mother's room."
I tell you what, it is fine enough
To talk of "boudoirs" and such fancy stuff,
But the room of rooms that seems best to me,
The room where I'd always rather be,
Is mother's room, where a fellow can rest,
And talk of the things his heart loves best.

What if I do get dirt about,
And sometimes startle my aunt with a shout?
It is mother's room, and if she don't mind,
To the hints of others I'm always blind.
Maybe I lose my things—what then?
In mother's room I find them again.
And I've never denied that I litter the floor
With marbles and tops and many things more;
But I tell you, for boys with a tired head
It is jolly to rest on mother's bed.

Now, poor Jack Roe, when he visits me,
I take him to mother's room, you see,
Because its the nicest place to go
When a fellow's spirits are getting low
And mother, she's always kind and sweet,
And there's always a smile poor Jack to greet,
And somehow the sunbeams seem to glow
More brightly in mother's room, I know,
Than anywhere else, and you'll never find gloom
Or any old shadow in mother's room.

THE CULTIVATION OF MUSIC.—I look upon the great predominance of music in female education to be the source of more mischief than is suspected, from its being such a gulf of time as really to leave little room for solid acquisition. The monstrous proportion, or rather disproportion, of life which it swallows up, even in many religious families, has converted it into a positive sin. I question if many gay men devote more hours in a day to idle purposes than the daughters of many pious parents spend in this amusement. All these hours the mind lies fallow, improvement is at a stand-still, if even it does not retrograde. Nor is it the shreds and scraps of time stolen in the intervals of better things, that is so devoted, but it is the morning, the prime, the active hours, when the mind is vigorous, the spirits high, the intellect awake and fresh, and the whole being wound up by refreshing sleep, and animated by the return of light and life, for nobler services. The reading of a cultivated woman commonly occupies less time than the music of a musical woman, or the idleness of an indolent woman, or the dress of a vain woman, or the dissipation of a fluttering woman. She is likely, therefore, to have more leisure for her duties, as well as more inclination, and a sounder judgment for performing them. But, pray observe, that I assume my reading woman to be a religious woman; and I will not answer for the effects of a literary vanity, more than that of any other vanity, in a mind not habitually disciplined by Christian principles, the only safe and infallible antidote for knowledge of any kind. —Hannah Moore.

"IF a minister determines to regard God, he will grow into fuller and fuller knowledge of God's Truth and into all that Truth will do to illumine and empower the soul. If he yields to temptation to regard men, he will more and more come into oneness with them in conceptions and living."

Medical Instincts of Animals.

No instinct is more marked than that of self-preservation. Even in animals it is so strongly developed that it often simulates medical knowledge, or perhaps, in some instances, is actually a substitute for it. An interesting article on this subject is contributed to the Denver Medical Times by Dr. James Weir, of Owensboro, Ky. Dr. Weir begins by telling us about the therapeutic instincts of the honey-bee. When attacked by diarrhœa (a disease to which, under certain conditions, it is very prone), the bee, he says, will immediately begin to suck astringent pieces of the dogwood, poplar, wild cherry or hickory, and will soon effect a cure. Indeed, in winter, when bees become sick with this disease, they will readily drink a decoction of wild-cherry bark if it be placed in the hive. Bees seem to know that filth is a source of disease; hence, when ill in winter, they select a spot, as far from the combs as possible, at which all of the sick members of the hive deposit their dejecta. As soon as warm weather arrives the accumulated filth is removed and the spot carefully cleansed. In summer all excrementitious matter is deposited without the hive. About the common crayfish Dr. Weir notes the following facts:

"Crayfish are frequently the hosts of innumerable little parasitic leeches (histriobdellæ), which, strange to say, only become parasites, and thus harmful to their hosts, when their number has increased to such an extent that they can no longer live natural lives. As long as they are few in number they are of distinct benefit to their host, the crayfish, for they eat the unimpregnated eggs and dead embryos, thus keeping the other eggs and embryos in a healthy state. But as soon as their number becomes so great that the decomposing eggs and embryos are no longer a sufficient food supply, the mutualists become parasites—they begin to devour the healthy eggs and embryos. The crayfish, which carries her eggs beneath her tail, can tell at once when this state of affairs exists, and will straightway set in motion very effective measures for freeing herself from her harmful visitors."

Dr. Weir believes that many of the higher animals have discovered and use a materia medica that is not recognized by human physicians. Thus, he says:

"Dogs will seek out and devour the long, lanceolate blades of couch grass (triticum repens) when they are constipated; horses and mules will eat clay when they have 'scours;' cattle with the 'scratches' have been seen by me to plaster hoof and joint with mud, and then to stand still until the protecting and healing coating dried out and became firm. I saw a cow not long ago break the thin ice on a pond and treat her itching joints to a mud poultice. Several travelers and hunters of big game declare that they have seen elephants in the act of plugging shot-holes with moistened clay! Cats will go miles when they are feeling 'under the weather' for a dose of catnip (nepeta). A gentleman recently informed me that, a short time ago, after a severe snow-storm, he was hunting rabbits, when he saw his house-cat plowing through the deep snow some distance in advance of him. He thought at first that she was out on the same business as himself, i. e., rabbit hunting, but soon concluded that something of much greater importance had impelled her to abandon the warm ki chen on such a cold and inclement day. F resolved to follow her, and this he did for thre miles, until she entered a neighbor's garde where, after scratching in the snow, she soc uncovered a bunch of catnip. This she at on proceeded to devour. Surely a great and abi ing faith in medicine must have dwelt in th bosom of this animal!

"The saliva of animals, with the single ex ception of man, seems to have a distinct cura tive action. Of course much of the beneficia results following the continual licking of wound by animals is due to the resulting cleanliness yet, beyond the mere matter of cleanliness there is an undoubtedly curative property i their saliva. Dogs, cats, cattle, rodents, mon keys, et. al., lick their wounds when they get a them, and soon effect cures.

"It sometimes happens that animals con tract wounds on their bodies which they them selves cannot get at. Then, as I have frequentl observed, some good Samaritan in the shape o a fellow dog, cat or monkey, will step in an treat the wounds as though they were per sonal."

Dr. Weir tells us that the monkey, in a stat of nature, when surrounded by an inexhaust ible materia medica with which, as the autho believes, it is intelligently acquainted, very often treats with success the various ills t which it is subject. Even in captivity, when handicapped by its surroundings, it is able t combat certain diseases intelligently, or suc cessfully to treat an injury. Dr. Weir close with the following anecdote, which is one o many that confirm his belief in this respect:

"In 1882 there was on exhibition at the St. Louis fair grounds a magnificent specimen of the dog-faced ape, or chacma. This ani mal was very large and powerful and at al times treacherous, deceitful and 'possessed of the devil,' as his keeper often declared. His malignant disposition caused him to be confined in a strong cage and separated from the other monkeys. There was a strong board partition between his cage and that of a number of smaller monkeys of various genera and species, which dwelt together in amity and peaceful ness—a 'happy family.'

"The chacma discovered a small crack in the board partition, and, by diligent use of his sharp teeth and powerful fingers, had enlarged it until he could thrust his hand through. After he had severely injured one of the smaller monkeys, which he had caught by darting one of his paws through this opening, the attendan stopped the hole by nailing a piece of board ove it on the small monkey's side of the partition

"One of the nails came entirely through th boards and protruded an eighth of an inch int the chacma's cage. One day, while this last-mentioned creature was dashing about his de in one of his unaccountable fits of rage, he ra against this nail and scratched his shoulder He stopped at once and began to examine th hurt with his fingers. He then went to a cor ner of his cage where there was a box of clea sawdust, and, seizing a handful, pressed it o the bleeding scratch. In a few moments th bleeding ceased, and, when the blood drie there remained over the wound a coating o sawdust and dried blood which effectually pr tected it against the attacks of flies—conse quently it soon healed."

Use of Force by the Early Church.

new work entitled "Christianity and sm in the Fourth and Fifth Centuries," est N. Bennett, fellow and lecturer of d College, Oxford, a side of church is treated not very familiar to the gen- der, especially one who has forgotten on and Milman The religion of Islam nly spoken of as a religion propagated sword; but the fact that force, blood- nd wholesale coercion formed a very nt part of the professedly Christian nda in establishing itself over the Ro- pire is less familiar. In a review of ve-mentioned work, the London Weekly (Roman Catholic) says :

"It is in the times of cruel persecution and worldly weakness that the diviner elements in the Church of Christ shines out most unmistakably; in the days of power it is otherwise. No sooner had Christianity emerged victoriously from decadal chastisement than Christian (?) prelates and monks, and even (so-called) saints, lent their sanction and sometimes active assistance to the unrighteous anti-pagan crusade, in which nothing was respected, not even the consciences of those who differed from them. The aforetime pagan dictum in respect of the Christians, 'Non licet esse vos' ['You are not permitted to exist'], now became adopted by professing Christians themselves. Wholesale destruction of temples, statuary and literature, confiscation of property, penal disabilities, and physical torture were employed. Pagan martyrdoms, though rare, were not unknown. 'In short, it may fairly be said that whatever traces of pity and consideration are found in the treatment of paganism were due, not to the influence of the Christian clergy, but to the prudence or benevolence of the emperors.' Even great churchmen like Augustine, Ambrose and Chrysostom, betray a vacillating disposition; their ethical teaching is not always consistent, nor does their practise always tally with their theory. Augustine, perhaps, from his deficiencies as an exegete, defends in one place the principle of coercion on his interpretation of Our Lord's words, 'Compel them to come in, that my house may be filled.' There was a decided tendency to eradicate the distinction between unbelief and unbelievers, to exalt objective truth at the expense of subjective truth and the inviolable rights of individual conscience. As afterward with heresy, so then with unbelief. Hesitancy to accept Christianity was habitually traced to personal vice, or bad faith and unworthy motives, with little or no taking into account of radical differences of temperament, mental constitution, the abiding influences of education, and the like. In gross attachment to the letter of Christ's sayings they missed the spirit of his teaching, to whom and to whose Father heart-homage alone is pleasing; and in forcibly repressing idolators they let loose a legion of pestilential hypocrites upon the church."

One Aim and One Love.

In a recent Presbyterian assembly a speaker said, "One of the most remarkable scenes that ever occurred in this city, one that attracted the attention of heaven if not of men, occurred in a carriage crossing the city, between a native African and a native American. The American invited this boy to go with him, intending to show him the great buildings. But finally the African turned to him and said, 'It will be well to pray in a carriage?' 'Yes,' the American replied; 'I have had communion with God many a time in a carriage.' 'Then,' said the African, 'let us pray.' Putting his hand upon the American he turned him around upon his knees and said, 'I came from Africa to ask this man to tell me about Thee, and he is telling me about the buildings. I don't want to know about the buildings. I want to know about Thee. Teach him to tell me about Thee, about Thy Spirit.' The American, narrating this, said, 'I have had the hands of bishops put upon me, but I never had such grace come upon me as I had by the hand of that African.' He was sent out to a university in Indiana to be educated, for he could not speak English very well. Every student that came into his room he would ask to read a chapter from the Bible. One time he asked a young man to read a chapter from the Bible, and the young man said, 'I don't believe in that book. I am not a Christian.' The African said, 'What! Your Father speak to you and you not know Him? I pray for you.' And down on his knees he went to pray, and that American became a Christian.

It was the purpose of this poor African boy to prepare himself in this country for the work of a missionary among his own people, but God used him in a marked manner in America to rebuke the lukewarmness of professing Christians and to bring unbelievers to a knowledge of salvation and then bade the brave young soldier to lay aside his armor and to enter into rest.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—The National Prohibition Party met in convention in Chicago Sixth Month 27th and 28th. Thirty-seven States were represented. Among its declarations are the following: We submit that the Democratic and Republican parties are alike insincere in their assumed policy to trusts and monoplies. They dare not and do not attack the most dangerous of them all, the liquor power. We propose as a first step in the financial problems of the nation to save more than a billion of dollars every year now annually expended to support the liquor traffic and to demoralize our people. We face with sorrow, shame and fear the awful fact that this liquor traffic has a grip on our Government, municipal, State and national, through the revenue system and saloon sovereignty, which no other party dares to dispute. The Convention nominated John G. Woolley, of Illinois, for President, and Henry B. Metcalf, of Rhode Island, for Vice-President.

A despatch of the Twenty-seventh of Sixth Month from Washington states: Colonel James H. Randlett, agent for the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache Indians of Oklahoma, is in Washington conferring with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior in regard to ejecting intruders upon the reservation recently ceded to the United States. Colonel Randlett said to-day that these trespassers number about 3000 and exceeded the Indian population. Orders will be issued at once to compel the intruders to leave the ceded lands. If they fail to do this within ten days the military forces at Fort Sill, Oklahoma, will be called upon for aid. Colonel Randlett does not believe the order can be put into effect without the aid of troops. The whites began pouring in upon the ceded lands as soon as the act was passed ratifying the treaty, and have continued to arrive since that time.

The first cargo of coal sold by the Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co. to the Russian Government, left Newport News on Twenty-ninth of Sixth Month for Cronstadt. The contract is for 600,000 tons.

A cloudburst occurred in Mobile, Ala., on the Twenty-sixth of Sixth Month. All streets were submerged, in some places to a depth of five feet. A heavy rain continued falling throughout the morning. The rainfall from 5 A. M. to noon was 12.7 inches. The heavy rains throughout the State continue to work havoc. The Black Warrior River has overflowed its banks in Walker county, and hundreds of acres of cotton and corn lands are inundated. Many cattle have been drowned and great damage wrought. In the neighborhood of Macon, Ga., the Ocmulgee is at the highest point in many years. Crops in the river swamps are ruined, and many fields are filling with sand.

The great building trades' strike in Chicago is broken. It is now only a question of a short time when the 50,000 workmen who have been idle for many months will be arranging agreements for their return to work.

Pennsylvania has more national banks within her borders than any other State. The number is 436. New York has 327.

A despatch of the 27th ult. from St. Louis, Mo., represents that the strike of the St. Louis Transit Company's employees is now nearly over. Cars are in operation on all the lines without hindrance and are well patronized, except on those running north and south, where many thousand persons, because of the boycott and through sympathy for the strikers, patronize wagons.

The Citizens' Permanent Relief Committee, of Philadelphia, following the action taken by similar committees in New York, Boston, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Chicago and San Francisco, has determined to make an effort to raise funds for the relief of the sufferers by famine in India. Efforts will be made to raise funds as quickly as possible, and it is requested that the same be sent to Drexel & Co,, Treasurers, Fifth and Chestnut Streets. The committee has made arrangements to have all funds contributed immediately cabled to India, without expense, and the public is assured that there will be no outlay or delay in distribution.

The Supreme Court of Illinois has just decided by a unanimous vote that hard cider is an intoxicating drink.

A St. Paul despatch says that the existing drought will mean a loss of millions of dollars to the dairy and butter industries of Minnesota.

Director of the Mint Roberts has just completed a preliminary estimate of the gold production of the world for the calendar year 1899. Subject to corrections when all the official figures have been received, it shows a total production of $315,000,000.

An appalling disaster occurred at Hoboken, New Jersey, on the 30th ult., when the docks of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company were burned, together with a number of steamships, barges and canal boats, causing a loss of life of probably 200 persons and a property loss that will reach $10,000,000. The flames started among a large pile of cotton bales on the pier of the steamship company and spread with such remarkable rapidity that in fifteen minutes the entire property of the company, taking in over a third of a mile of water front, and consisting of three great piers, was completely enveloped in a huge blaze. The flames started so suddenly and gained such headway that many people on the piers and on the numerous vessels docked were unable to reach the street. There were great gangs of workmen on the piers, and these, together with a number of people who were at the docks on business and visiting the ships, scattered in all directions. Those nearest the shore end of the piers, of course, escaped, but with many others all means of exit were cut off by the flames, and they were forced to jump overboard. Great numbers were drowned. The steamships Saale, Bremen and Main, were destroyed. The Phœnicia, of the Hamburg-American Line, was badly damaged, while the monster Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse was towed into midstream, badly damaged.

The surplus of receipts over expenditures during the fiscal year which ended Sixth Month 30th, will exceed $80,000,000, or twice the estimated amount.

An American is said to spend on an average of $50 a year for food ; a Frenchman, $48; a German, $45; a Spaniard, $33 ; an Italian, $24, and a Russian, $40.

The Chicago Railway Age says the total railway mileage of the nation is about 193,000, and that construction on fully 300 roads is in progress. The track laid from First Month 1st to Sixth Month 30th will be about 1654 miles.

To-day, there are forty-six American locomotives either in use or ordered by the Egyptian railway administration; 371 cars are in use, and orders for 400 more cars have been placed. The superiority of American engines and cars, as well as of all other railway equipment and supplies, is conceded by railway officials and experts.

The most signal incident of the eclipse work thus far chronicled is the detection and registration of the heat radiation of the corona. The bolometer, an instrument employing an almost infinitesimal metallic film so sensitive to heat as to distinctly express the millionth of a centigrade degree, was successfully brought into service by the Smithsonian observers, under the direction of Dr. Abbot, and indicated for the corona, as compared with the moon, a most minute but sensible radiation.

At the Cabinet meeting in Washington, on the 30th ult., it was decided that war does not officially exist. Notwithstanding the killing of United States soldiers with Admiral Seymour's force by Chinese soldiers, the State Department takes the ground that unless the act was endorsed by the imperial authorities no ground exists for assuming that a state of war exists. The indefinite character of the news from China regarding the condition of the foreign Legations in Pekin continues a source of perplexity to the Administration officials.

There were 497 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 117 more than the previous week and 77 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 253 were males and 244 females: 51 died of consumption; 25 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 22 of apoplexy; 21 of cancer, and 15 of diphtheria.

FOREIGN.—Dispatches from China represent that a fresh phase of the ebullition in China is the probability of immediate outbreaks in the great southern provincial centres. The populace there is daily assuming a more hostile attitude toward foreigners, and the latter perceive symptoms of a goneral rising, especially at Nankin. The unrest at Canton is described as dangerous. The Canton population reaches 2,000,000, in addition to 250,000 living on junks and sampans (flat bottomed boats). Most of these people are disaffected and incendiary proclamations are increasing the number of the virulent.

A despatch of the 25th ult. from Canton says: "It is feared that we are on the eve of a scene of bloodshed and anarchy in the two Quangs only paralled in history by the Tai-Ping rebellion. The signs of a murderous uprising by the Boxers, pirates and other bloodthirsty wretches, have become so manifest that wealthy Chinese are hurrying away from its vicinity, taking with them their wives, families and valuables." The missionaries are leaving Canton hurriedly.

The six Viceroys of China, acting through the Chinese Minister at Washington, on the 26th ult. renewed their efforts to have foreign troops kept out of China. The request was a formal document, signed by the Viceroys, including Li Hung Chang, and the answer of the American Government amounted to a declination.

The Chinese Legation at Berlin declares that there is every reason to believe that the Powers are willing to undertake negotiations with Li Hung Chang.

Cablegrams from China state that Admiral Seymour's relief has returned to Tien-Tsin after a desperate fight on the road to Pekin, in which 62 men were killed and more than 300 wounded. He brings no news of the fate of the foreign Legations.

Sixteen thousand troops of the allied forces have been landed at Taku.

One hundred and thirty pirates and Boxers were beheaded at Canton by Li Hung Chang's order, to terrorize lawbreakers. Li is to remain at Canton, by order of the Empress.

The members of the Russian Embassy resent bitterly the disposition to assume that Russia is using the present disorder in China to increase her hold in the empire, and, if possible, secure territory there to the exclusion of other European Powers.

A despatch from London of the 30th ult. says: "Lord Wolseley, in an interview, says, 'China possesses every requisite for overrunning the world. She has a population of 400,000,000, all speaking the same language or dialect, readily understood from one end of the Empire to the other. She has enormously developed wealth and still more enormous natural wealth awaiting development. Her men, if properly drilled and led, are admirable soldiers. Moreover, they are absolutely fearless of death. Begin with the foundation of millions upon millions of such soldiers as these men are capable of being made, and tell me, if you can, where the end will be.'"

It is said that the work of the Presbyterian Board in China is larger than that of any other Board in the world except that of the China Inland Mission. It has 194 foreign missionaries, 594 native laborers, 92 organized churches, 11,214 communicants, 217 schools and colleges, 2 printing presses, the one at Shanghai being the largest mission press in the world, employing 135 workmen. It has also 16 hospitals and 13 dispesaries in operation, where 143,491 patients were treated last year. The chief present danger effects the Pekin and East and West Shantung missionaries.

Cable advices from Shanghai confirm the reported murder of the German Minister at Pekin on Sixth Mo. 18th, and the destruction of all the foreign Legations except three. The Emperor and the Dowager Empress had been seized, and Prince Tuan was exercising supreme power. A large force of Chinese is moving on Tien-Tsin, and the whole situation is regarded as perilous.

The insufficient accommodations for the sick and wounded British soldiers in South Africa have been inquired into by the War Office in London. Lord Roberts stated on the 25th of Sixth Month that there had been an abnormal number of sick at Bloemfontein, due to the exhausting nature of the march and the terribly unsanitary condition of the camp at Paardeburg, where the only water available for drinking flowed from the Boer camp, higher up, where the river was crowded with decomposing animals and also with a considerable number of wounded. To provise accommodations at Bloemfontein for such a number, which had become 2,000 before he left Bloemfontein was no easy task. No tents were carried and the public buildings had to be turned into hospitals. In three months there had been 6,309 admissions to the hospitals of patients suffering from enteric fever, while the deaths numbered 1,370, about 21 per cent.

The Lorenzo Marquez correspondent of the London Times says "Both the burghers and the foreigners who are arriving here profess a strong belief that it will take from three to six months to subdue the Boers."

The newest and most important underground electric railroad running from the Bank of England to the West suburbs, beneath the central portion of London, was opened on the 27th ult. The cars are similar to those in use on the New York elevated railroads, and there is elaborate elevator service, from the streets to the station platforms, eighty feet underground.

Louis Klopsch, proprietor of the Christian Herald, New York, who has lately returned from India, reports that the mortality during the wet season in India was just commencing, and must assume stupendous proportions outnumbering the total of the deaths during the past six months from all causes. Unless 20,000,000 blankets are quickly provided, the monsoon, India's greatest blessing will prove appallingly disastrous, and the mortality will exceed 2,000,000. He further asserted that ninety per cent. of the cattle in the richest farming districts had perished.

A despatch from Seattle of the 27th ult. says an uprising of the natives has occurred in Baratonga, a Pacific island under the British flag in the South Seas. It is said an appeal will be made to Great Britain for assistance. The rebellion is an uprising against the traders, but trouble was largely caused by the natives growing suspicions of the missionaries, owing to the latter changing the First-day of the week to conform with the 180th degree of longitude, where the days are twenty-four hours earlier.

The crusade against tuberculosis is now being pushed with determined zeal in almost every province of Spain. The two leading cities, Montreal and Toronto, have organizations for the propagation of information regarding the prevention and treatment of the disease.

Vienna's Academy of Sciences has decided to collect phonographic records and store them in one of the Vienna libraries. The collection will include specimens of every European language and dialect, to which will be added later all non-European languages. The Academy is trying to find some more durable material than is now employed to take the impression of the sounds and is experimenting with various metals.

The Government of Hayti has adopted the gold standard, and made the American gold dollar the unit of value.

An engagement has taken place on the gold coast of Africa between British troops, near Kiwassa, and the Asharitis. These, it was estimated, numbered 10,000, one half of whom had muskets.

The Second Chamber, at The Hague, has approved the Convention's Peace Conference relating to application of the Geneva Convention to naval warfare and to the rights and usages of war on land.

A despatch from Valparaiso, Chile, says that the Magellan Straits will be connected by wireless telegraphy with the rest of the Chilean Republic.

Resting and Rusting.

In hearing lately the desire expressed within the walls of a venerable institution of learning that when, under the covetous and world-wide sweeping spirit of our times, "Truth has been banished from the market-place, from the pulpit, from the political field, and from the halls of legislation, may she find an abiding home and sanctuary here"—a hope was raised that there was at least one other repository for truth on earth, which would be found to hold to that truth even more tenaciously—namely, the precious remnant of the ancient and true Society of Friends.

Wheresoever gathered or wheresoever dispersed within larger and smaller bodies, a seed of those to whom our ancient title rings, the "Friends of Truth." He who said, "Have called you friends," because of the oneness of communication of the Divine word between Him and them, declared, "He that is of the truth heareth my voice." As waiting and obeying regarders of the word of Him who is the Truth speaking to our condition, may we not be preserved and enlarged as an habitation of the Truth, the whole Truth and nothing but from the Truth, "builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit."

But was a resting place for truth offered in the seat of learning only as a resting-place—only as a museum for the storage and study of dead specimens, once having life, but now reverently preserved on the shelf? The Word of God is not so bound. The truth which makes free must itself be free. Having free course through its disciples' openness and obedience, thus only is it glorified. An institution of society may be a depository for Truth as for history or an antiquity, but cannot be a "sanctuary" of the Truth save as through it, as a living energy, men are becoming sanctified. "Sanctify them through thy truth. Thy word is truth." So the true cherishing is not of a truth as a specimen, but of a truth as a seed. "The seed is the word," and "the sower soweth the word." Truth finds in a faithful man, in a faithful society, or in a faithful institution, a home and a sanctuary only to issue forth therefrom in its right times for its own living testimony and work among men; where, though crushed to earth, it may rise again; though exiled from the market, it may be brought back through faithful hands as the law of business; though divorced from the commerce of the pulpit, it may return with new vigor through the mouth of its servants and prophets, who having "freely received, freely give" it, in demonstration of the Spirit and of power; though banished from laws, courts and campaigns, it may return with fresh standard-bearers to claim that "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king. He will save us."

IT is one gain for the cause of peace that its advocates can command respectful attention of minds trained to the approval of war. Not more remarkable seemed to us the earnest arraignment of spurious patriotism and war by William Everett than the toleration, nay, the approving enthusiasm with which it seemed to be received by an audience of cultured men. Though its professed standpoint was philosophical, and might have been made more Christian, yet, such as it is, we give a large portion of it to our readers, devoid, however, of the most effective part, the power of its living delivery.

WHAT IS WORSHIP?—It is daily more and more evident that the duty of public worship is falling out of view. People have come to think that unless they "enjoy" the service of the sanctuary, it is useless to go there; and instead of seeking the cause of their lack of "enjoyment" in their own plentiful lack of a spirit of worship, they are prone to assume that the service or the sermon is at fault. Hence it is that sums of money out of all proportion to the means of a congregation are lavishly spent for music, or other ornament, not to please God, but to minister enjoyment to undevout and undutiful people. For a like cause, the sermon, whatever else it is, must be "entertaining," because, unless it is so, nobody can be expected to listen to it. It must be confessed that preachers submit to this demand with altogether too much facility, and the consequence is that many sermons, if they are entertaining, are, at least, not edifying. The preacher whose first object is to please his Master's servants, disobeys his Master and their's, and by wasting talents and opportunities, at once denies and displeases Him.—The Churchman.

An Examination of Patriotism and War.

BY WILLIAM EVERETT.

From an oration delivered in Cambridge, Sixth Month 28th, 1900.

It behooves the speaker to-day to be candid. No elegant or inflated commonplaces, concealing one's real sentiments by the excuse of academic dignity or courtesy, ought to sully the honesty with which brethren speak to each other. The first, the only aim of every university, is the investigation and propagation of truth—truth in the convictions and truth in the utterance. . . . .

Patriotism—love of country—devotion to the land that bore us—is pressed upon us now as paramount to every other notion in its claims on head, hand and heart. It is pictured to us not merely as an amiable and inspiring emotion, but as a paramount duty, which is to sweep every other out of the way. The thought cannot be put in loftier or more comprehensive words than by Cicero, "Cari sunt parentes, cari liberi, cari familiares, propinqui; sed omnes ominum caritates una patria complexa est."

"Dear are parents, dear are children, dear are friends and relations; but all affections to all men are embraced in country alone." The Greek, the Roman, the Frenchman, the German, talks about "fatherland," and we are beginning to copy them; though to my ear the English "mother country" is far more tender and true.

Cicero follows up his words by saying that for her no true son would if need be hesitate to die. And his words themselves an echo of what the poets and orators whose heir he was had repeated again and again, have been re-echoed and reiterated in many ages since he bowed his neck to the sword of his country's enemy.

But to give life for their country is the least part of what men have been willing to do for her. Human life has often seemed a very trifling possession to be exposed cheaply in all sorts of useless risks and feuds. It has been the cheerful sacrifice of the things that make life worth living, the eager endurance of things far worse than death, which show the mighty power which love of country holds over the entire being of men. Wealth that Cræsus might have envied has been poured at the feet of our mother and sacrifices taken up which St. Francis never knew—ease and luxury, refined company and cultivated employment have been rejected for the hardships and suffering of the camp—the sympathy and idolatry of home have been abandoned for the tenfold hardships and sufferings of a political career; and at the age when we can offer neither life nor living as of any value to one's country, those children and grandchildren which were to have been the old man's and the old woman's solace are freely sent forth in the cause of the country which will send back nothing but a sword and cap to be hung on the wall and never be worn by living man again.

Such are the sacrifices men have cheerfully made for the existence, the honor, the prosperity of their country. But perhaps the power of patriotism is shown more strongly in what it makes them do than in what it makes them give up. You know how many men have been, as it were, born again by the thought that they might illustrate the name and swell the force of their country, achieving what they never would have aroused themselves to do for themselves alone. I do not mean the feats of military courage and strategy which are generally talked of as the sum of patriotic endeavor. I recollect in our war being told of a very well-known soldier who is now a very well-known civilian, that it was conceited for me or any other man to think in time of war he could serve his country in any way but in the ranks. But in fact every art and every science has won triumphs under the stress of patriotism that it has hardly known in less enthusiastic days.

Not all this enthusiasm has succeeded; there have been patriotic blunders as well as patriotic triumphs, but still it stands true that men are spurred on to make the best of themselves in the days when love of country glowed strongest in their hearts.

. . . We are told now that patriotism is not merely a generous and laudable emotion, but a paramount and overwhelming duty, to which everything else which men have called duties must give way. If a monarch, a statesman, a soldier stands forth pre-eminent in exalting the name or spreading the bounds of his country, he is a patriot—and that is enough.

Such a leader may be as perjured and blasphemous as Frederic, or as brutal and stupid as his father; he may be as faithless and mean as Marlborough, or as dissolute and bloody as Julius Cæsar; he may trample on every right of independent natives and drive his countrymen to the shambles like Napoleon; he may be as corrupt as Walpole and as wayward as Chatham; he may be destitute of every spark of culture, or may prostitute the gifts of the Muses to the basest ends; he may have, in short, all manner of vices, curses or defects; but if he is true to his country; if he is her faithful standard-bearer, if he strives to set and keep her high above her rivals, he is right, a worthy patriot. And if he seems lukewarm in her cause, if, however wise and good and accomplished he may be in all other relations, be fails to work with all his heart and soul to maintain her position among the nations, he must be stamped with failure if not with curse.

For the plain citizen who does not claim to be a leader in peace or war, the duty is still clearer. He must stand by his country, according to what those who have her destiny in their control decide is her proper course. In war, or in peace, he is to have but one watchword. In peace, indeed, his patriotic duty will chiefly be shown by obeying existing laws, wherever they may strike, even as Socrates rejected all thought of evading the unjust, stupid and malignant sentence that took his life. But it is not thought inconsistent with that true love of country to let one's opinions be known about those laws, and about the good of the country in general, in time of peace. In a free land like ours every citizen is expected to be ready with voice and vote to do his part in correcting what is amiss in protesting against bad laws, and, as far as he may, defeating bad men whom he believes to be seeking his country's ruin. Nay, a citizen of a free country who did not so criticise would be held to be derelict to that highest duty which free lands, differing from slavish despotisms, impose upon their sons.

But in time of war we are told that all this is changed. As soon as our country is arrayed against another under arms every loyal son has nothing to do but to support her armies to victory ; he may desire peace, but it must be "peace with honor," whatever that phrase of the greatest charlatan of modern times may mean. He must not question the justice or the expediency of the war; he must either fight himself or encourage others to fight. Criticism of the management of the war may be allowable; of the fact of the war, it is treason. And the word for the patriot is, "Our country, right or wrong."

Right here, then, as I conceive it, philosophy raises her warning finger before the passionate enthusiast and says: "Hold!" In the name of higher thought, of deeper law, of more serious principle, to which every man here is bound to listen. Philosophy says "Hold!" with the terror of the voice within, with the majesty of the voice from above to Americans now, and with the spirit of Socrates returning to earth, it bids them know what they mean by the words they use, or they may be crowning as a lofty emotion that which is only an unreasoning passion, and clothing with the robes of duty what is only a superstition. This love of country, this patriotic ardor of ours must submit to have philosophy investigate her claims, to rule above all other emotions, not in the interest of any less generous emotions, not to make men more sordid or selfish, but simply because there is a rule called truth, and a measure called right, by which every human action is bound to be gauged.

What is this country—this mother country, this fatherland that we are bidden to love and serve and stand by at any risk and sacrifice? Is it the soil? the land? the plains and mountains and rivers? the fields, and forests, and mines? No doubt there is inspiration from this very earth—from that part of the globe which one nation holds and which we call our country. Poets and orators have dwelt again and again on the undying attractions to our own land, no matter what it is like. The Dutch marshes, the Swiss mountains, soft Italy and stern Spain equally clutching on the hearts of their people with a resistless chain. But a land is nothing without the men. The very same countries, whose scenery, tame or bold, charming or awful, has been the inspiration to gallant generations, may as the wheel of time turns fall to indolent savages, listless slaves or sordid money-getters.

It is the nation, not the land, which makes the patriot; if the nation degenerate, the becomes only a monument, not a dwelling- the nation arouse itself and the country be a palace and a temple once more.

But who are the men that made the nat Are they the whole of the population or a only? are they one party only among the ple, which is ready perhaps to regard other party not as countrymen, but as ali Are the country the men who govern her control her destinies, the king, the nobles popular representatives, the delegates to w power is transmitted when the people re it? Once the king was the nation, with haps a few counsellors; patriotism meant alty to the sovereign; every man who or pretext arrayed himself against the crown a disloyal rebel, an unpatriotic traitor; unt length Charles the First was against the pe of England. When after years of civil and twice as many years of hollow peace, five times as many years when discussion stifled or put aside, the world came to re nize that loyalty to one's king and love to country are as different in their nature light of a lamp and the light of the sun.

And, yet if a king understands the spirit heart of his nation, he may lead it so tru peace or in war that love of country sha inseparable from devotion to the sovereig

No, brethren! no President, no prime m ter, no cabinet, no congress or parliamen deftly organized representative or exec body is or can be our country. To pay th patriot's affectionate allegiance is as illo as loyalty to James II. or to the French tional Convention. Mere obedience to law duly enacted is one thing; Socrates may the hemlock rather than run away from doom to which a court of his native city consigned him; but when the tribunals of country perpetrated such a mockery of ju Plato and Xenophon were right in cheri to their dying day a poignant sense of out an implacable grudge against such a mother as blood-stained Athens.

t after philosophy has forced the vociferatriot to define what he means by his ry, she has yet a more searching question x: What will you do and what will you for this country you love? How shall love be shown? There is one of the old t maxims which says in four words of that e language what a modern tongue can ely stammer in four times four: "Sparta

. I have run over to you some of the sacrifices and great exertions which pa-have made to make their dear home per-and themselves perfect for her sake. But thing done or renounced to make her per-nust recognize that she is not perfect yet; what our country chiefly calls on us for is ighty exertions and sacrifices, but those cular ones, small or great, which shall do eal good and not harm. That her come should whiten every sea; that her soil d yield freely vegetable and mineral h; that she should be dotted with peace-omes, the abode of virtue and love; that ities should be adorned with all that is glorious in art; that famine and poverty and plague and crime should be fought with all the united energy of head, hand and heart; that historians and poets and orators should continue to make her high achievements and mighty aims known to all her children and to the world; that the oppressed of every land may find a refuge within her borders; that she may stand before her sister nations indeed a sister, loved and honored; these are the commonplaces, tedious, if noble to recount, of what patriotism has sought to do in many ages. Yet every one of these things when actually achieved has had a worm at the core of the showy fruit, which has made their mighty authors but little better than magnificent traitors.

For every one of these has been achieved at the expense of other nations, as ancient, as glorious, as dear to their own children, as worthy of patriotic love as their triumphant antagonist; and every one has been achieved at the still worse price of corruption and tyranny at home. Every country has in times mistaken material for moral wealth, and has grown corrupt as she grew great; and every country in time has fancied that she could not be great and honored while her sisters were great and honored too; and has gone to war with them hoping to enlarge her borders at their expense, and to gain by their loss. It is here, again, at this very point, that the philosopher calls upon the patriot to say what he means by his cry, "Our country, right or wrong," the maxim of one who threw away an illustrious life in that worst of wicked encounters, a duel. If there are such words as right and wrong, and those words stand for eternal realities, why shall not a nation, why shall not her loving sons be made to bow to the same law, the utterance of God in history and in the heart? Can a king, can a president, can a congress, can a whole nation, by its pride or its passions turn wrong into right; or what authority have they to trifle or shuffle with either?

We are told that if we ever find ourselves at war with another country, no matter how that war was brought on, no matter what folly or wickedness broke the peace, no matter how completely we might oppose and deprecate it up to the moment of its outbreak, no matter how as truthful historians we may condemn it after it is over, no matter how iniquitous or tyrannical our sense and our conscience tells us are the terms on which peace has been obtained, we ought, during the war, to be heartily and avowedly for it. "We must not desert the flag." Patriotism demands that we should always stand by our country as against every other.

And what are the patriots in our rival country to be doing the while? Are they to support the war against us whether they think it right or wrong? Are they cheerfully to pay all taxes? Are they to volunteer for every battle? Are they to carry on war to the knife, or the last ditch? Is their love for their country to be as unreasoning, as purely a matter of emotion as ours? Certainly, if the doctrine of indiscriminate patriotism, "our country, right or wrong," is the true one. If France and Germany fight, no matter what the cause, every Frenchman must desire to see Germany humiliated, and every German to see France brought to her knees, and it is absolutely their duty to have all cognizance of right and wrong swallowed up in passionate loyalty. Lord Aberdeen and John Bright were right in deprecating the Crimean War up to the moment of its declaration; history says they were right now, but while the war lasted it was their duty to sacrifice their sense of right to help the Government aims. Webster and Clay were right in pouring out their most scathing eloquence against the Mexican War; General Grant was right in recording in his memoirs that he believed it unjust and unnecessary; yet Webster and Clay only fulfilled patriotic duty in sending their sons to die one by the sword and one by the fever, in the same army where Grant did his duty by fighting against his conception of right.

Brethren, I call this sentimental nonsense. It cannot be patriotic duty to say up to 1846 that our country will be wrong if she fights, to say after 1849 that she was wrong in fighting, but to hold one's tongue, and maintain her so-called cause in 1847 and 1848 though we know it is wrong all along. And, observe, these patriots make no distinction between wars offensive and defensive. wars for aggression and conquest and wars for national existence. In any war, in all wars in which our country gets engaged, we must support her; her honor demands that we shall not back out.

Oh, Honor! that terrible word, the very opposite of duty; unknown in that sense to the soldiers, the statesmen, the patriots of Greece and Rome; honor, the invention of the Gothic barbarians, which more than any other one thing has reduced poor Spain to her present low estate. There was a time when individual men talked about their honor, and stood up to be stabbed and shot at, whether right or wrong, to vindicate it. That infernal fiction, the honor of the duel, was on the point sixty years ago of drawing Macaulay into the field in defence of a few sarcastic paragraphs in a review which he admitted himself were not to be justified. It was very shortly after that that Prince Albert came to England with his earnest, simple, modest character; he used all his influence to stop the practice and the very idea of duelling; and now all England recognizes that any and every duel is a sin, a crime and a folly, and that the code of honor has no defence before God or man. When shall the day come when the nations feel the same about public war? When shall the words of our own poet find their true and deserved acceptance, not as a poetical rhapsody, but as practical truth?

"Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camp and courts,
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals and forts.

The warrior's name should be a name abhorred,
And every nation that should lift again
Its hand against its brother; on its forehead
Should bear forevermore the curse of Cain."

Brethren, if there is anything of which philosophy must say it is wrong that thing is war. I do not mean any particular school of philosophy, ancient or modern. But I mean if anyone studies the nature of God and man in the light of history, with a view to draw from that study rules of sound thought, and maxims of right action, he must say war is wrong, an antiquated, blundering, criminal means of solving a national doubt by accepting the certainty of misery. I began my address with Cicero's definition of patriotism. I now recall to you his sentence wrung from the heart of a man who had bazoned with his eloquence the fame of many great soldiers, and was not even himself without a spark of military ambition : "Ego sic judico, inquissimam pacem justissimo bello esse anteferendam." "This is my judgment, that the most unfair peace is preferable to the justest war." Granting—as I do not—that war is sometimes necessary ; so cutting off a man's leg, or extirpating an organ may be necessary ; but it is always a horrible thing all the same, and just as the conservative surgery of our age is at work day and night to avoid these destructive operations, so the statesmanship of the day ought to be at work, not specifically to secure arbitration, as if that was anything more than a possible method, but to stop war, as an eternal shame. And granting war is sometimes necessary, if it is ever engaged in for any cause less than necessary, it is wrong ; and the country is wrong that engages in it. A doubtful war, a war about which opinions are divided, is for that very reason not doubtfully evil, and the country that makes it is wrong. Yes, brethren, a nation may be in the wrong, in every war one nation must be in the wrong, and generally both are ; and if any country, your's or mine, is in the wrong, it is our duty as patriots to say so, and not support the country we love in a wrong because our countrymen have involved her in it. In the war of our Revolution, when Lord North had the king and virtually the country with him, Fox lamented that Howe had won the battle of Long Island and wished he had lost it. What! an Englishman wish an English army to be defeated? Yes, because England was wrong, and Fox knew it and said so.

But there is a theory lately started, or rather an old one revived, that war is a good thing in itself ; that it does a nation good to be fighting and killing the patriot sons of another nation, who love their country as we do ours. We are told that every strenuous man's life is a battle of one kind, and that the virile character demands some physical belligerency. Yes, every man's life must be to a great extent a fight ; but this preposterous doctrine would make every man a prize fighter.

They say war elicits acts of heroism and self-sacrifice that the country does not know in the lethargy of peace. Heroism and self-sacrifice! There are more heroic and sacrificial acts going on in the works of peace than the brazen throat of war could proclaim in a twelve-month. The track of every practising physician is marked by heroic disregard of life that Napoleon's old guard might envy. Every fire like that of Chicago, every flood like that of Johnstown, every plague and famine like that of India, are fields carpeted with the flowers of heroic self-sacrifice ; they spring up from the very graves and ashes. And these flowers do not have grow up beside them the poisoned weeds of self-seeking or corruption which are sure to precede, to attend, to follow every war. The dove of peace that brings the leaves of healing does not have trooping at her wings the vultures that treat their living soldiers like carrion. When Lucan has seen throughout the catalogue of the national miseries that followed the quarrel of Cæsar and Pompey, he winds them all up in the terrible words, "multis utile bellum," "war profitable to many men."

There is now much questioning of the propriety of capital punishment; it is strongly urged that the State has no right to take the life even of a hardened criminal, whose career has shown no trace of humanity or usefulness, and has put the capstone of murder on every other crime. And yet we are told it is perfectly right to take a young man of the highest promise, a blessing to all who knew him, the very man to live for his country and send him to be cut down by a bullet or by dysentery in a cause he cannot approve.

But there is a still newer theory come up about war as applied to ourselves. It seems that we share with a very few other peoples in the world a civilization so high, and institutions so divine, that it is our duty and our destiny to go about the globe swallowing up inferior peoples, and bestowing on them, whether they will or not, the blessings of the American —Constitution? Well, no! Not of the American Constitution, but of the American dominion—and that when we are once started on this work of absorption, they are rebels who do not accept the blessings. Now if this precious doctrine were true, it utterly annihilates the old notion of patriotism and love of country; for that notion called upon every nation, however small or weak or backward, to maintain to the death its independence against any other, however great or strong or progressive. According to this Mohammedan doctrine, this "death or the Koran" doctrine, the Finns and Poles are not patriots because they object to being absorbed by Russia, and the Hamburgers are rebels for not accepting the beneficent incorporation into France graciously proffered to them by Marshal Davoust.

But I will not enlarge upon this delicate subject by modern Americanism. It is bad enough for the nations we threaten to absorb. It is worse for us, the absorbers. I will ask you to remember what befell a noble nation which took up the work of benevolently absorbing the world.

When Xerxes had been driven back in tears to Persia, his rout released scores of Greek islands and cities, in the loveliest of lands and seas, and inhabited by the highest and wisest of men. There is nothing in art or literature or science or government that did not take its rise from them. Their tyrant gone, they looked around for a protector. They saw that Athens was mighty on the sea, and they heard that she was just and generous to all who sought her citadel. And they put themselves, their ships and treasure in the power of Athens, to use them as she would for the common defence. And the league was scarcely formed, the Persian was but just crushed, when the islands began to find that protection meant subjection. They could not bear to think that they had only changed masters even if Aristides himself assigned their tribute; and some revolted. The rebellion was cut down, Athens went on expanding, she made her subject islands pay money instead of ships, she transferred the treasury to her own citadel; she spent the money of her allies in those marvellous adornments that have made her the crown of beauty for the world forever. Wider and wider did the empire of the Athenian democracy extend. Five armies fought her battles in a single year in five lands; Persia and Egypt, as well as Sparta, feeling the valor of her soldiers. And the heart of Athens got dru with glory, and the brain of Athens got craz with power, and the roar of his boasting ro up to heaven, joined with the wail of her d ceived and trampled subjects. And one one they turned and fell from her, and join their arms to her rival, who promised them dependence; and every fond and mad endeav to retain her empire only sucked her deep into the eddy of ruin; and at length she w brought to her knees before her rival, and h victorious fleet and her impregnable walls we destroyed with the cry that now began t freedom of Greece.

It was only the beginning of new slaver enslaved by the faithless Sparta, who sold h the cities back to Persia. Patching up on more a hollow alliance with Athens, enslav by Macedonia, enslaved by Rome, enslaved the Turks, poor Greece holds at last what s calls her independence, under the protection the great civilizing nations who let her l because they cannot agree how to cut up h carcass if they slay her.

Brethren, even as Athens began by prot tion and passed into tyranny and then i ruin, so shall every nation be who interpr patriotism to mean that it is the only nat in the world and that every other which sta in the way of what it chooses to call dest must be crushed. Love your country, ho her, if necessary die for her, but remem that whatever you would call right or wr in another country is right and wrong for and for you; that right and truth and love man and allegiance to God are above all triotism; and that every citizen who susta his country in her sins is responsible to manity, to history, to philosophy, and to H to whom all nations are as a drop in the buck and the small dust in the balance.

This word has a pleasant look and sound the weary one. Do we appreciate all tha may be made to mean to us?

We are compassed about with many dist tions and many infirmities, our hearts strengthening.

"They that wait upon the Lord shall re their strength." "Wait thou upon God, He shall strengthen thine heart."

For this in its fulness we need the q hour. If we can so arrange, perhaps by ri a little earlier, as to secure a season of re ment alone each day, to turn our hearts to Lord, waiting before Him in the silence o flesh, bringing our sins beforehand to j ment, seeking strength and guidance for coming day, we shall realize the Divine ence helping and strengthening us to pres a conscience void of offense toward God man. John Yeardley and His Travels.

After his return to Europe he went into hern France. At Nismes he occupied him- with holding meetings in many places in neighborhood. In some meetings which ttended in the city he had for fellow-la- rs Eli and Sybil Jones, from the United es, with their companions. Amongst the ence at one of these meetings were three ers, who, with two others, had been awak- at Lyons, and who manifested the pro- s they had made in Christian doctrine by sing to kneel before the procession of the . Their officer, observing their disregard is required practice, held his sword over neck of one of them, saying he would e off his head if he did not bow down. man was firm in his refusal, and was sent rison. To encourage one another in their profession these men were accustomed to religious meetings. They were in conse- ce accused of sedition, and when they as- ed the simply religious character of their ings, one of them was required to swear he truth of his statement; he refused to an oath, pleading that the New Testa- commanded him not to swear. A second then called upon in the same way; he also sed; and their steadfastness was reported ie commanding officer as an act of contu- y. The officer happened to be a Protest- of an enlightened and pious disposition; aid that soldiers were called upon to vin- te the innocence of their companions, not procure their condemnation, and that if did not choose to give evidence the law d not compel them. Two of the five re- ed their discharge from the army; the rest removed to Nismes. John Yeardley had e conversation with these three after the ing, with which he was well satisfied. told him that when they were awakened wrote and received so many letters that cited suspicion, and that the police who nined the letters took the texts of Scrip- , or rather the figures that referred to the ter and verses, for a secret language, to deceive their vigilance:

On the 8th of the Eleventh Month, J. rdley and W. Rasche, accompanied by s Paradon, went to Valence, and visited ram Combe, at Pialoux, where they re- ed a few days. B. C. had fitted up a com- ious room adjoining his own dwelling, re he held meetings regularly :

'And where,' says J. Y., 'we had several nn and edifying occasions; and as our g there became more known the attend- increased, so that the last gathering was e a large one, and peculiarly quiet and sat- tory. Among some meetings which we ointed in the neighborhood two were held ie temple of the Protestant Church, which a mark of great liberality; these two oc- ons were peculiarly favored. In the latter alluded to the persecution he had had to re on account of the disuse of the Supper Baptism. He boldly avowed the convic- he felt as to the non-use of these things, that the preaching of the gospel ought to free. I have seldom been in a district re there is more openness for the gospel sage in its simplicity than in this mountain on.'

"From Valence, John Yeardley returned direct to England, only stopping at Friedrichsdorf, where he visited the boarding-school.

"'I reached my home,' he says, 'on the 24th of the Eleventh Month, with a thankful heart to my Heavenly Father for his merciful preservation.'

"John Yeardley had scarcely returned to England before war was declared with Russia. The confirmation he received from this lamentable event, that his journey had been made at the opportune time, filled his heart with gratitude. The work he had been able to do had been small, but he had the satisfaction of knowing that it had been accomplished at the only juncture in which it would have been practicable."

"In making a brief note of the Yearly Meeting of 1854, John Yeardley takes occasion to record his sentiments on a subject which then, as now, strongly engaged the attention of the Society.

"'The Yearly Meeting has been a precious time; it has strengthened the bond of love and unity. There is, under all discouragements, a love to the Society manifested in the young people of both sexes. It is true there is a great want of bearing of the cross, and many are seeking for excuses to persuade themselves that many of those things that have long distinguished our Society are now no longer of use. But I still think there is more religion in many of our young members than their outward appearance would authorize us to believe. I love to cleave to the good, and to hold out a helping hand to encourage the tender budding of grace, and for the good to overcome the evil. I want them to be brought to conviction, and to be told that they are not required to wear plain clothes, and to use plain speech, because our Friends have done so, but because Christianity leads into simplicity, and the language of Scripture is that of truthfulness, and to follow the changing fashions of the world is too low for the notice of the Christian whose heart is placed on heavenly things, and whose time is too precious to be spent on trifles. There is no peace to the regenerated heart equal to a devotedness of life in promoting the extension of the Saviour's kingdom upon earth.'"

"In the summer of 1855 he repeated his visit to Minden, and hired a lodging at the Klause. A reflection in one of the letters which he wrote from this retreat affords a pleasing glimpse of his mind:

"'I sometimes think that a large portion of comfort and joy are allowed to those who really love the Lord; and how chastened are the pleasures of the humble Christian! They abide with us long after the causes of them are passed away; and the more our permitted pleasures are enjoyed under a grateful sense of the goodness of the bountiful Giver, the longer they may be permitted to us.'

"In the Ninth Month he attended the Twomonths' Meeting at Pyrmont. It was not without emotion that he visited once more the place which had been so familiar to him in earlier days. The hopes he had then conceived, and which, as we have seen, he had so fondly cherished, with regard to the Society of Friends in that part, had been disappointed; the little company had dwindled in numbers and declined in religious influence; and when he took leave of Pyrmont for the last time it was with a sorrowful heart.'"

"John Yeardley went to Neuveville with the intention of passing the winter in Switzerland. After remaining a month, however, he returned to England; and this change of mind was the result of a remarkable circumstance. He became silent and reserved, with the air and manners of one who is not at peace with himself; until one night, when he was heard to cry out in a loud tone, as though speaking to some one. The next morning at breakfast he appeared subdued and full of tenderness; and on his young friend inquiring what had made him cry out in the night, he told her that he must return home, for there was more work for him to do. He said that a prospect of service in the gospel had latterly opened before him, and that as he had greatly desired to remain in Switzerland, he had striven against the sense of duty and refused to yield; but that during the night he had had a vision, in which he heard the command repeated to return home and enter again upon his labor, and that he felt, as he thought, the touch of the heavenly messenger's hand. This caused him to call out; and when he awoke he found that willingness of spirit had taken the place of his former obstinacy. Thus turned from his own purpose, he set about to accomplish the will of his gracious Master with his usual resolution, and they made the best of their way back to England. The nature of the service which he saw before him is touched upon in the following passage from a letter dated Neuveville, the 14th of the Tenth Month:

"'My home duties press heavily upon me. . . . . Very long have I thought about the young men, and the younger part of our Society; and I have a hope the way will be made for my finding access to them, in a religious and social point of view. Should it be permitted, the Lord grant that it may tend to mutual comfort.'"

ONLY HALF A POINT.—A man crossing the English Channel stood near to the helmsman. It was a calm and pleasant evening, and no one dreamed of a possible danger to their good ship, but a sudden flapping of a sail, as if the wind had shifted, caught the ear of the officer on watch, and he sprang at once to the wheel, examining closer the compass.

"You are half a point off the course," he said sharply to the man at the wheel. The deviation was corrected, and the officer returned to his post.

"You must steer very accurately," said the looker-on, "when only half a point is so much thought of."

"Ah! half a point in many places might bring us directly on the rocks," he said.

So it is in life. Half a point from strict truthfulness strands us upon the rocks of falsehood. Half a point from perfect honesty, and we are steering for the rocks of crime. And so of all kindred vices. The beginnings are always small. No one climbs to the summit at one bound, but goes the one little step at a time. Children think lightly of what they call small things. These rocks do not look so fearful to them.—Sailor's Magazine.

PSALM LXXVIII.

Give ear, ye children, to my law,
Devout attention lend,
Let the instructions of my mouth
Deep in your hearts descend.

My tongue, by inspiration taught,
Shall parables unfold:
Dark oracles, but understood,
And owned for truths of old,

Which we from sacred registers
Of ancient times have known,
And our forefathers' pious care
To us has handed down.

Let children learn the mighty deeds
Which God performed of old,
Which, in our younger years, we saw,
And which our fathers told.

Our lips shall tell them to our sons,
And they again to theirs,—
That generations yet unborn
May teach them to their heirs.

The Reservation of Pity.

The New York Observer calls attention to "The Reservation of Pity," and concludes:

"The world would be far happier if there were among men less reservation of pity. Whether this withholding of the expression of the active sentiments of compassion be due to a constitutional reserve, to selfishness, or to pure contrariness, it is alike inexcusable. There is enough sorrow in the world calling for sympathy, did we but know it, to break any heart. Perhaps it is as well that we none of us realize it all. But every truly royal nature must carry its burden of sympathy for others. Not the reservation, but the expression of a Divine pity, redeems life from a pagan barbarity, and relates it to the skies.

"It is always a delightful task to record instances where pity has been expressed, not reserved, and such illustrations of compassion are often witnessed incidentally even in bloody wars. A story comes to us from the campaign before Ladysmith, which affords another proof that pity has not perished from the human breast. A truce was declared, and the British were invited by the Boers to bury the subjects of the queen who had fallen in the fight just before. The Boers stood by, silently, sympathetically. Then, when the British major had finished reading the burial service, a Boer, of his own accord, advanced and said a short prayer in memory of the men who shortly before had been firing at him and his comrades. Then some manly Boer voice started the tune of a familiar hymn, which was sung in Dutch, while the stern British soldiers standing by were deeply moved. As an English medical officer put it, 'Our fellows were very much cut up and could hardly speak for some time.' Many would call this the one touch of nature which makes all the world akin. We would rather like to think of it as a touch of grace which had temporarily, at least, softened the hearts of foes into a tender pity for the victims of their cruel warring.

"Life is short, life is hard while it lasts. Its hurts are many. Its cries may be half-stifled, but the agony is there. It remains, therefore, for the tender-hearted, touched with a Christ-like pity, to give without reservation of their best thought, their tenderest sympathy, their truest words, their precious time, if perchance some of the hurts may be healed, some of the burdens lightened, and some of the strong cryings turned to laughter and joy, before all sufferers and sympathizers alike go hence and are no more."

BETAKE THYSELF TO PRAYER.

When bitter winds of trouble blow,
And thou art tossing to and fro,
When waves are rolling mountain high,
And clouds obscure the steadfast sky,
Fear not, my soul; thy Lord is there.
Betake thyself, my soul, to prayer.

When in the dull routine of life
Thou yearnest half for pain and strife,
So weary of the commonplace,
Of days that wear the self-same face,
Think softly, soul; thy Lord is there.
And then betake thyself to prayer.

When brims thy cup with sparkling joy,
When happy tasks the hours employ,
When men with praise and sweet acclaim
Upon the highway speak thy name,
Then, soul, I bid thee have a care;
Seek oft thy Lord in fervent prayer.

If standing where two pathways meet,
Each beckoning thy pilgrim feet,
Thou art in doubt which road to take,
Look up, and say: "For thy dear sake—
O Master! show thy footprints fair—
I'd follow thee." Christ answers prayer.

The tempter oft, with wily toil,
Seeks thee, my soul, as precious spoil;
His weapons never lose their edge,
But thou art heaven's peculiar pledge.
Though Satan rage, thy Lord is there—
Dear soul, betake thyself to prayer.

For "THE FRIEND."

Importance of Distinguishing Between True and False Conversions.

Excellent treatises have been written, from time to time, with a view to enable us to distinguish between the wheat and the chaff in conversions and religious experiences, and people at large, or many of them, are concerned in obtaining information on this interesting subject, for every one who has arrived at an age of religious understanding has a soul which must be forever lost, except it be created after the image of God, in righteousness and true holiness.

In the outset, let us lay this to heart, that deception about our religious experience is possible. The Apostle intimates that a man may think himself to be something when he is nothing, and so deceive himself. He may deceive himself, but he cannot deceive God. "The heart is deceitful above all things." It is said in Scripture that "the hope of the hypocrite shall perish," which supposes that some hypocrites are self-deceived, else they would have no hope to lose. Five of the ten virgins had lamps without oil, that is, they had hopes and profession without grace.

In the parable of the sower, the seed which fell on stony places, and which sprang up without taking root, represents a defective conversion. From the Scriptures we learn that there are those who trust in themselves that they are righteous, and, from a conceit of their own superior goodness, despise others, who, nevertheless, will in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. "There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washe from their filthiness" (Prov. xxx : 12). Let a be entreated to let this thought be fixed deepl in their minds, that none may be deceived abo the state of their own heart. Therefore e amine thyself whether thou art in the faith yea or nay.

To be deceived with a false hope is a decep tion which will prove ruinous to those who a laboring under it. It proved ruinous to the fi foolish virgins, who seem to have suppose that they had oil in their vessels. Have we n reason to expect that those who are the mo deceived about their religion will be the lea apt to suspect themselves to be in this cond tion? As a means to prevent being deceiv about their conversion, none should rest in t good opinion which others may have of their a tainments in that direction, but "let eve man prove his own work, then shall he ha rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another There is none but the Searcher of hearts, a each individual, can know the state of t heart. After Peter had called Silvanus faithful brother, he adds this qualifying claus "as I suppose." By this we are taught th even an apostle did not pretend to know t hearts of others with an infallible certainty.

It will be unsafe to judge of the genuin ness of our religion by its agreement with th of others, for they who "measure themselv by themselves and compare themselves among themselves are not wise" (2 Cor. x : 12). L us suppose this to be the way in which t stony-ground hearers made trial of their cc versions. One heard another relate his expe ences, and they agreed with his own, and th led him to conclude his own were good, becau they were similar to his neighbors'. It is tr they were similar, but what did this avail, s ing their similarity consisted in their bei shallow experiences, having no root to suppo them? In this way many may be led to be ceived in those seasons where numbers professedly converted, under much religio excitement about the same time. At su times many are apt to entertain confide hopes of their regeneration who have broug their feelings and views to no higher standa than that of the experiences which they ha heard related by their neighbors. It is an fecting thought that there should be those w are full of hopes of heaven merely becat they have felt as others have, they have h such distress of mind as they have heard othe tell of, and they have been filled with such jo as others have experienced.

The only sure means to prevent deception this matter is to try all our experiences by t alone true standard, the Word of God in t heart. This is like silver seven times purifi It is everlasting Truth. It will determine wh is right and what is wrong in our expe ences and practices. "The word which I spe unto you," said the Saviour, "the same sh judge you in the last day." It requires t work of the Holy Spirit dwelling in us, c vincing and reproving, moving us away fr all self-righteousness and dependence upon t experiences of others for our faith. We n the repentance which needeth not to be pented of, a godly sorrow for sin. The m whose heart is changed by the in-dwelling the Holy Spirit departs from iniquity. watches, prays and strives against it, and en led to cry out, "Oh, wretched man that m, who shall deliver me from the body of s death?" (5 Romans vii: 24).

'It is the work of the Spirit, not only to ıvince of sin, but also of righteousness." ose who are truly taught by the teachings the Holy Spirit, are first convinced they are ners. They see that the tears of repentance not alone atone for their sins. They see at no works of righteousness they can do in ir own strength can avail them anything. The religion taught by Christ's Sermon on the unt must be felt and practised by us, or we on the sand, and our building will fall. It ooorness of spirit, mourning for sin, hunger- and thirsting after righteousness, shining lights in the world, loving and forgiving our emies, praying and giving alms. This is the igion taught by that noted sermon—yes, and all Christ's sermons.

It is not intimated in any of the sayings of rist that, if a man has a text of Scripture ich contains a promise suggested to his mind, delivers words in his own strength, be they ver so religious, it will prove him to be born God. Christ has furnished us with many dences of grace, which are overlooked, many ies, in our zeal to believe we are his chil- n, or the endeavor to have others think so. ere is a religion which is solid and substan- l, one which "changes all the heart" and kes it the residence of the sweet graces of Spirit and the principle of holy action roughout our lives.

One who is born of God, however feeble his ength, has all the members of a living child. he begin a good work in us, he will perform even unto the day of Jesus Christ. If we e those who are of the household of faith, will also love our enemies. If we love God, om we have not seen, we shall love our ther whom we have seen. If our zeal is the it of the Spirit, we will, by the operation of same Spirit, also be clothed with humility. f God prepares our hearts to pray, He will o prepare us to every good word and work. therefore, we do not endure to the end, we k an essential mark of a gracious state. Yea, our conversion is the work of God's Holy rit, our religion will not be stationary, it l advance; we shall go from strength to ength until we appear before God in Zion.

The command is, "look diligently, lest any n fail of the grace of God." Let us, dear ends, in conclusion, seek to know of a stand- on the sure foundation of true conversion, t Rock which followed the children of Is- l in the wilderness, and that Rock was rist; and as we abide in Him, love and serve n with the whole heart, He will do mightily us, which will, indeed, seem marvelous in eyes. For "THE FRIEND."

THE SAME SPIRIT CONTINUES THE SAME LEADING.—Several letters are preserved long Christopher Healy's papers from differ- t Friends, expressive of their interest and ity with him in his services during his relig- us visit to Great Britain in 1832.

At a Monthly Meeting where he was present, spoke pretty fully on the dangers which tended Friends joining with persons of other ligious denominations in associations for promoting benevolent objects; using such texts as "Strangers have devoured his strength and he knoweth it not." The clerk of the Monthly Meeting was a youngish man, of great natural abilities.

After meeting he requested an interview with Christopher, saying, their views were not alike on some points. At this interview he proceeded at some length, and with much eloquence, to set forth the public benefits and the opportunities of disseminating Friends' doctrines, etc., that would arise from the course some were pursuing. When he had finished, Christopher asked him a few questions: "Are the views and practices of the Episcopalians the same now as they were in the days of George Fox and our early Friends?" "They are." "Dost thou believe that George Fox and our early Friends were led out from these things by the Spirit of Truth?" "Yes, I do." "Dost thou believe the same Spirit of Truth would lead us into that, now, out of which it formerly led us?"

The man's head drooped, and he sat without answering.

They parted pleasantly, and after Christopher Healy's return to this country, he received a letter from the clerk, stating that the few words uttered by him at that interview, were the first thing that had opened his eyes and led to a change in his views.

The Offering Most Pleasing to the Lord.

Having been under deep baptisms and poverty of spirit, as I quietly rode along, the Lord was pleased in mercy to break in upon my mind by his life-giving presence and power; and it became the language of my soul, "Speak, Lord, and thy servant will hear." After which, many things were divinely opened to me, wherein I greatly rejoiced, and was thankful to the Lord, my God. Then I found a sudden, but gentle rebuke, and heard, as it were, a voice that said in the secret of my soul: "These dispensations thou most delightest in, are least pleasing to me, and not so beneficial to thy soul, as that pure poverty of spirit, brokenness and contrition of heart, which brings into humility of mind: and the reason why this is so little desired, and so unpleasant to the creature, is because it can have no part therein, but is wholly and entirely excluded and set at naught, can discover no beauty or excellence in it. And this is the reason I love the offering of a broken heart and contrite spirit, as it is most pure, and without any mixture of the creature. For, whether there be prophecies, Divine openings, revelations, consolations, joyings or rejoicings in the Holy Spirit, gifts of healing or tongues or utterance, in all these self can rejoice and have a share, being obvious to it and bringing it honor. Then said I, "Lord, dispense to me what is most pleasing unto Thee and best for my soul, so long as my weak faith and patience can endure it; but when I am ready to faint, give me a little of the wine well refined on the lees, that my soul may rejoice in Thee, the God of my salvation."

IF we stand in the openings of the present moment, with all the length and breadth of our faculties unselfishly adjusted to what it reveals, we are in the best condition to receive what God is always ready to communicate—Upham.

Items Concerning the Society.

. . "Friends have no function for self-advertisement, they have no prerogative of virtue, but through the grace of God there is happily still found among us in common with other Christian communities as the Times beautifully expresses it, much of 'that simplicity of character, moderation of speech, and discipline of soul, which meets adversity or prosperity without abasement or perturbation.'"

Says the London Friend: "It is also true that from Nonconformist communities, owing to social and æsthetic causes, there is a natural drift of the children of wealthier families to the national Church. The beautiful cathedral service, the rapturous anthem, the skilful and well-ordered sermon, are undoubted attractions. Yet we believe our young people to-day are more fully persuaded in their own minds than were their fathers a generation ago as to their preference for the simpler and more direct intercourse in worship between the eternal Father and their own souls. Our younger members to-day exhibit a sober probity and right-mindedness in their lives, that will, we believe, contrast favorably with their cotemporaries in other Christian communities."

The Boston Transcript says: "The Quakers, or Friends, have ever been well disposed toward education, and before public support in advanced forms were as common as it has now become, they were in many places pioneers in the spread of practical and substantial culture. It was hoped to make ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed the guest of honor for the occasion [of the reunion of Friends' School at Providence]. He was prevented from attending, but he sent a response to the principal, in which he said: 'Although it does not seem a good time just now to so prophesy, yet the faith remains with many of us who are still of the world's people, that the principles which gave the Friends their name will finally bring to the earth a reign of peace.' But the school, which is an institution of over eighty years' standing, did not lack prominent speakers to congratulate it in person. Among these was President Faunce of Brown University, who said to the officers of the school: 'Your work is not yet done. It is said that your spirit has so diffused itself through the world that your work is nearly done. I do not believe this. Just so long as England has men like Cecil Rhodes, just so long will she need men like John Bright. Just so long as we have singers like Rudyard Kipling—and I yield to no one in admiration for his virility—just so long will we need men like John G. Whittier.' This is high testimony from two distinguished sources. The leaven of influence sent out by this sect, which for three hundred years has been hostile only to strife, has been a quiet one, but has exerted a mighty power, none the less."

Notes from Others.

"I have long since ceased to pray, 'Lord Jesus, have compassion upon a lost world.' I remember the day and the hour when I seemed to hear the Lord rebuking me for making such a prayer. He seemed to say to me—'I have had compassion on a lost world, and it is time for you to have compassion.'"—A. J. Gordon.

The class of sermons which I think is most needed is the class which offended Lord Melbourne long ago. Lord Melbourne was seen one day coming from church in the country in a mighty fume. Finding a friend, he exclaimed, "It is too bad! I have always been a supporter of the church, and I have always upheld the clergy. But it is really too bad to have to listen to a sermon like that we have had this morning. Why, the preacher actually insisted upon applying religion to a man's private life!" But that is the kind of preaching which I like best, the kind of preaching which men need most; but it is also the kind of which they get the least.—William E. Gladstone.

It has become the fashion at political conventions to applaud the prayer of the officiating minister. The late Republican gathering was no exception. Whatever may be the origin of, or the occasion for, this abominable custom, good people not only regret it, but resent it. It is both unbecoming and irreverent. It is no compliment to the minister who officiates, and it certainly is an offense to the God, whose guidance and blessing are invoked. Neither He nor his servant are partisans to be applauded. The minister may be eloquent and apt in his supplication, but that does not call for noisy demonstration at the close. He and the delegates have been in serious and devout relations if they have been honest in their reverential attitude, and the result should not be spoiled by belittling conduct. God's guiding hand is needed in their deliberations, but they show a mockery of prayer when they applaud it as they would a partisan harangue.—Presbyterian.

The reception of the Scriptures by the Filipinos has been with an eagerness on every hand that is only to be explained by the preparation and power of the Holy Spirit. They are not satisfied with buying and reading the Bible, but keep asking for books on Bible study, and choose Bibles with references and maps. They are thoroughly prepared for the Word and buy readily. The people who are here from other islands and other parts of Luzon are anxious to have copies to send to their friends and relatives, and will often sacrifice in order to purchase them. We have only in a few cases met the work of the priests in poisoning the minds of the people against the protestant Bible, and compelling their burning under threat of ex-communication. It is not common, and we hope that as the government of the islands becomes settled, all persecution will disappear.—Southern Presbyterian.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—A despatch of the 4th from Washington states that a formal notification of the attitude of the United States with respect to China has been given to the Powers by Secretary Hay. It is stated by high authority that the position assumed by this Government embodies these points: The United States does not recognize the existence of a state of war. The United States has not sent troops and ships to China to make war upon her; they are sent there to look out for Americans and their interests; they are there to assist the legal government in establishing and maintaining order. Finally, the United Ststes will withdraw when peace is restored. This is understood to imply that the United States Government does not favor the dismemberment of China. Orders have been issued for additional troops to be sent to China from this country, which upon their arrival in the Ninth Month, as expected, will make the number of American soldiers there 8000, exclusive of marines.

As a result of the celebration of Independence Day with firearms, toy cannon, giant crackers and other forms of explosives, thirty persons were killed and 1325 were injured, according to reports received by the Chicago Tribune from 125 cities. A loss of $123,325 was caused by the fireworks, in addition to the injury to human life.

In reference to the instruction of Cuban teachers at Harvard, it is reported that Spanish is to be the language of instruction, and the course of instruction aims wisely at thoroughness in simple branches. All will receive systematic instruction in the English language, and American history will be taught by lectures in the Spanish language, illustrated with the stereopticon. The 1400 teachers come from 120 of the 129 cities and towns of Cuba, and there has rarely been such a representative body of educated Cubans got together.

The Democratic National Convention, held last week in Kansas City, nominated William J. Bryan for President and Adlai E. Stevenson for Vice President. Its declaration of principles includes the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1; condemns the law enacted by Congress in reference to Porto Rico as imposing upon the people of that island "a government without their consent and taxation without representation;" condemns and denounces the Philippine policy of the present administration; opposes imperialism as the paramount issue before the American people; opposes militarism; condemns trusts, monopolies, and the Dingley tariff law. The attitude of this convention in reference to silver is the same as that of 1896. The Populist Convention lately held at Sioux Falls and the Convention of Silver Republicans held in Kansas City last week have also nominated William J. Bryan as their candidate for the Presidency.

It was only a very few years ago that an export trade in corn of three to four per cent. of the domestic production was considered all that could be reckoned on. Corn has, of late years, become more of an export article than ever before, the first real advance in this particular taking place in 1896, when 4.7 per cent of the domestic product was exported. In 1898, 11.14 per cent. was exported, or 212,055,543 bushels. This was exceeded slightly by the exports of 1899-1900. An unusually large quantity went to Cuba and to South Africa, but the chief demand came from European countries.

The Commissioner of Patents says that the past fiscal year has been a most prosperous one for the Patent Office. The cash receipts have been $1,358,228.35, a larger sum than received in any previous fiscal year. The number of patents issued is also the largest in the history of the office, numbering 26,540.

There were 544 deaths in this city last week, reported to the Board of Health. This is 47 more than the previous week and 109 more than the corresponding week of 1899. Of the foregoing 279 were males and 265 females: 35 died of consumption; 35 of inflammation of the lungs and surrounding membranes; 22 of apoplexy, 18 of diphtheria, and 9 of cancer—187 of the above were of infants under one year of age, attributed to the effects of the heat.

FOREIGN—Information has been received in Berlin of the murder of the German minister, Baron von Ketteler, at Pekin, Sixth Month 20th, by Chinese soldiers. This event has induced the German emperor to announce to a detachment of marines: "I will not rest until the German flag, joined to those of the other Powers, floats triumphantly over China's flag, and until it has been planted on the walls of Pekin, to dictate peace to the Chinese. This is not, however, understood to be an official declaration of war against China by Germany.

The Boxer hosts at Pekin practically commenced their work of destruction at the capital, according to the correspondents, on Sixth Month 11th, when a mob burned summer houses of the Ministers, the race course and foreign cemetery at Sihshan. On the following days thousands gathered outside the city with banners. Then, owing to the terror that reigned among the refugees and the foreigners, the Ministers ordered all to gather in the British and American Legations, which had been barricaded.

The Consuls at Shanghai report that the Pekin Legations were safe on Seventh Month 4th, and that the Chinese had ceased their attacks. The only fear now felt, according to the report, was regarding the food supply.
